Acerca de este libro

Esta es una copia digital de un libro que, durante generaciones, se ha conservado en las estanterías de una biblioteca, hasta que Google ha decidido escanearlo como parte de un proyecto que pretende que sea posible descubrir en línea libros de todo el mundo.

Ha sobrevivido tantos años como para que los derechos de autor hayan expirado y el libro pase a ser de dominio público. El que un libro sea de dominio público significa que nunca ha estado protegido por derechos de autor, o bien que el período legal de estos derechos ya ha expirado. Es posible que una misma obra sea de dominio público en unos países y, sin embargo, no lo sea en otros. Los libros de dominio público son nuestras puertas hacia el pasado, suponen un patrimonio histórico, cultural y de conocimientos que, a menudo, resulta difícil de descubrir.

Todas las anotaciones, marcas y otras señales en los márgenes que estén presentes en el volumen original aparecerán también en este archivo como testimonio del largo viaje que el libro ha recorrido desde el editor hasta la biblioteca y, finalmente, hasta usted.

Normas de uso

Google se enorgullece de poder colaborar con distintas bibliotecas para digitalizar los materiales de dominio público a fin de hacerlos accesibles a todo el mundo. Los libros de dominio público son patrimonio de todos, nosotros somos sus humildes guardianes. No obstante, se trata de un trabajo caro. Por este motivo, y para poder ofrecer este recurso, hemos tomado medidas para evitar que se produzca un abuso por parte de terceros con fines comerciales, y hemos incluido restricciones técnicas sobre las solicitudes automatizadas.

Asimismo, le pedimos que:

+ Haga un uso exclusivamente no comercial de estos archivos Hemos diseñado la Búsqueda de libros de Google para el uso de particulares; como tal, le pedimos que utilice estos archivos con fines personales, y no comerciales.
+ No envíe solicitudes automatizadas Por favor, no envíe solicitudes automatizadas de ningún tipo al sistema de Google. Si está llevando a cabo una investigación sobre traducción automática, reconocimiento óptico de caracteres u otros campos para los que resulte útil disfrutar de acceso a una gran cantidad de texto, por favor, envíenos un mensaje. Fomentamos el uso de materiales de dominio público con estos propósitos y seguro que podremos ayudarle.
+ Conserve la atribución La filigrana de Google que verá en todos los archivos es fundamental para informar a los usuarios sobre este proyecto y ayudarles a encontrar materiales adicionales en la Búsqueda de libros de Google. Por favor, no la elimine.
+ Manténgase siempre dentro de la legalidad Sea cual sea el uso que haga de estos materiales, recuerde que es responsable de asegurarse de que todo lo que hace es legal. No dé por sentado que, por el hecho de que una obra se considere de dominio público para los usuarios de los Estados Unidos, lo será también para los usuarios de otros países. La legislación sobre derechos de autor varía de un país a otro, y no podemos facilitar información sobre si está permitido un uso específico de algún libro. Por favor, no suponga que la aparición de un libro en nuestro programa significa que se puede utilizar de igual manera en todo el mundo. La responsabilidad ante la infracción de los derechos de autor puede ser muy grave.

Acerca de la Búsqueda de libros de Google

El objetivo de Google consiste en organizar información procedente de todo el mundo y hacerla accesible y útil de forma universal. El programa de Búsqueda de libros de Google ayuda a los lectores a descubrir los libros de todo el mundo a la vez que ayuda a autores y editores a llegar a nuevas audiencias. Podrá realizar búsquedas en el texto completo de este libro en la web, en la página `http://books.google.com`

This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

FREEDOM OF THE PRESS

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1971

U.S. SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS
OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to notice, at 10 a.m., in room 318, Old Senate Office Building, Senator Sam J. Ervin, Jr., presiding.

Present: Senator Ervin.

Also present: Lawrence M. Baskir, chief counsel, and William E. Pursley, Jr., counsel.

Senator ERVIN. This subcommittee will come to order.

Many years ago, at the birth of our great Republic, Thomas Jefferson observed:

"No government ought to be without censors and where the press is free, no one ever will."

Today, nearly two centuries since our Founding Fathers incorporated Jefferson's observation in the First Amendment to our Constitution, the Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights opens a series of hearings to examine the state of freedom of the press in America.

These hearings, and the subcommittee study of which they are a part, have been organized because it is apparent that in today's America, many people doubt the vitality and significance of the first amendment's guarantee of freedom of the press. There have been at least four recent examples of this:

First, the increased subpenaing of journalists by grand juries and congressional committees;

Second, the recent publication by several newspapers of classified information and the government's unsuccessful attempt to enjoin the publication;

Third, the widespread use of false press credentials by government investigators; and

Fourth, new fears about government control and regulation of the broadcast media.

These developments have brought into sharp relief existing concern about the relationship between government and the working press.

In addition, we have heard sharp and angry attacks upon the news media by high government officials. These attacks have brought forth equally hostile responses from spokesmen for the press. Some government officials appear to believe that the purpose of the press is to present the Government's policies and programs to the public in the best possible light. These officials have forgotten Jefferson's words. Indeed, they appear to have lost sight of the central purpose of a free press in a free society.

Likewise, some members of the press appear to have forgotten that the First Amendment's guarantee of free speech and free press was not intended as their exclusive possession. Those enlightened men who devised our constitutional system did not mean to secure freedom of the press by suppressing the right of Americans, whether private citizens or public officials, to criticize the press. Not every critical word about the press is an attack on the first amendment.

These continuing controversies, and the bitterness and suspicion that accompany them, make it evident that many Americans are uncertain about both the role of a free press in a free society and the necessary conditions for its preservation.

In my judgment, it is time to challenge this uncertainty by considering again the reasons underlying the Constitution's guarantee of freedom of the press.

It is time to reexamine and to reemphasize First Amendment principles.

And, it is time to measure developments in the law as they affect both the printed and broadcast press against these principles. Such are the objects of this series of hearings.

The struggle to establish and preserve freedom of the press has been long and bitter. From the moment the type was set on the first printing press, kings and parliaments have attempted to control the press. Public officials have always feared the threat which a free and vigorous press poses to their power and tenure.

Anglo-American history has been no exception to this struggle. During the reign of Henry VIII, the manuscript of any material intended for publication had to be submitted to royal officials empowered to censor objectionable passages. Licensing was another means of controlling the press, and these officials also had the power to approve or deny a license for printing the material. Licensing continued in England until 1694. Thereafter, the common law crime of seditious libel emerged as a substitute for the system of licensing as a means of control.

Chief Justice Holt set forth the underlying concept of seditious libel in Tuchin's case, in 1904. He wrote:

> A reflection on the government must be punished because if people should not be called to account for possessing the people with an ill opinion of the government, no government can subsist. For it is very necessary for all governments that the people should have a good opinion of it.

Historical studies indicate that there were hundreds of convictions for seditious libel during the 17th and 18th centuries in England.

American colonial history is replete with examples of government attempts to censor the press. A gentleman named John Wise, of Massachusetts, was tried and convicted of seditious libel in 1687 for bringing the King's government "into hatred and contempt in the minds of the people." He had dared to declare that a tax not levied by the Assembly was contrary to Magna Carta and did not have to be paid. His punishment was suspension from the Ministry, a fine of 50 pounds, and the posting of a 1,000 pounds bond to guarantee his "good behavior" for 1 year.

Time and time again in colonial America, men were arrested and thrown in jail for "wicked lyes and slanders upon Government," and for "sundry vile insinuations against his Majesty's rightful and lawful authority," and "for inflaming the minds of his Majesty's subjects."

There is a fundamental similarity among these and other historical instances of restriction of the press in the Government's rationale. Governments justified prior restraint or prosecution on the grounds of the necessity of preserving its good reputation among the people. All too often, this is still the real, if no longer the explicit justification for Government attempts to control the press.

In a truly free society this is not a sufficient justification. Our Founding Fathers understood that however incomplete, unfair, and even vicious the press may be in its attacks upon Government and Government officials, the press cannot be censored or punished, without undermining one of the cornerstones of free thought and expression.

The first widespread discussion in America of the significance of the First Amendment's guarantee of freedom of the press occurred during the bitter days at the close of the 18th century. By 1798, our young republic was on the verge of collapse. A federalist majority in Congress, determined to stifle opposition, enacted the alien and sedition laws of 1798. The Sedition Act made it a Federal crime, punishable by fine and imprisonment, to publish any false, scandalous, and malicious writing against the Government, Congress, or the President. Ironically, this legislation passed the Senate on July 4, 1798.

The sedition law was vigorously enforced. The Government brought to trial, convicted, and imprisoned many Americans who dared to put in print their opposition to the policies of the incumbent administration. Many others were intimidated—or as we now say "chilled"—by fear of retribution. Confronted by this reign of terror against freedom of the press, Thomas Jefferson in 1799 was moved to tell a group of college students:

> To preserve the freedom of the human mind . . . and freedom of the press, every spirit should be ready to devote itself to martyrdom; for as long as we may think as we will, and speak as we think the condition of man will proceed in improvement.

From this sad chapter of repression in the history of our country came a greater appreciation for the necessity of protecting the press from Government intimidation. While the alien and sedition laws were repealed and never held to be unconstitutional by the Supreme Court, most Americans accepted the view that the first amendment's guarantee of freedom of the press was incompatible with the traditional common law of seditious libel. Americans who believed in freedom—freedom of thought and freedom of expression—determined that a free and robust press was an absolutely essential ingredient for a truly free society. Not since that time has criticism of Government policies and officials by the press constituted a crime.

Our historic commitment to freedom of the press means that we must tolerate absurd, misleading, and vindictive reports which sometimes appear in newspapers, magazines, and on radio and television. It means that thoughts and ideas which we hate and despise will appear in print and be broadcast across the land. James Madison recognized that some degree of abuse is inseparable from the proper use of everything; and in no instance is this more true than in that of the press. Most Americans have come to understand that the irritating excesses of the press are a small price to pay for a press independent of Government control.

They realize that only an independent press can vigorously and effectively contribute to that wide ranging and critical discussion of public affairs which is a prerequisite to a democratic society.

This view of the role of a free press in a free society necessarily means that there will be tension and sometimes hostility between the press and Government. Indeed, it is the conflict between the press and Government which attests to the vitality of the first amendment.

This conflict exists today. It is manifested in a number of relationships between Government and the press.

In recent years an increasing number of subpenas have been issued to newsmen in connection with various Government investigations. In the past, government prosecutors and members of the press have attempted to adjust their different interests in a way that would serve justice without endangering freedom of the press. Apparently, the mutual understanding on the part of the press and the Government which underlay this adjustment of interest has disappeared, perhaps another victim of the fear and suspicion that has developed between them. Confrontation has replaced negotiation. Today, there are members of the press who believe that their integrity and independence is being threatened by Government's zealous demand for their notes, their pictures, their films, and other working materials. Some of them suggest that the Government views the reporter as another investigative arm of Government. The Government, on the other hand, sees no reason why members of the press do not have exactly the same obligations as any other citizen when it comes to law enforcement.

It is not an easy task to resolve the conflict between first amendment interests and the interests of justice that is involved in the subpena controversy. The Attorney General, in August 1970, issued guidelines to govern the issuance of subpenas at the Federal level. A case is presently under consideration by the Supreme Court which directly raises the issue of whether or not the first amendment requires the granting of a privilege for newsmen not to appear before a grand jury under certain circumstances.

Senator James Pearson of Kansas, and Congressman Charles Whelan of Ohio, have introduced legislation in the Senate and House of Representatives to establish a statutory privilege for newsmen to protect their confidential information and sources from compulsory disclosure. Senator Pearson's bill, S. 1311, has been referred to the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights. Many of our witnesses will comment upon this legislation and the underlying problem.

The conflicting interests of the Government and the press were dramatically underlined this past summer in connection with another problem. On June 30, 1971, the Supreme Court handed down one of the most important opinions ever issued concerning freedom of the press. The case of New York Times v. United States is a touchstone for any analysis of the state of the law concerning freedom of the press. The conflicting positions put forth by the parties in this case underscore the need to reexamine first amendment principles.

The Government sought to enjoin publication by the New York Times and the Washington Post of the Pentagon papers which contain classified information concerning our country's involvement in the Vietnam war. The Government argued that the President's constitutional responsibility for foreign affairs and for national security entitled the President to an injunction against publication upon persuading a court that the information to be revealed threatens grave and irreparable injury to the country. Quite simply, it was an argument that the inherent Presidential power to protect the national interest was superior to the proscriptions of the first amendment.

In wisely rejecting the Government's application for an injunction, the Supreme Court reaffirmed the belief of our Founding Fathers that a press free from governmental control is essential to a free society.

Mr. Justice Black in his opinion emphasized the purpose of a free press:

> In the First Amendment the Founding Fathers gave the free press the protection it must have to fulfill its essential role in our democracy. The press was to serve the governed, not the governors. The Government's power to censor the press was abolished so that the press would remain forever free to censure the Government.

Notwithstanding the Supreme Court's holding in this case, the Government's attempt to restrain publication of the Pentagon papers has raised serious doubts about the security of freedom of press. This case represented the first time since the adoption of the Bill of Rights that Federal courts have been asked by the Government to halt publication. Furthermore, a careful analysis of the various opinions filed in this case makes uncertain just how free from Government restraint the press is.

It is my hope that these hearings will provide a forum for the examination of the impact of this important case on the state of freedom of the press. Whatever the differing views concerning this historic case and the circumstances surrounding it, it is important that we understand the consequences of this decision for freedom of the press.

Another special concern of these hearings is the first amendment implications of existing Government regulation of the broadcast industry. The increasing amount and scope of Government regulation of broadcasting has occurred without sufficient attention to its effect upon principles of freedom of press.

While the Founding Fathers did not contemplate the media of radio and television when they wrote the first amendment, the reasons for protecting the printed press from Government control apply equally to the broadcast media. More people get their news from radio and television today than any other single source. Studies show that the impact of the broadcast media upon Americans is without precedent in the history of communications. If first amendment principles are held not to apply to the broadcast media, it may well be that the Constitution's guarantee of a free press is on its death bed.

Great confusion surrounds the Federal statutes, regulations, and the few court decisions which affect broadcasting. Congress enacted the Radio Act of 1927 and the Communications Act of 1934 to prevent the air waves from being flooded with such a host of voices that the medium of broadcasting would be rendered useless. Whatever Government regulation of broadcasting was authorized, it was only for the purpose of securing the most effective use of available air waves and communications technology. As is often the case with Government control, this limited authority with respect to broadcasting has greatly expanded.

The power of the Federal Communications Commission has increased to the point that many broadcasters believe principles of freedom of the press no longer have significance with respect to broadcasting. With the promulgation by the Federal Communications Commission in 1949 of the fairness doctrine, the Commission's power over broadcasting was greatly enhanced.

Whatever one's view of the fairness doctrine, it must be clear to everyone that such a doctrine has placed in the hands of a Federal agency a not very subtle form of censorship. A recent Federal court of appeals decision, for example, has sustained an FCC determination that since the relationship of smoking to health is no longer a controversial issue, tobacco interests are not entitled to the benefit of the fairness doctrine. In other words, mankind, at least as personified by the FCC, has discovered the ultimate truth with respect to the hazards of smoking. There is no reason for further discussion.

The irony of this decision underscores its absurdity and its danger. It was only a few years ago that opponents of smoking were fighting an uphill and largely discouraging battle to convince the FCC and the courts that smoking was dangerous and therefore a controversial issue. In less than 10 years, absolute truth has shifted from one side of this issue to the other.

The lesson of this one example is that whatever the dangers to freedom of expression that result from concentrated ownership of the broadcast media, it is nowhere near as dangerous as leaving to a few Government officials the power to decide what can be discussed and what cannot and when ultimate truth has been discovered and what it is.

There are some Americans who apparently think they know what is good and what is bad for other Americans to hear on the radio and to see on television. They believe that the power of Government should be used to protect Americans from falsehood, bad programing, harmful thoughts, and zealous advertising. While I do not quarrel with the good intentions of these people, I believe that the sweeping Government regulation of broadcasting implicit in this view foreshadows the end of the free broadcast media and with it, a mortal blow to the first amendment.

Our Founding Fathers were wise enough to know that there is no way to give freedom of speech and press to the wise and deny it to fools and knaves. Certainly, they did not intend for the Government to decide who were the wise and who were the fools and who were the knaves. With broadcasting, just as with the printed press, governmental power to protect the public from excess and foolishness is governmental power to censor.

The troublesome consequences of Government regulation of broadcasting were dramatized this summer when Dr. Frank Stanton, president of Columbia Broadcasting System, relied upon the first amendment in refusing to appear before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. That committee issued a subpena to Dr. Stanton in connection with its investigation of a controversial television broadcast. The committee's assertion of authority to protect the public from misleading presentation of the news was challenged by Dr. Stanton's insistence that first amendment principles apply to broadcasting as well as to the printed press.

This controversy clearly sets forth the problems involved in authorizing Government regulation of broadcasting in the public interest and simultaneously protecting freedom of the press.

Another manifestation of today's tension between Government and the press involves the issuance of press credentials by Government to reporters and the alleged use of these press credentials as covers by Government investigators. This problem was underscored by a recent incident in Madison, Wis. This summer, members of the Madison Newspaper Guild unanimously voted to destroy their press cards and denounce them as a form of license. Speaking for its members, the Guild president said, "We take this step not lightly but in response to repeated police use in this country of undercover agents using press cards." He added, "The power to license * * * implies the power to withdraw the right."

These and other conflicts between Government and the press should give liberty-loving Americans cause for concern. They have prompted this subcommittee study and this series of hearings on the state of freedom of the press. In many situations the interests of Government and the press appear to be irreconcilable. Often they are not, but only seem so because the two sides have taken intransigent positions out of mutual distrust and fear. Rarely if ever in our history have we actually had to choose between suppression of the press or disaster. In every national war, where security was truly at stake, the press and Government found means of accommodating their apparently irreconcilable interest. I see no reason why suppression or censorship is required now, if it was not when national survival hung in the balance.

Nonetheless, it is easier to preach freedom of the press than it is to practice it. In the midst of controversies which seem to us now as earth shaking, we tend to lose sight of the higher issues at stake. These hearings are designed to let us take pause from the daily battle, and assess where we are and where we should be going. Hopefully, they will produce a better understanding by press, government, and the American people of the purposes of the first amendment.

The topic freedom of the press is obviously much too broad and deep to be thoroughly covered in one set of hearings. There are many issues that will not be mentioned, or at most only touched upon. For example, it should not be thought that freedom of the press refers only to the working news press, and of them, only the establishment press. Movies, scholars, the underground press, obscenity—all raise issues under the first amendment. Because we will not discuss them here should not be understood as meaning that the subcommittee has drawn a circle and left them outside the first amendment.

It is a sad coincidence that the subcommittee's hearings begin on the same day that the Nation mourns the passing of the greatest modern advocate and defender of the first amendment. Many eloquent words have been written about the amendment, and many of them have come from the pen of Justice Black. But none are more eloquent than those he used in his opinion in the New York Times case this past June. I think there can be no more fitting tribute to Justice Black and the freedom he loved so well than to quote from his opinion:

> The Bill of Rights changed the original Constitution into a new charter under which no branch of government could abridge the people's freedoms of press, speech, religion, and assembly. Madison and the other Framers of the First Amendment, able men that they were, wrote in language they earnestly believed could never be misunderstood: "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of the press . . . "Both the history and language of the First Amendment support the view that the press must be left free to publish news, whatever the source, without censorship, injunctions, or prior restraints.
> In the First Amendment the Founding Fathers gave the free press the protection it must have to fulfill its essential role in our democracy. The press was to serve the governed, not the governors. The Government's power to censor the press was abolished so that the press would remain forever free to censure the Government. The press was protected so that it could bare the secrets of government and inform the people. Only a free and unrestrained press can effectively expose deception in government.
> And paramount among the responsibilities of a free press is the duty to prevent any part of the government from deceiving the people and sending them off to distant lands to die of foreign fevers and foreign shot and shell. In my view, far from deserving condemnation for their courageous reporting, the New York Times, the Washington Post, and other newspapers should be commended for serving the purpose that the Founding Fathers saw so clearly. In revealing the workings of government that lead to the Vietnam war, the newspapers nobly did precisely that which the Founders hoped and trusted they would do.
> The Framers of the First Amendment, fully aware of both the need to defend a new nation and the abuses of the English and Colonial governments, sought to give this new society strength and security by providing that freedom of speech, press, religion, and assembly should not be abridged. This thought was eloquently expressed in 1937 by Mr. Chief Justice Hughes—great man and great Chief Justice that he was—when the Court held a man could not be punished for attending a meeting run by Communists.
> "The greater the importance of safeguarding the community from incitements to the overthrow of our institutions by force and violence, the more imperative is the need to preserve inviolate the constitutional rights of free speech, free press and free assembly in order to maintain the opportunity for free political discussion, to the end that government may be responsive to the will of the people and that changes, if desired, may be obtained by peaceful means. Therein lies the security of the Republic, the very foundation of constitutional government."

Assisting the subcommittee in these hearings are Americans with diverse and wide-ranging experiences in journalism, in publishing, in government, and in the law. Among those invited to appear before the subcommittee are members of Congress; the Attorney General; members of the Federal Communications Commission; newspaper reporters, editors, and publishers; broadcast journalists; presidents of broadcast networks; professors of constitutional law and constitutional history; and representatives of newspaper, publisher, photographer, and broadcast associations. Because of the experience and knowledge of the witnesses who are scheduled to appear before the subcommittee, I am confident that these hearings will make a significant contribution to a better understanding of freedom of the press.

The subcommittee had scheduled as its first witness Senator James Pearson, of Kansas, author of S. 1311—the Newsmen's Privilege bill. Unfortunately Senator Pearson is ill and cannot appear before the subcommittee today. He has given to the subcommittee a prepared statement and I would ask that this statement be printed in the record following the testimony of the other witnesses this morning. We are fortunate to have Congressman Charles Whalen, of Ohio, author of the companion bill in the House of Representatives, here to testify as our first witness. In addition, this week the subcommittee will receive testimony from Mr. Harding Bancroft, executive vice president of the New York Times; Mr. Norman Isaacs, of the Columbia University Graduate School of Journalism; Mr. Frank Stanton, president of the Columbia Broadcasting System; Mr. Richard Barnet, author and political scientist; Congressman Ogden Reid, of New York; Mr. Walter Cronkite, of CBS News; Prof. Philip Kurland, of Chicago Law School; and Mr. James J. Kilpatrick, newspaper columnist and television commentator.

STATEMENT OF THE HON. CHARLES W. WHALEN, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE THIRD CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT OF THE STATE OF OHIO

Mr. WHALEN. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

I am indeed honored to appear before you and your distinguished subcommittee this morning. I am confident that your review of the constitutional issues and practical problems surrounding the first amendment guarantee of freedom of the press will be an extremely thorough one from which meaningful recommendations will be forthcoming. I am most grateful for this opportunity to participate in these monumental proceedings. I certainly regret that Senator Pearson, who was to lead off this hearing, is not here to testify due to illness.

Mr. Chairman, the specific subject I wish to discuss is the Newsmen's Privilege. This issue is not new. It first was brought to congressional attention in 1857, when the New York Times published a story indicating that Congressman had taken bribes. James Simonton, the reporter who wrote the article, was asked to reveal his sources before a select committee of the House of Representatives. When he refused on the grounds that it would be a dishonorable breach of confidence, he was found in contempt of Congress.

The privilege asserted by Simonton more than a century ago has been claimed by American journalists ever since. For many years the privilege was summarily rejected by the courts. Today the newsman's claim that confidential information merits protection is not always denied, but neither is it generally accepted. The privilege occupies a particularly confusing legal position in 1971.

The executive branch tried to ameliorate the uncertainty surrounding the privilege by releasing guidelines last year regarding the issuance of subpenas to journalists. Although the guidelines probably reduced tensions, the privilege issue was not resolved.

In some States, journalists are protected by law. Maryland enacted the first law to shield newsmen from forced disclosure of confidential sources in 1896. However, only 18 other States have since adopted similar legislation.

Recent court decisions have not clarified the issue. Judicial interpretations of the privilege have varied more during the past year than ever before. As the Wisconsin Supreme Court noted in February of this year, the courts ruling on privilege cases have not found a consistent approach to the problem.

The Supreme Court soon will hear several privilege cases, but it is doubtful that the privilege issue will be resolved. Furthermore, as many courts have observed, only the legislative branch of Government can establish a privilege with requisite specificity.

Thus, I believe that an act of Congress—specifically, the Newsmen's Privilege Act—is the only viable method of insuring a privilege for the Nation's journalists.

As you know, Mr. Chairman, H.R. 4271 is identical to S. 1311 which the distinguished Senator from Kansas is so actively supporting in the Senate. In the House, 52 members have cosponsored the bill. In addition, one similar measure has been introduced.

Briefly, Mr. Chairman, this legislation provides that courts of the United States or other government bodies cannot require a person to disclose any confidential information or the source of any information obtained in his capacity as a journalist.

The privilege does not apply in three instances. First, it is not applicable in defamation cases if the defense is based on the source of information. Second, the source is not privileged if the source has provided a reporter with information required by law to be secret. Third, the privilege may be divested if disclosure is required to prevent a threat to human life, of espionage, or of foreign aggression.

The uncomplicated language of the bill conceals complexities which the committee should examine closely. In my opinion, two areas in particular merit your security.

First, it may be desirable to protect all unpublished information from government subpena. The dangers of government subpena of unused notes, files, and film are distributing regardless of whether or not the information was confidentially obtained.

Second, the exceptions to the privilege should be inspected thoroughly to determine if they can be narrowed or eliminated. Ideally, the privilege should be as nearly absolute as possible, realizing that it must be reconciled with other worthy objectives.

Mr. Chairman, these two points certainly deserve intensive study. However, today I would prefer to focus on the broader concepts of the Newsmen's Privilege Act.

While I believe there are many reasons for adopting the act, let me outline the two most compelling.

First, the Newsmen's Privilege Act will strengthen first amendment guarantees for all Americans. This argument rests on four solid premises.

(a) A free press is the very foundation of our democratic institutions. The most reliable indicator of whether a society strives to be free or totalitarian is the extent to which the press is free: free to investigate, free to criticize, free to publish what it deems fit to publish. The Supreme Court repeatedly has emphasized "the preferred place given in our scheme to the great, the indispensible democratic freedoms secured by the First Amendment."

(b) The First Amendment must always be interpreted to insure that the freedoms it guarantees are protected in modern times. The Amendment does not simply prohibit police from smashing printing presses: it protects indirect abridgement, unintended restraints, and it is not limited to protecting the freedom from any particular way of abridgement. Furthermore, the Court has stated that the people have a first amendment right to receive "the widest possible dissemination of information from diverse and antagonistic sources."

(c) Information received from confidential sources is an integral part of modern newsgathering operations. Every day many newspapers publish articles based primarily on confidential information. Historically, newsmen have used confidential information to expose crime and corruption—particularly in the government. And today confidential information is used in two additional ways: It provides reporters with background information, enabling them to analyze and interpret the news with greater insight and accuracy; and it informs the public about normally inaccessible groups and unfamiliar issues, such as the Black Panthers and the use of drugs.

(d) Without a legal privilege for newsmen, public access to valuable information is imperiled. An individual who reveals confidential information may place his job or even his life in jeopardy. If potential sources cannot be assured that their identities will be protected, they will not give information to reporters. In particular, radical and minority groups are understandably wary of providing information to newsmen without certainty of protection. But the fear of the government subpena is not confined to a few radicals: a number of American journalists and newspapers have instituted policies of destroying film and notes because of the threat of government intrusion. Thus, the government's power to subpena confidential information creates a chilling effect that inevitably jeopardizes the free flow of information to the public.

In summary, the Newsmen's Privilege Act is essential if Americans are to benefit from the First Amendment right to receive "the widest possible dissemination of information * * * ".

Second, the Newsmen's Privilege Act should be enacted because it will help to insure separation between government and the press. When a reporter's notes are subpenaed, in a very real sense he is transformed into an agent of the government—and he certainly is viewed as such by many potential sources of information. Some commentators fear that the press has lost much of its independence already—that the pervasiveness of the government has smothered many reporters' critical perception. If newsmen are viewed as walking wiretap devices, the press is no longer an independent entity, and we all suffer.

The major argument against the establishment of a newsmens' privilege is that it would hinder the search for truth in the courtroom. Two responses to such an argument immediately arise.

First, while all citizens generally are compelled to testify in court, there are exceptions. We strongly support a person's right to plead the fifth, although it unquestionably hinders the search for truth. And courts could quickly determine the truth by compelling attorneys to divulge information from their clients—but society has recognized the value of a confidential lawyer-client relationship. Furthermore, the identities of government informers are generally privileged in the courts. Law enforcement offices often depend on professional informers to furnish them with a flow of information about critical activities, and informers would be subject to risks if their identities were revealed in court.

The identical analysis, of course, can be made for reporters' sources of information.

Second, the power to compel journalists to testify about confidential information does not actually contribute to the search for truth in the courtroom anyway. Reporters frequently accept punishment rather than divulge confidential information. Even if it is assumed that newsmen would testify, however, the argument for the retention of the power to force reporters to reveal information is weak.

If the government does not use its subpena power often, it cannot be argued that such power is vital. Obviously, in the vast majority of cases, the search for truth would not be hindered by the absence of testimonial compulsion.

On the other hand, if the government does use the power frequently, sources will completely dry up. Under these circumstances, the power soon will be useless since reporters would no longer have access to confidential information.

And yet, the chilling effect created by the mere knowledge that the government has the power to subpena newsmen—whether or not it is utilized—is enough to impede the free flow of news.

Mr. Chairman, I introduced H.R. 4271 with the conviction that Congress must acknowledge its responsibility in establishing and defining a national newsmen's privilege. I am convinced that the adoption of the Newsmen's Privilege Act would be a decisive step to insure that freedom of the press will occupy a strong unassailable position in the final decades of this century.

Mr. Chairman, this concludes my statement.

Senator ERVIN. Mr. Whalen, your bill and Senator Pearson's bill are identical, are they not?

Mr. WHALEN. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. Let the record show that a copy of the bill, H.R. 4271, will be included in the record.

I have here a copy of an editorial from the New York Times, dated September 26, 1971, entitled "The Public Sentinel." The editorial points out that there are three conflicting views as to the interpretation which is to be placed on the first amendment.

The first of these views is that which was expressed very elegantly by Justice Black; namely, that the freedom of the press is within the purview of the First Amendment and is absolute. The press is free to print anything.

The second view according to this editorial, is that expressed by the Solicitor General in arguing the case involving the Pentagon Papers on behalf of the Government in the New York Times and the Washington Post cases before the Supreme Court—namely, that there are other competing claims on the part of the Government, and that the Government has a right to prevent the publication of documents which they deem prejudicial to the national interest.

Then the New York Times editorial points out that the proper or possible interpretation of the freedom of press provision of the First Amendment is that expressed by one Prof. Alexander M. Bickel of the Yale Law School, who argued the case for the New York Times. He stated that while the reach of the First Amendment is broad and strong, it is not all-encompassing. A free society's vital interest in an enterprising, uninhibited press has to be reconciled with society's other interests such as effective administration of justice. Congressman Whalen, from your views on this matter, and your study of the issue during the preparation of the bill which you have introduced, have you come to the conclusion that the editorial is correct in stating that there are three schools of thought in this matter?

Mr. WHALEN. I believe so, Mr. Chairmen. I think they are the same as I have pointed out.

Senator ERVIN. I think this editorial should be made available to everybody who is concerned with this bill, so with no objections, I would order that a copy of this be printed in the record at this point.

[From the New York Times, September 26, 1971]

THE PUBLIC SENTINEL

In recent years, press and Government have appeared to be increasingly on a collision course. The Justice Department's attempt to restrain publication of the Pentagon papers and the House Commerce Committee's effort to examine the unused film prepared for a Columbia Broadcasting System documentary both ended in failure, but both were significant efforts by Government to constrict the traditional freedom of the press. Grand juries investigating criminal cases have increasingly resorted to the practice of subpoenaing reporters and their notes in an effort to use the press as an arm of the law.

In the light of the wide uneasiness stirred by these developments, the Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights chaired by Senator Ervin of North Carolina has decided to hold public hearings this week on the present status of the press's liberties. These hearings are certain to bring forward at least three distinct viewpoints with regard to the rights of the press under the First Amendment.

One view is that when the authors of the Bill of Rights wrote that Congress shall make no law abridging freedom of the press, they meant exactly that—no law. In numerous opinions, most recently in his concurrence in the Pentagon papers case, the late Justice Hugo Black vigorously and eloquently argued this absolutist construction. It is a position which commands the support of the American Society of Newspaper Editors and of many civil libertarians.

A conflicting view is that the press's right to publish or broadcast news and opinion is not overriding and that there are competing claims which should take precedence. Thus, the Solicitor General argued in the case of the Pentagon papers that the Government had a right to prevent the publication of documents which it deemed prejudicial to the public interest. Similarly, local prosecutors have contended that newsmen have no right to protect the confidentiality of their news sources if they have knowledge of a criminal act.

In a "friend of the court" brief filed the other day on behalf of The Times and several other newsgathering organizations in a case pending before the Supreme Court involving Times reporter Earl Caldwell, Prof. Alexander M.

Bickel of the Yale Law School sets forth an intermediate position which this newspaper believes is both reasonable and realistic. In essence, he argues that, although the reach of the First Amendment is broad and strong, it is not all-encompassing. A free society's vital interest in an enterprising, uninhibited press has to be reconciled with society's other interests such as the effective administration of justice.

The crucial question is what are the terms on which this necessary accommodation should take place. Such an accommodation is not impossible. Indeed, much of the time of appellate courts is taken up with the sensitive, unremitting work of defining and interpreting means of cushioning valid but conflicting interests. Where a grand jury's right to know contradicts a reporter's right to protect his sources, the problems in need of resolution are comparable to those involved in reconciling freedom of the press and the right of every individual to a fair trial—an area in which considerable progress toward rational guidelines has been made.

The press obviously cannot serve society effectively if it prints only what Government officials say or what private persons want known about their activities. Nor is it likely to serve society effectively if it recognizes no responsibilities in respect to the individual's right to fair trial or if it claims for its agents an absolute immunity from their obligations as citizens.

To do their job, reporters develop sources among radicals or in the underworld or among persons who, though entirely conventional, fear loss of jobs or other harassment if publicly identified. Such relationships would be destroyed—to the detriment of the public—if at the whim of prosecutors, reporters could be forced to become police informants. Only proof of the most overriding and pressing public necessity could justify subpoena of information gathered by newsmen in the performance of their duties.

The First Amendment was not written to protect anyone's career or profits. Those are private concerns. The Constitution protects the press because the press serves a high and essential public interest. When it does its work with courage and enterprise and integrity, the press acts as a sentinel guarding every citizen against tyranny, corruption and injustice. Government itself is also one of society's sentinels but with different and far stronger powers. Citizens are best served when press and Government operate independently in their different ways to defend the public interest.

Senator ERVIN. Now, this statement, which I would think is one of the greatest statements ever made about the overall purpose of the First Amendment, was made by Justice Robert H. Jackson, in West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, 638. Justice Jackson stated:

> The very purpose of a Bill of Rights was to withdraw certain subjects from the vicissitudes of political controversy, to place them beyond the reach of majorities and officials and to establish them as legal principles to be applied by the courts. One's right to life, liberty, and property, to free speech, a free press, freedom of worship and assembly, and other fundamental rights may not be submitted to vote, they depend on the outcome of no election.

Do you concur with Justice Jackson's conclusion, that this is the fundamental principle of the First Amendment?

Mr. WHALEN. I would concur with that, Mr. Chairman.

Senator ERVIN. There can be no doubt that Congress has the power to change the rules of evidence to be used by the Federal courts in the administration of justice.

Mr. WHALEN. Mr. Chairman, I am not an attorney, and I am not as well informed on this particular area. I would certainly presume that Congress has the right to do this within the confines of the Constitution.

Senator ERVIN. That is I think a good statement—as good as any attorney would make. In so far as Federal rules of evidence may be changed, Congress has the authority to do so.

Mr. Whalen. This is correct, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Irvin. And the purpose of your bill is to establish a new rule of evidence.

Mr. Whalen. That is right, to provide the rules that thus far have been lacking.

Senator Ervin. There can be no doubt that the Nation has a vital interest in the gathering and the publication of news.

Mr. Whalen. I think the public has a right to know and I think our news media have done a very excellent job in fulfilling this objective.

Senator Ervin. Now, by the same token, there is no doubt that the Government has an interest in procuring the truth for presentation in the administration of justice.

Mr. Whalen. This is correct, they must also weigh the two objectives.

Senator Ervin. In other words, there are two different principles?

Mr. Whalen. Exactly.

Senator Ervin. Which demand that the press, for the benefit of the people, shall have the right to gather and publish the truth.

Mr. Whalen. That is correct.

Senator Ervin. And the interest of the Government being that of protecting the public, being able to obtain the truth, in connection with trials.

Mr. Whalen. This is correct, Mr. Chairman. Just to illustrate, I might just refer to the case which I cited earlier in my remarks, namely, the Simonton case involving testimony before the House of Representatives. Mr. Simonton had indicated in the New York Times that three Congressmen had taken bribes in land grant cases. As I said earlier, he was called before the House of Representatives, and he refused to disclose his source of information. He was then sentenced by the House of Representatives for refusing to testify.

The first point I would like to make is that had Simonton not written his story, charges never would have been leveled against the three Congressmen.

Second, even though Simonton did not reveal his source, the committee of the House of Representatives, through its own investigative staff, was able to compile sufficient evidence to force the Members to resign.

Thus, truth was obtained despite the fact that Mr. Simonton had not revealed his source of information.

Senator Ervin. It is your view that these two interests, which sometimes come into conflict, should be balanced and that decisive weight should be given to one or the other, depending upon the circumstances. Your contention is that your bill does not absolutely prohibit government from having the benfit of the testimony of the reporter. In other words, your bill provides for a balancing of these conflicting interests.

Mr. Whalen. That is correct. Mr. Chairman. As I indicated, the bills that Senator Pearson and I have introduced do provide for certain exceptions.

As I also indicated in my formal presentation, you and the subcommittee might want to investigate these exceptions in greater depth.

Just as a matter of interest, information from CBS was recently subpenaed by a committee of the House of Representatives, I am not sure if that situation would be covered by this legislation, as it stands now, because the information which CBS refused to release to the committee was given freely.

Senator ERVIN. And your bill only attempts to grant the newsmen this privilege if the information is received by him in a confidential way from his informant.

Mr. WHALEN. That is correct. Although I would like to reiterate that we may want to establish this privilege for all information, regardless of whether the information is confidential or not.

For example, New York State recently passed such a bill which would cover all information, not just confidential information.

Senator ERVIN. That would be like that of an attorney-client relationship, physician-patient——

Mr. WHALEN. That is correct.

Senator ERVIN. Now, someone has suggested there is little difference between granting the privilege to newsmen, and the others to whom one gives this privilege. You would be establishing an attorney-client relationship, where the attorney may serve the client.

Mr. WHALEN. That is correct.

Senator ERVIN. And the physician-patient relationship, in order that the physician may serve the patient, and the priest-penitent relationship, in order that the priest may serve the penitent. And so, it would raise the point that the newsmen are gathering information—not for some benefit [to] his informant, but for the benefit of the public. Now, I take it that your answer would be that the qualified privilege that your bill would establish is in effect establishing the benefit for the public.

Mr. WHALEN. That is correct.

Senator ERVIN. I take——

Mr. WHALEN. And the fact that a profit is being made would not enter into it.

Senator ERVIN. I take it from your statement that you entertain the view that in so far as the profit motive in news gathering and news publication is concerned, it is not the primary purpose of the freedom of the press. It is an incentive, but the overall purpose of the freedom of press would be to serve the people.

Mr. WHALEN. It is designed primarily to serve that purpose, although there is another purpose, that of making a profit.

Senator ERVIN. I am a great champion of the profit motive. There is the old story by Rudyard Kipling: The Germans were having a town meeting, and the suggestion was made that they all start to work for the state. They all agreed. But one old man stood up in the back of the room and said it wouldn't work. He said that they should work for themselves, and that that would be a great enterprise system.

Mr. Baskir, do you have any questions?

Mr. BASKIR. Yes, sir; one question. Do you have any information about the laws enacted by the States with—concerning the freedom of the press?

Mr. WHALEN. Some have argued that law enforcement would be hampered if a national news men's privilege were enacted. However, apparently there has not been any problem with law enforcement in the 19 States which currently have privilege acts.

Mr. Baskir. Thank you.

Senator Ervin. As I construe it, your interpretation is based on the interpretation of the first amendment—made by most courts. Now, there is no doubt that if government tries to put a ban or limitation on freedom of the press by legislation, or on the existence of the freedom of the press—that would be a violation of the first amendment.

Mr. Whalen. That would be my judgment.

Senator Ervin. And that such a decision by the Government would have a "chilling" effect on the willingness of the press and the people to give information—which also would be a violation of the first amendment. Do you agree with that?

Mr. Whalen. I think it depends on your definition of chilling effect. For example, if it does not involve legislative action, I don't know if that would be chilling or not.

Senator Ervin. I think elected officials of the Government have the same freedom of speech as everybody else. I had a group come into see me recently about the Vietnam war—that was in May of last year. I listened to them for about 2 hours and I was very patient with them—besides I am a good listener. When they got through, they said that there were other things that they didn't like, one example being the speeches of Vice President Agnew. I told them that I was a great believer in freedom of the press, speech, and so forth, and that I also extended to Vice President Agnew the right of freedom of speech. I would like to point out that the Founding Fathers were not wise enough to devise any method in which the freedom of speech was given to wise men only. I am going to allow him the tolerance which is required for him to use his freedom of speech.

Mr. Whalen. Mr. Chairman, you use the word tolerance, and I think this is the price that we have to pay for the freedom of speech. We may not agree with what others say or we may not like what they said, but as you pointed out they have the right to say it.

Senator Ervin. It is easy for us to tolerate views which we believe to be sound. Oliver Wendell Holmes said that we hate to listen to ideas that we don't like, but we have to tolerate those ideas in order to enjoy the benefits of freedom.

Mr. Whalen. Yes.

Senator Ervin. Thank you very much.

Mr. Whalen. Thank you. I would like to make one other comment. You referred to the New York Times editorial. I would like to commend you on your remarks in the Sunday Washington Post on the 26th of this month, in which you were quoted—I clipped it out, and I have used it several times in letters and correspondence concerning the first amendment.

Senator Ervin. Thank you, and I think that we have to defend the first amendment in all respects, and——

Mr. Whalen. I am involved in a case, and I don't want to go into the details, but I have found out in the 17 years that I have been a legislator, that one becomes very unpopular when he defends the first amendment.

Senator Ervin. Yes; I have been accused of that. We certainly appreciate hearing your statement on this bill.

Mr. Whalen. Thank you.

Senator Ervin. Would counsel call the next witness.

Mr. Baskir. The next witness is Mr. Harding F. Bancroft, executive vice president of the New York Times, and he is accompanied by Mr. James C. Goodale, vice president, and general counsel.

Senator Ervin. Gentlemen, I am delighted to welcome both of you, and I regret that more members of the subcommittee are not present, but unfortunately every Senator has 10,000 jobs that he must attend to, and he can't get around to all of them. But the record will be made available to all of them and to all others who are interested in this hearing.

STATEMENT OF HARDING F. BANCROFT, EXECUTIVE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE NEW YORK TIMES CO., ACCOMPANIED BY JAMES C. GOODALE, VICE PRESIDENT AND GENERAL COUNSEL

Mr. Bancroft. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

We are pleased to have an opportunity to appear before this subcommittee and present the views of the Times on the important questions which you are considering. Your inquiry comes at a particularly opportune time for the public, and the press and other forms of news media which serve it. The publication of the Pentagon Papers, and the litigation which it occasioned, focused attention in dramatic fashion on the role of a free press in a democratic society.

A hundred years ago this summer, the New York Times was involved in a controversy which has some analogous aspects. In July 1871, the Times was presented—by a confidential source whom it would not and did not reveal—with documents from the office of the comptroller of New York City. The charts, vouchers, receipts, and other materials which we received were published, and the activities of the notorious Tweed ring were thereby exposed to the public.

Of course, such dramatic examples of the vital role played by a truly free press and its struggle to remain free from government interference, are rare. There have been less dramatic episodes occurring with increasing frequency in recent years, which show us that the guaantees of the first amendment must be vigilantly guarded.

We have seen, for example, a substantial increase in subpenas directed to newsmen in all forms of information media for the purpose of compelling disclosure of confidential sources and other confidential information secured in the course of their professional duties.

Thus, although Times' reporters received a total of only five subpenas or demands for documents in the entire period from 1964 through 1967, three were received in 1968, six in 1969, and 12 in 1970. The accelerating pace at which subpenas have been served on the Times has also been the experience of other media. NBC, CBS, and their wholly owned affiliates, in the period from 1969 through July 1971 alone, have been served with more than 123 subpenas.

The problem has been recognized by the President, and the Attorney General has issued guidelines designed to restrict the Justice Department's use of such subpenas.

Of course, neither the President's remarks nor the Attorney General's guidelines have the force of law, even within the Federal system, and the problem still remains one of serious proportions.

I do not believe that it is necessary to present evidence to this subcommittee to demonstrate the absolute necessity for reporters to be able to gather the news free from governmental interference or inhibition; nor to deny the pernicious chilling effect on news gathering that such forced disclosure of confidential sources can have.

Once a reporter is compelled to breach confidences, his sources disappear, sources which insure a truly informative news story rather than one based on official press releases and similar public relations handouts. Indeed, confidential sources are crucial to the profession.

As Arthur Krock has put it:

> Another attribute is peculiarly necessary for this work: a Washington correspondent must keep more rigidly the confidence of news sources, for it is in confidence that much important news is acquired which otherwise would be withheld from the public that has a right to know it. One breach of such faith, and that news source is closed.

That is the end of the quotation.

Mr. Chairman, when these sources disappear, when they dry up by reason of forced disclosure or the possibility of forced disclosures, the first amendment has been eroded, if not directly violated. The reporter's access to news is the public's access to news.

His role, to borrow a phrase from Madison, is that of a sentinel over the public rights.

It must not be constricted in a manner not compatible with our stated profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust and wide open.

That commitment, of course, has its roots deeply set in the first amendment guarantee of freedom of the press.

The courts have recently been called upon to fashion rules designed to protect a journalist's confidences to insure that the integrity of his news gathering and news reporting activities can be preserved. Three such cases involving subpenas directed to newsmen will be heard by the U.S. Supreme Court this year.

United States v. Earl Caldwell involves a New York Times reporter whose stories on the Black Panther Party in San Francisco prompted a Federal grand jury there to subpena him and his notes. Caldwell refused to appear and his refusal was upheld—on constitutional grounds—by the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals. Branzburg v. Hayes involves a reporter for the Louisville Courier-Journal who refused to appear before grand juries seeking to quiz him on stories he had written about marihuana traffic in Franklin County, Ky. The Kentucky Supreme Court affirmed the propriety of the subpenas. And In Re Paul Pappas, a reporter for WTEV, an ABC affiliate in New Bedford, Mass., refused to tell a grand jury about his evening in the Black Panther building in New Bedford. The Massachusetts Supreme Court held that Pappas had to tell all.

The resolution of these cases by the Supreme Court will have an important substantive impact on the news media and their ability to fulfill their first amendment obligations to the public.

There are, of course, differing views among the news media and students of our constitutional processes, as to the extent of the newsman's first amendment privilege. Some argue eloquently for an absolute rule unequivocally barring the Government from obtaining evidence from a newsman by compulsion. Others have urged a firm but not absolute privilege. The argument made by the New York Times in its amicus brief in the Caldwell case, is that a reporter can be compelled to divulge his confidential sources and other confidential information, only if the Government established (i) that the reporter has knowledge of a specific crime under investigation; (ii) that there is no alternative source for the information; and (iii) that there is a compelling and overriding Government interest in the information. This compelling and overriding interest cannot, in our submission, be established unless, at the very least, a major crime is involved.

The reporters privilege has also been the subject of legislative action by at least 17 States, and the State statutes vary considerably with respect to the scope and absoluteness of the privilege granted. However, because of the national nature of much of the news media and the constitutional dimensions which the subpena problem assumes, there is a pressing need for uniformity in the law on the subject. It is to be hoped that the Supreme Court will set forth ground rules that will clarify this important and perplexing question.

We are not convinced, therefore, that Federal legislation at this time is needed. In general, we believe that judicial resolution of difficult constitutional questions involving the Bill of Rights, is more desirable. There is the danger that legislative attempts to define rights under the first amendment may raise more problems than are put to rest and thus prevent the courts from making reasoned determinations based on the particular facts and circumstances of the cases before them.

Should protective legislation become necessary, the Times would urge a statute as broad as that enacted last year by the New York Legislature. This law gives the reporter an absolute privilege against disclosing confidential communications as well as the identity of his news source. This, in our view, would be an effective model for Federal legislation on the subject.

The extent of and the limitations on a reporter's duty to give evidence in court or before a grand jury has been the subject of frequent judicial review and the topic has been widely discussed in books and articles in law reviews and other periodicals. The brief of the New York Times and others as amici curiae in the case of United States v. Earl Caldwell contains a comprehensive bibliography which may be of some interest to this subcommittee. We have supplied copies of our brief to the subcommittee's staff.

I would like now to turn to the problems under the first amendment raised by the publication of the so-called Pentagon papers. So much has been said and written on this subject that I will confine myself to certain aspects which seem to us to be of particular concern to the press.

First, in our opinion, the fact that publication was enjoined for 15 days itself thwarted and subverted the constitutional principle of the freedom of the press.

As the Times stated on its editorial page, the basic reason that impelled the Times to publish the material was that we believed it was in the interest of the people of this country to be informed. Once the material fell into our hands, it was not only in the interest of the American people to publish it, but, even more emphatically, it would have been an abnegation of responsibility and a renunciation of our obligations under the first amendment not to have published it.

Although the Supreme Court ultimately denied the Government's request for a prior restraint, the hard fact remains that for the first time in the history of our nation, the Government sought and obtained a direct suppression of news. Even though the restraint lasted for only 15 days, an extremely unfortunate precedent, we submit, has been established.

Second, the fact that the Government sought and obtained an injunction leaves us with the prospect—despite the Supreme Court decision—that it may seek similar restraints in the future.

The possibility of future attempts by the Government to suppress the news is not good for the country and is a prospect with the Nation's press cannot easily live. It is of first importance that this threat not result in journalistic timidity or unwarranted self-censorship. What Judge Gurfein called a cantankerous press, an obstinate press, a ubiquitous press must, in his words, be suffered by those in authority in order to preserve the even greater values of freedom of expression and the right of the people to know.

But there is the danger that this unfortunate precedent will indeed have a chilling effect on the reporting of sensitive matters and will deter reporters from conducting the kinds of thorough investigations which responsible journalism requires. A reporter who, in the past, routinely checked his facts with Government officials might well think twice before doing so, always fearful that by revealing his knowledge he will put into motion the Government censorship machine.

Third, there are other ways by which the Government can effectively deter publication of facts the public has a right to know. The threat of unjustified criminal prosecution, for example, can be as effective a prior restraint as a pre-publication injunction.

A related issue raised during the Pentagon Papers litigation is the whole problem of the classification of Government documents. There is no doubt that new procedures are needed in order to avoid the unnecessary and arbitrary removal from public scrutiny of so much material that belongs in the public domain. The Pentagon Papers are a valid example of this classification overkill. Nearly all of the contents of the 43 volumes of papers upon which the Times' series was based have now been declassified and delivered to the public printer. Last June they were classified top secret and it was the contention of the Government in its application for a temporary restraining order that "irreparable injury to the national defense" would result if the Times were permitted to continue publication.

What makes the system even more arbitrary is the way in which classified information is routinely "leaked" by Government sources.

Max Frankel, our Washington Bureau Chief, has described the way it works:

> The Government and its officials regularly and customarily engage in a kind of ad hoc, de facto declassification that normally has no bearing whatever on considerations of the national interest. To promote a political, personal, bureaucratic or even commercial interest, incumbent officials and officials who return to civilian life are constantly revealing the secrets entrusted to them. They use them to barter with the Congress or the press, to curry favor with foreign governments and officials from whom they seek information in return. They use them freely, and with a startling record of impunity, in their memoirs and other writings.

Aside from the problem posed by classification and declassification of documents, New York Times reporters have frequently had great difficulty in securing nonsensitive information to which the public is clearly entitled. Actual cases where our reporters have met official resistance have been in respect to such matters as the number of medals awarded to generals in Vietnam, the identities of contractors who are found to have made excessive profits by the Renegotiation Board, reports of Government tests on consumer products, the intercession of Members of Congress in the affairs of administrative and regulatory agencies, and so on.

The Freedom of Information Act was intended to insure that much of this kind of information would be available to the public. The act was hailed by President Johnson as safeguarding the people's right to know. Unfortunately, the high purposes of the act have not in practice been fulfilled. Its passage does not appear to have altered previous notions as to private Government property or deterred Government bureaucrats from routinely denying proper informational request.

Such denials can effectively stymie a reporter's investigation. Ordinarily, there is no time to enter into prolonged negotiations, or litigation, with the agency in question. The initial refusal thus often ends the matter.

We believe that strict and speedy compliance by Government agencies with the Freedom of Information Act is essential in the public interest.

I have tried to touch upon what we consider to be some of the major problems faced by the news media today. Other witnesses—especially those representing the broadcast media—will surely enlarge the list.

The freedom, integrity and independence of the press are facing new challenges, which must be met vigorously. The accretion of Executive power in recent decades gives added emphasis to this imperative if the great purposes of the Constitution are to be sustained. The late Mr. Justice Jackson once observed that these purposes do not depend upon the approval or convenience of those they restrain. Such sentiments cannot be repeated too often, especially at a time when those they restrain believe in good faith that they are acting in the public interest. A warning especially pertinent today was articulated years ago by Mr. Justice Brandeis:

> Experience should teach us to be most on our guard to protect liberty when the Government's purposes are beneficent. Men born to freedom are naturally alert to repel invasion of their liberty by evilminded rulers. The greatest dangers to liberty lurk in invidious encroachment by men of zeal, well-meaning, but without understanding.

That concludes my statement, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Ervin. I want to commend you on the excellence of your statement. As you point out, I think that the great majority of the American people are not against the publication of the Pentagon Papers—and in my study of all the opinions in that case, I am left with a great feeling that some of the things said in those opinions upheld the first amendment.

Mr. Bancroft. Yes, I think the net result of the case was good, in the sense that prior restraints were not permitted. Nevertheless, there does rest the possibility that there may be future restraining orders.

Senator Ervin. I am sure you are familiar with the fact that the people who drafted our Constitution were well-versed in the law and in language. When they wrote freedom of the press into the Constitution, they meant that the press should not have prior restraints. This does not prevent the press being held liable afterwards.

I was very much interested in your observation, that you doubt whether we should at this time support legislation in this field of privilege—generally speaking, at least until the Supreme Court has an opportunity to pass on several pending cases.

Mr. Bancroft. Yes, sir, that is the point. It seems to us that until the Supreme Court reaches a decision—in the Caldwell and other cases, we think that it would be unwise for the Congress to pass legislation until it is known what that decision is.

There may be no need for any legislation at all, if the courts take the extreme view of absolutely no compulsion.

Senator Ervin. Now, Justice Jackson stated in the West Virginia Board of Education case, that the objectives of the Founding Fathers are found right in the First Amendment, and in other provisions of the Bill of Rights. It made these matters dependent upon an interpretation by the courts, and put them beyond the reach of the legislators. When Congress goes into the Bill of Rights, no matter how worthy its purpose, it might have the effect of curtailing the Bill of Rights.

Mr. Bancroft. I don't think there is any doubt with questions on prior restraints. In respect to the privileges of newspaper reporters, not to have to testify in courts, and before grand juries, the legislation can in effect have the result that you don't have to look to the Constitution to get that immunity from testifying, but it can be right in the legislation itself. That is why we think 17 of our States have all ready enacted legislation on the subject.

Senator Ervin. Are you satisfied with the ruling of the circuit court in the Caldwell case?

Mr. Bancroft. Yes, sir. I think the circuit court tried to impose a ruling which meets the competing interest between a reporters news gathering function and the need for successful prosecution in criminal cases, where the information is in the reporters hands is unavailable anywhere else, where it is necessary to get the information from the reporter as a last resort, and where there is a serious crime committed.

Senator Ervin. In this case, the Caldwell case, Caldwell was a black reporter for the New York Times who had specialized to a large degree in writing about the Black Panthers. He had contacts with officers and members of the Black Panthers, and had, after some time, developed so much confidence in many of them, that he would not expose them, but would present their aims fairly, and justly, and that he would not go to the police. In this manner he also built up their confidence in him.

Mr. Bancroft. There was a special facet in the Caldwell case, and that is the fact that he had obtained the confidence of the Black Panthers.

Mr. Caldwell was asked to appear before a grand jury with his notes, and he would not appear. If he had, he would have lost his sources of information, even though he might not have said anything. This is because the Black Panthers would never know what he might have said.

Senator Ervin. The grand jury could be called—a dragnet investigation into the aims and activities of the Black Panthers, and so, they summoned Mr. Caldwell before them. The court placed restrictions on his subpena, which would have excused him from many things, but required him to make an appearance before the grand jury. He was granted certain privileges before the grand jury: He was allowed to have counsel.

Caldwell's position was that if he merely went before the grand jury, even if he gave no testimony whatever, the Black Panthers would be uncertain as to whether or not he had divulged any information to the grand jury, and that this would dry up his sources of information.

Mr. Bancroft. That is correct.

Senator Ervin. So the court held that under the particular circumstances of this case, that it would chill the First Amendment, freedom of the press, to appear before the grand jury.

Mr. Bancroft. That is correct.

Senator Ervin. And I was struck with the very fine opinion, not only the opinion of the court of appeals, but also the district court. The district court held in effect that the Government cannot abridge the First Amendment, unless it is clearly shown that there is a contrary and overriding public interest that cannot be served by any alternative means.

I think one thing is clear, that the reporters must not be made a part of the investigative apparatus of the Government for whatever reason. It would certainly have a very chilling effect upon the capacity of the reporter to gather information from their sources or from anybody—if the people from whom he obtained such information felt the reporter would be or could become a Government agent in some form. This would definitely chill his sources.

Mr. Bancroft. It would not only chill his own sources, it would also chill future situations with other reporters and other groups.

Senator Ervin. And I take it that your position in respect to the First Amendment guarantee of freedom of press would be the same as Justice Black: That the Government should not be permitted to do anything that would have a chilling effect on the published press, unless there was an overriding public interest which demands an exception.

Mr. Bancroft. That is right, sir.

Senator Ervin. As I mentioned when Congressman Whalen was testifying, you also have two interests. The first being that of gathering information of interest to the public and the other being the necessity for the Government to gather information for criminal prosecution. These two interests sometimes collide as they did in the Caldwell case.

Mr. Bancroft. Yes, sir.

Senator Ervin. I must say I agree with what you have said concerning classification. Senator Roth of Delaware introduced a bill, which I have cosponsored, which would establish a commission to study this problem. I think security classification is run into the ground. Through the use of classification, information is not only hidden from the President, but I can assure you, that it is hidden from the legislative branch of Government.

Mr. Bancroft. That was the exact case, Senator, with Senator Fulbright, where he wanted to get a copy of the Pentagon study.

Senator Ervin. This subcommittee started investigating charges that during President Johnson's administration, the military was spying on civilians. It was extremely difficult to get the evidence on formal military intelligence, since it was hidden by security classifications. We would get the information that we needed in some other way. Finally, one person wrote an editorial exposing it. With that information, and with his help, we were able to get many other military agents to come and testify.

Do you have any questions?

Senator Ervin. Counsel has a question.

Mr. Baskir. One of the questions is in relation to the Pentagon papers. It was stated that if these papers were published, it would effect the national security. I was wondering what you thought the danger would be, if any, if you relied on the press to make its own judgment?

Mr. Bancroft. I think our comment, Mr. Baskir, is that the First Amendment decided that the newspapers should have this responsibility. When the question is raised as to who elected us to decide if the Pentagon Papers are a risk to our national security, you can come up with a quick answer that the first amendment did. That is the net result of the provision of the Constitution, that Congress shall not abridge the freedom of the press.

Mr. Baskir. Have you any idea about the frequency of the subpenas since the guidelines were issued by the Attorney General?

Mr. Bancroft. Certainly we thought it was a very good thing that the Attorney General did issue the guidelines. As to their frequency since the guidelines were issued, Mr. Goodale may know.

Mr. Baskir. We have been told, and we don't know how to evaluate this, that since the guidelines have been set, the issuing of subpenas has declined—almost stopped.

Mr. Bancroft. The reason is that the attorneys around the United States don't want to be bothered with going through the Attorney General, so they just don't bother anymore.

Mr. Baskir. If that is the case, the subpenas stopped because of the Attorney General's guidelines. The question then arises about how important the information was that was being sought from the reporter. If it's not important enough to write a letter, it could not have been too important.

Mr. Bancroft. I think that is exactly right. I think when the prosecutors subpenaed the reporter, they were just looking for an easy method of investigation, and that is not the way it ought to be done. The reporters have other functions which they must carry out. Only when there is an overriding demand and a serious crime has been committed, should the reporter have to appear and testify.

Mr. BASKIR. One last question. With respect to classified information—I noticed that the Government Printing Office just released its competing version of the New York Times publication on the Pentagon Papers. I am told there are discrepancies in some of the material that the New York Times published, and also in its articles.

Mr. BANCROFT. I really don't know how, but to answer your first question, we have not had a chance to examine their version, but we will in the future, as for the discrepancies that you spoke about, if we thought that something stated could have an adverse effect on the national security, it was not published but I think if you examined them closely, there will be very few changes.

Mr. BASKIR. I would like to ask you this question, and maybe you feel that you cannot answer because of potential allegations, but obviously your own staff made judgments as to what should be and what should not be contained in your publication of the Pentagon papers.

Mr. BANCROFT. Yes; we did make this decision, as to what should and what should not have been included in the publication. I think I should say that the editors and reporters of the New York Times are not a bad group of men to make such a judgment. They are highly intellectual, very knowledgable and very sophisticated, and if anyone has to make this type of decision, they are a very capable group to do it.

Senator ERVIN. And I think you might add that they are patriotic.

Mr. BANCROFT. I take that for granted, sir.

Mr. BASKIR. Some of the decisions—some of the judgments made were in terms of whether it would effect national security?

Mr. BANCROFT. Exactly.

Mr. BASKIR. And maybe if you have to choose between the judgment of a judge, a reporter or editor, and the United States Government, maybe on the practical basis the best decision for the country is the one that would be made by the editor rather than the courts.

Mr. BANCROFT. I think that would be very often true. The editors—the staff are a very excellent group, and they see the issues before them, and they see all this not only in the light of their own particular jobs but in the broad view, and as I said earlier, the first amendment gives this judgment to the press. The Founding Fathers were content to leave it up to the press to make those decisions. Clearly, a reporter's function is to publish information, but he will bend over backwards in making the judgment not to print anything that would result in the loss of American lives for example in a war situation.

Mr. BASKIR. I expect that you have had considerable experience in this kind of decisionmaking.

Mr. BANCROFT. Yes; there was the example that we had some information about the Bay of Pigs invasion, and we did not publish the information we had in our possession—and later on, President Kennedy expressed the opinion that he wished we had. That was a hindsight view of it—he wished that he had never been engaged in the Bay of Pigs invasion.

Mr. Baskir. It is really a matter of judgment, because you don't know at that moment if it would be a risk to the national security—only with a hindsight. How would you make a really well founded judgment on that?

Mr. Bancroft. When you talk about government action like the Bay of Pigs invasion, it does require some hindsight. But in the normal course, we take everything into consideration that would affect national security. The national interest must also be evaluated when you have some information that is of general public interest. We think that the right of the people to know, and the right of the Congress to know the facts and information that we have in our hands is an important consideration in the decision of the newspaper.

Mr. Baskir. The real problem of injunctions in this area—those seeking injunctions in the national interest—may well be the attempt to protect their own interest, just as with respect to classification.

Mr. Bancroft. That is very true—I think.

Senator Ervin. You have mentioned in your statement, the concern, even though it might be unfounded, of newsmen that they may be subject to subsequent prosecution. This has a deterring effect upon his freedom to inform the public.

Mr. Bancroft. I think there is no doubt about it.

Senator Ervin. I think for the sake of the record that I should read from the court of appeals opinion in the Caldwell case and make it a part of the record. After the Court set out the facts it said,

> We hold that where it has been shown that the public's First Amendment right to be informed would be jeopardized by requiring a journalist to submit to secret Grand Jury interrogation, the Government must respond by demonstrating a compelling need for the witness's presence before judicial process properly can issue to require attendance.

Now, I would submit that this particular narrow holding is in harmony with a number of holdings on the part of the court, to the effect that government cannot infringe upon the freedom of the press or any other first amendment right, unless it can demonstrate a compelling or overriding interest of the public, which outweighs the particular circumstances under the first amendment.

Mr. Bancroft. That is exactly it, there are competing public interests, and——

Senator Ervin. And I would take it, on the whole, you agree with the thought that perhaps in the light of those decisions and interpretations of the first amendment, it is better to leave this as it is in the Constitution, rather than have specific legislation.

Mr. Bancroft. Exactly.

Senator Ervin. Thank you very much for a very fine statement. Would counsel call the next witness.

Mr. Baskir. Mr. Earl Caldwell planned to testify today, but on the advice of counsel, because of the pending litigation before the Supreme Court, he will not appear.

Senator Ervin. I regret that he will not be here to appear, but I would say that the position of his counsel is quite understandable. It is his right under the first amendment to be silent.

Mr. Baskir. Our concluding witness, Mr. Norman E. Isaacs, is editor in residence at the Graduate School of Journalism, Columbia University.

Senator Ervin. We are delighted to welcome you, and we appreciate your willingness to come and give us the benefit of your views with respect to some of the most important questions ever to come up in America.

STATEMENT OF NORMAN E. ISAACS, EDITOR IN RESIDENCE AT THE GRADUATE SCHOOL OF JOURNALISM, COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY

Mr. Isaacs. Thank you, Senator.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the invitation to testify because this is an issue of immense importance to journalism in this country. Because of a broad correspondence and other communication with editors, plus active research into this issue over the past few years, I am convinced that the vast majority of the Nation's newsmen support the concept behind the legislation which you are now studying. It may seem a small point, but I am among many who deplore the titling of any shield law as a "Newsmen's Privilege Act." While it is in the law quite correct as a technical description, many editors wince over any language that would seem to be conferring on the press a special privilege. I am sure your committee will be hearing more about this aspect as these hearings progress and I would only urge at this time your sympathetic consideration of some change in description to eliminate any phrasing that seems to accord newsmen any exemption from the law. What newsmen seek, Mr. Chairman, is what almost all of them consider their right under the First Amendment: The right to gather and report news and be able to maintain a confidence without capricious legal challenge.

There are a few observations I would like to offer concerning Senator Pearson's S. 1311.

The first of these is that I believe sections 2 and 3 have inadvertently overlooked the necessity of including photographers in the listing of those to whom the protection would apply. On countless occasions, a newsman with a camera is as much privy to confidential information as are his colleagues carrying notebooks or tape equipment.

I welcome Representative Whalen's statement that improvements in the bill may well be desirable. In this connection what I also do not find in S. 1311 is any mention of what we of the press consider a major essential in consideration of any such legislation: The protection of notes, tapes, correspondence, lists of private telephone conversations, unpublished photographs, or any similar information that might be used to trace the identification of confidential sources.

There is also question about the impact of the part (2) provision in section 4 of S. 1311—that the protection shall not apply to the sources of any information concerning the details of any grand jury or other proceeding which was required to be secret under the laws of the United States. Any reference to grand jury proceedings brings to newsmen's minds many instances of leaks emanating from such proceedings where such information has been of important value to the public. These, I concede, often have had to do with proceedings sometimes referred to as runaway grand juries or political grand juries. I do not have the data available at this time, but I am certain there have been many times when advance information provided confidentially to newsmen has had the effect of forewarning the public about indictments being prepared that were suspect either of political rigging or pure irresponsibility. To open newsmen in these instances to interrogation and the threat of court confrontation could block off what has been a valuable flow of information both to the public and other governmental officers. I have no desire to draw a parallel with the current episode in Chicago, but I call attention to the fact that the leaking of advance information on grand jury proceedings is widespread. My point in citing the case is simply to emphasize that there often is some value to the public in such information coming into newsmen's hands and I cannot help but express concern over any provision that may make us targets under a shield law definition.

Many editors with whom I have been in contact have offered no objection to provisions calling for Federal court review of what has been referred to in Mr. Caldwell's case as "compelling need." But I have noted some concern expressed over the language in the last two lines of S. 1311, where the phrasing reads "prevent a threat to human life." The concern expressed has been to the effect that this may be too broad for comfort; that it opens the door to many problems relating, for hypothetical example, to the manufacture of automobiles or the production of certain polluting chemicals, which could be construed to have the end effect of constituting threats to human life. Like you, I am quite cognizant of the intent of Senator Pearson in the drafting of this passage and merely submit this thought for further consideration.

Although it relates more directly to still another aspect of your study, I am reminded of the conversation between David Kraslow of the Los Angeles Times and Professor Paul Freund, the distinguished constitutional scholar. They were discussing prior restraint and Professor Freund was expressing the feeling it might be preferable to have Congress enact a statute defining when prior restraint would be permissable and saying any restrictions should be absolutely minimal. When Mr. Kraslow asked if he would be willing to draft such a law, Professor Freund replied, "No, thank you. It would be a very tough thing to do." So it is, Mr. Chairman, in this field of our enterprise. All of us know what it is that is intended. What we need is to find the precisely proper terminology.

Almost every newsman I have known wants everything to be on the record with complete attribution. But we are pragmatic people and recognize that there are many instances when important information can be obtained only by assuring sources of protection from public identification. This, I submit, is particularly true in the relationships between newsmen and public officials. While an adversary relationship generally maintains, as I am convinced it should, it is also a partnership that encompasses confidentiality as a necessary part of the transmission of information. Whether the public is fully aware of this I do not know, but I do know that this partnership has existed all my working life and it has never been more prevalent than it is today. It distresses me to have to urge legislation to protect this kind of mutual trust, but, unlike Mr. Bancroft, I have become convinced it has clearly become necessary because of the threat posed to the newsman's ability to gather information.

The most direct threat has been posed by the issuance of subpenas at the behest of law enforcement officers. All of us in journalism consider this highly dangerous procedure. If the belief were to become widespread that newsmen are required to identify sources and thus serve as auxiliary forces for law enforcement agencies, we can only expect a steady drying-up of news sources. It is my contention that the problems of law enforcement officers would be made all the more difficult and those who govern, either in executive or legislative roles, would be deprived of much information essential for a sound appraisal of public affairs.

In the instance of photographers, I need only point out that this is an exceedingly delicate area because it will serve no good purpose to have those who carry cameras readily recognized as sources of evidence. Our photographic colleagues have suffered attack, injury and the destruction of their equipment in crisis areas these past several years simply because of their visibility and I earnestly urge the same protections for them as for all others who gather news.

You know, of course, that some newsmen oppose the concept of bills like S. 1311 on the ground that journalism's first amendment protection is absolute and who contend that any legislation would be counterproductive in the sense it would place limits on our constitutional rights. Many of these men, I believe, are now worried about these matters because of the Supreme Court's ruling on the Pentagon papers. When it comes to prior restraint, I have been, and remain, absolutist myself, and like so many other newsmen, find myself deeply disturbed over the import of some of the opinions.

Dr. Thomas I. Emerson, Lines professor of law at Yale University, has made the statement that the opinions of five members of the Court "seriously undermined" the doctrine against prior restraint. Professor Lines further has asserted that the Court did nothing to advance the doctrines of the right to know. He took occasion to stress the two components of this doctrine: the public's right and the legislature's right. With Professor Lines, I agree that some legal principles in this area need to be developed if our democratic society is to grow.

As matters stand, I am not certain any of us really know how much damage has been done to the press's freedom of action as the result of the opinions entered in the case of the Pentagon papers. Clearly, we are unsettled by all that has transpired. I would project the thought that if important governmental information were to be leaked tonight to a newspaper or broadcast station, there would be what we can only term agonizing appraisal given as to the risks involved. I frankly prefer the days when we felt free to publish and accept the consequences. But this administration's pressure on journalism has been so persistent and covered so much territory that I am afraid much of our traditional forthrightness has been eroded. If the administration actually had a planned campaign for intimidating the press, I am sad to concede that it has had its effect on all too many in the news media.

One other lesser issue, Mr. Chairman, and I will desist. I gathered that you might be interested in whatever views I hold on the problem of the issuance of press credentials by local police departments. There have been repeated protests about some police departments which have refused to issue such credentials to certain arms of communications, such as the underground press or to collegiate journalists. Certainly, there are problems in the indiscriminate issuance of police press credentials. Indiscriminate issuance has the effect of creating mob coverage, thereby obstructing, rather than aiding justice. At the same time, it seems clear there should be no political judgments made by local police departments as to which agency of the press should be granted credentials, and which not. In the eyes of journalism, all the branches have equal rank as observers of the scene and it is unseemly for police departments to assume the role of community censors as to who, and who shall not, have the oppportunity to report public events.

What all of us seek so earnestly is to be of honorable service to the society. The news media is a restless and difficult force; it is always a constant and visible target. We of the press need to improve our standards constantly, and we need the assistance of public officials in helping to see that we are not restricted or punished for seeking the truth about the public business.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Ervin. You frankly take the position that under no circumstances should there be a prior restraint on news.

Mr. Isaacs. Frankly, I take that position.

Senator Ervin. This is the same viewpoint as Justice Black and Justice Douglas set forth. I followed with interest the Pentagon Papers arguments. Professor Alexander M. Bickel, counsel for the New York Times, contended that there could be a case for prior restraint in certain circumstances such as where publications could jeopardize a pending troop movement or something of that nature. Would you care to comment on that?

Mr. Isaacs. We have had prior voluntary restraints in those areas, Mr. Chairman, and there are several episodes in American journalistic history concerning voluntary restraints under stress conditions. I have always been struck by the fact that this country was able to build the atom bomb, which included the vast installation at Oak Ridge. This covered a very large area and was known to a great many people, yet without the Government saying a word, not a single word of this development appeared in any form of communication in the country.

Whenever the country has been at war, the press has been quick to accept intelligent rules of procedure. I think that basically, the record is very good on this score. When the country's security has been at stake, the press has not been found wanting. But on other issues, such as these we have been discussing, the amount of classification is tremendous. Clearly, as Mr. Justice Stewart pointed out, when everything is classified, then nothing is classified. And we have the call of——

Senator Ervin. In other words, if I interpret your position correctly, you believe, from a legal standpoint, there should be no prior restraint on the publication of news. You feel that the record of the past shows that the press has accepted the responsibility, and has imposed voluntary restraints on itself in the interest of the Nation. And it is also your opinion that this is a better safeguard than trying to impose prior restraint.

Mr. ISAACS. Yes, sir, I do feel this way.

Senator ERVIN. And you do take the position that the Nation has never suffered any ill consequences of any importance, as a result of leaving this matter to be handled by the press itself, and that the press has taken a responsible position.

Mr. ISAACS. Well, as you well know, the press is always cantankerous, and is sometimes wrong.

Senator ERVIN. I take it that you accept and entertain the view that with every freedom, including the freedom of the press, there are errors made, and——

Mr. ISAACS. Yes, sir, I accept the press with all its flaws, and it has many.

Senator ERVIN. Now, on page 6, you state—"I frankly prefer the days when we felt free to publish and accept the consequences." Now, there are two ways that the Government could intimidate the press, one by the imposition of prior restraints, and secondly, by punishment. What is your opinion as to the punishment?

Mr. ISAACS. I take a broader viewpoint, Senator. I doubt these hearings would be taking place were it not for the extraordinary amount of pressure put upon the press through constant accusation and public complaint. It is worth noting that Vice President Agnew's role in this drumfire of criticism goes on and on. Only last month at the conclusion of his trip, he complained personally to a Christian Science Monitor reporter about the coverage and his press secretary made charges of sloppy, rotten reporting about the tour, singling out Life and Newsweek. Reading this morning's Times I am struck anew by the Vice President's attack on the news coverage of Attica. The Vice President's remarks on the Attica tragedy overlook the fact that those covering the news were entirely dependent on official sources for factual information. That this information proved to be false in many instances seems to me to indicate a need for the examination of official conduct rather than a simplistic, onesided attack on a press corps misinformed and misled—or let me use a less polite word, Mr. Chairman—lied to. I can only consider this another broadside from an administration determined to lower the public regard for the press and to seek to create a public mood by which the news media can be forced into a subservient role. I would point out that the great escalation in the issuance of subpenas came under this administration, and it took some little time and widespread protest before Mr. Mitchell issued his guidelines. Most important, it seems to me, is the fact that this is the first administration in the Nation's history to challenge through the courts what we have always considered the constitutional protection against prior restraint. I have not yet seen the text of the report, but only yesterday the latest issue of the Editor & Publisher carried a digest of a report prepared by the Washington news committee of the Associated Press managing editors that asserts "no President in modern times has so consciously isolated himself from the press" as President Nixon. There is, I fear, a deep hostility on the President's part toward the press and I do not consider it healthy either for the political life of the country or for a sanguine period ahead for the Nation's news media.

Senator Ervin. Would it be too extreme to say that the history of the relationship between government and the press shows that the government has, on many occasions, used the press for the purpose of manufacturing news, and presenting its opinions in the best possible light; and second, that on some occasions the government manifests a threat to the freedom of the press.

Mr. Isaacs I think that is fair—I think that is correct.

Senator Ervin. The Chief Justice, in the 17th century, stated that it was absolutely necessary for government to enjoy a good relationship with its subjects, and the press was punished if they did anything, even tell the truth, which would have the effect of embarrassing the government.

Mr. Isaacs. Everyone, you know, believes in truth in the news, factual presentation, if you will. This is, of course, until that moment that the news seems to attack his role as union leader, corporation executive, political leader, doctor, lawyer, butcher, baker. At that point, we are adjudged to have ceased to be objective and we are under pressure. Our role in the society is to resist this kind of pressure—to try to assemble the facts as honestly as we can, and write them as honestly as we can.

Senator Ervin. But it is a layman's instinct, that when a man says something we don't like, we all try to find some way to keep him from saying it.

Mr. Isaacs. I am not trying to prevent the vice president from saying what he wishes. I agree with you that he has every right to say what he will. What I object to are the constant references from such a high public official to the elite press of the east coast, references seeming to suggest that we band together at the Algonquin and try to lead the Nation astray. I repeat that the vast majoriy of reporters cover the news as fairly as they can and I hate——

Senator Ervin. The First Amendment secures freedom of press and freedom of speech. Thereby we may say whatever we want.

Mr. Isaacs. That is correct.

Senator Ervin. And what is said may not be pleasing to the government or not pleasing to a majority of our citizens, but we can't limit ourselves to a specific group.

Mr. Isaacs. That is correct.

Senator Ervin. And so, to paraphrase Thomas Jefferson, the reason that the First Amendment was given to our country, was to insure that all people would have the freedom of speech, freedom of press—and so forth. Jefferson said that we must tolerate the freedom of everybody so that we all could enjoy it.

Mr. Isaacs. I subscribe to that all the way.

Senator Ervin. I would just like to thank you once again for appearing before this committee and giving us a very fine statement.

Mr. Isaacs. Thank you, Senator.

Senator Ervin. I would like to place the prepared statement of Senator Pearson and the Justice Department's memorandum "Guidelines for Subpenas to the News Media" at this point in the record.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR JAMES B. PEARSON, REPRESENTATIVE OF KANSAS

Mr. Chairman, Members of the Subcommittee: I am honored and pleased to have this opportunity to discuss the condition of Freedom of the Press in modern America. After some introductory remarks on the significance of the First Amendment's "Free Press" guarantee, I will devote the balance of my statement to an advocacy of the Newsmen's Privilege Act of 1971, which I introduced on March 23rd. This legislation, I am proud to report has been cosponsored by Senators Anderson, Brooke, Church, Cranston, Eagleton, Fulbright, Griffin, Humphrey, Mansfield, McIntyre, Moss, Pell, Percy, and more than fifty Members of the other body.

I believe that enactment of the Newsmen's Privilege is a precondition to the unfettered dissemination of the news. Thus, I believe this legislation is required by the First Amendment to the Constitution.

Before proceeding with my statement, let me observe respectfully that these hearings are convened as the nation mourns the passing of one of the greatest defenders of free expression to live in this century.

Mr. Justice Hugo Black had a resolute faith in the good sense of the people. This faith reinforced the strong conviction that full and free discussion is an essential element of democracy. Mr. Justice Black observed, "Undoubtedly, a governmental policy of unfettered communication of ideas does entail dangers. To the Founders of this Nation, however, the benefits derived from free expression were worth the risk."

The press must be free—wholly free— to report on the human condition in America, on the conduct of public officials, on the strengths and weaknesses of this society. Mr. Justice Black recognized that "freedom of the press," as it is understood in the light of the First Amendment, is a liberty required by all the people. The term does not connote a privilege of a particular occupational group. Because democracy itself depends upon uninhibited public discussion of public events, Mr. Justice Black defended press freedom with a vigor seldom witnessed in this vigorous country. We are all deeply in his debt.

I. Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press . . .

The papers of James Madison reveal that on September 12, 1787, the State delegations to the Federal Constitutional Convention rejected unanimously a motion to draft a Bill of Rights. The several State Declarations of Human Rights were not to be repealed, it was argued; and moreover, Congress could be trusted to respect the liberties of the people.

Two days later, Charles Pinckney moved to insert the declaration that "the liberty of the press shall be inviolable." Those opposing this language contended that the State Bills of Rights were adequate to protect the press, that the power of Congress did not extend to the press, and that Congress could be trusted. The proposition failed, seven votes to four. The precedent thus established, however, failed even to survive the First Congress.

The Federal Constitution was ratified in due time, but not without serious reservations. The Virginia Assembly, for example, recommended as necessary to the proposed Charter "a Declaration or Bill of Rights asserting and securing from encroachment the essential and unalienable Rights of the People." Representatives in the First Congress assembled with a mandate from three million constituents: the rights, liberties and immunities of free men had to be made more secure. Nothing less than a Federal Bill of Rights would be acceptable.

Representative James Madison, not yet thirty years of age, served as floor manager in the House. Under his leadership, a Bill of Rights—based upon the Virginia Declaration of 1776—was approved by Congress and, ultimately, by the several States.

There is no question that the Founding Fathers appreciated the significance and fundamental importance of the First Amendment "free press" guarantee. The Virginia Declaration of Rights, in Article XII, stated "That the Freedom of the Press is one of the greatest Bulwarks of Liberty, and can never be restrained but by despotic Governments." Madison wrote that "popular government without popular information or the means of acquiring it is but a prologue to a farce or tragedy or perhaps both."

Dr. Ben Franklin could hardly forget that his brother, James, had been summarily jailed for a month after suggesting editorially, that the Massachusetts Assembly was soft on crime.

Perhaps Thomas Jefferson captured the contemporary passion for press freedom when he remarked, "Were it left to me to decide whether we should have a government without newspapers or newspapers without a government, I should not hesitate to prefer the latter."

The framers of the First Amendment had the benefit of the recently published work. Blackstone's Commentaries on the Law of England. Sir William had set forth the following common law definition of press freedom:

"The liberty of the press is indeed essential to the nature of a free state; but this consists in laying no previous restraints upon publication, and not in freedom from censure for criminal matter when published. Every free man has an undoubted right to lay what sentiments he pleases before the public: to forbid this is to destroy the freedom of the press; but if he publishes what is improper, mischievous, or illegal, he must take the consequences of his own temerity."

Blackstone's attitude toward press freedom, reflecting the English common law, was embraced as United States law by those who secured passage of the Sedition Act of 1798. This Act made it a Federal crime to engage in "false, scandalous and malicious" criticism of public officials.

Madison wrote a scathing denunciation of the Sedition Act, basing his attack on First Amendment grounds: "This idea of the freedom of the press can never be admitted to be the American idea of it: since a law inflicting penalties on printed publications, would have a familiar effect with a law authorizing previous restraint on them. It would be a mockery to say, that no law should be passed, preventing publications from being made, but that laws might be passed for punishing them in case they should be made."

Thus Madison articulated, for the first time, a doctrine that is hornbook law today: the First Amendment cannot tolerate governmental action which has a "chilling effect" on the unfettered communication of ideas. Only in the most compelling circumstances, involving the survival of life or the State itself, is a competing State interest permitted to override First Amendment liberties.

The most naked form of press censorship—the licensing of books and other publications—was declared illegal by Parliament in 1694 as an unacceptable "prior restraint" on the dissemination of the news. Public nuisance laws which would restrain publication of "offensive" material were declared unconstitutional in Near v. Minnesota. The Supreme Court, however, withheld authoritative comment on the Sedition Act until 1964. In New York Time Co. v. Sullivan, the Court said, "Although the Sedition Act was never tested in this Court, the attack upon its validity has carried the day in the court of history. Fines levied in its prosecution were repaid by Act of Congress on the ground that it was unconstitutional."

For decades the Supreme Court has asserted—and reasserted—the preemptive position of the First Amendment. Statements such as the following, from Bridges v. California, are characteristic: "The First Amendment does not speak equivocally. It prohibits any law 'abridging freedom of speech, or of the press.' It must be taken as a command of the broadest scope that explicit language, read in the context of a liberty-loving people, will allow."

Mr. Justice Brennan acknowledged the special protection which must be accorded First Amendment freedoms to assure their survival: "These freedoms are delicate and vulnerable, as well as supremely precious in our society. The threat of sanctions may deter the exercise almost as potently as the actual application of sanctions."

In my view, Mr. Chairman, freedom of the press continues to be the sine qua non of men who would govern themselves. And never have the demands for a truly free press, or the demands upon newsmen themselves, been more compelling than at this time of increasing social awareness and alienation of large segments of the population. In its statement to the American people, the President's Commission on Campus Unrest observed:

"The crisis on American campuses has no parallel in the history of the nation. This crisis has roots in divisions of American society as deep as any since the Civil War. The divisions are reflected in violent acts and harsh rhetoric, and in the enmity of those Americans who see themselves as occupying opposing camps. Campus unrest reflects and increases a more profound crisis in the nation as a whole."

No American can fail to view this commentary as profoundly troubling. Viable bridges of communication must span the gulf of fear and distrust which has separated too many for too long. The press, of course, is the primary medium of communication. Its contacts with those elements of society must jealously be guarded as the "last best hope" for peaceful resolution of the crisis which pervades the nation.

II. The First Amendment requires a reporter-informant privilege

Because the lines of communication between dissident elements of society must be kept open to preserve domestic tranquillity, the Congress and the courts must be vigilant to insure that vestiges of governmental action which have a "chilling effect" on Freedom of the Press are eradicated. The dissemination of news is the primary obligation of newsmen. But newsmen cannot meet this obligation without full opportunity to gather newsworthy information from confidential sources. The gathering of pertinent information prior to publication constitutes an inseparable and indispensable phase of the overall news effort. It is axiomatic that there can be no dissemination of information without collection of information. Therefore, unreasonable governmental interference with the collection of newsworthy information is inimical to a free press.

There is ample authority to support this basic premise. The courts have recognized that all legitimate activities incidental to dissemination of the news must be protected if freedom of the press is to remain inviolate. These activities include, specifically, the gathering of the news.

In order to gather information effectively, the reporter must seek out sources to provide information for publication. The importance of these sources cannot be overemphasized. As the Supreme Court has suggested, the First Amendment "rests on the assumption that the widest possible dissemination of information from diverse and antagonistic sources is essential to the welfare of the public, (and) that a free press is a condition of a free society."

For reasons which are entirely personal, citizens often wish to convey information to the public while maintaining anonymity. The informant's motivation for disclosure, be it avarice or a high sense of civic duty, is usually unimportant to the public which generally has an overriding interest in acquiring an informant's information, not his identity. The press has played an historic role as an intermediary for confidential news sources, and that role is central to the First Amendment concept of a free press.

Newsmen, famous and obscure, skilled and inexperienced, maintain that confidential courses are important contributors of worthwhile information and that most confidential sources will refuse to contribute further if exposed. Walter Cronkite, News Correspondent with CBS News, has made the following statement:

"The material that I obtain in privacy and on a confidential basis is given to me on that basis because my news sources have learned to trust me and can confide in me without fear of exposure . . . I certainly could not work effectively if I had to say to each person with whom I talk that any information he gave me might be used against him."

Mr. Chairman, the statement of Mr. Cronkite reflects the collective judgment of the press. Recognizing that informants need assurance that their identities will not be compromised, the American Newspaper Guild adopted a Code of Ethics which, in Canon 5 states: "That newspapermen shall refuse to reveal confidences or disclose sources of confidential information in court or before judicial or investigating bodies . . ."

The Newsmen's Privilege Act of 1971 should be enacted to resolve a conflict among the United States Courts of Appeals in a manner consistent with the fundamental and supremely important free press guarantee of the First Amendment.

This legislation provides that newsmen shall not be required by any court, grand jury, agency, department, or commission of the United States, or by either House of Congress, to disclose any confidential information obtained by them in their capacity as newsmen. The bill further provides that newsmen shall not be required to disclose the source of any information received in a professional capacity.

Under this proposal, the newsmen's privilege to maintain the confidentiality of his news sources is subject to reasonable qualifications: First, the privilege does not apply to the source of any allegedly defamatory information in a case where the defendant, in a civil action for defamation, asserts a defense based upon the source of such information. Second, the privilege shall not apply to the source of any information concerning the details of any grand jury or other proceeding which was required to be secret under the laws of the United States. Finally, the bill establishes procedures for divesting the privilege when there is substantial evidence that disclosure of information held confidential by the newsman is required to prevent a threat to human life, of espionage, or of foreign aggression.

Mr. Chairman, the Newsmen's Privilege Act is of special significance to me, because it was first introduced in Congress by one of my distinguished predecessors, the late Senator Arthur Capper. Senator Capper served Kansas and the Nation for 40 years in the seat which I now have the honor to occupy. As owner and publisher of the Topeka Daily Capital, Capper's Farmer, Capper's Weekly, Household Magazine, and other publications, as well as owner of two radio stations, Mr. Capper understood as few men do the particular requirements of the press and the reading public.

Senator Capper's bill, introduced as S. 2175 on October 30, 1929, exempted newspapermen from testifying with respect to the sources of confidential information obtained in the course of newsgathering. The only exception to the privilege involved information held by newsmen on acts of treason.

The issue presented by the Newsmen's Privilege Act was an important one in 1733, when John Peter Zenger began publication of the New York Weekly Journal. Zenger was charged with making "false, scandalous, malicious and seditious publication" of information critical of the Governor of the Province. He chose jail rather than reveal his confidential sources.

The issue remains an important one today. Dozens of cases have been collected, both reported and unreported, in which newsmen have been cited for contempt because they have insisted that the identity of their sources is privileged information.

Mr. Chairman, I am convinced that newsmen have a constitutional right to keep confidential their sources of information. It is a curious state of affairs when newsmen, in exercising their right to be a part of a "free press," must, from time to time, serve terms in prison for contempt of court. I believe the exercise of a constitutional right cannot be contemptuous of Federal courts, or any other arm of the Federal Government. The Newsmen's Privilege Act of 1971 will serve to perfect the promise our Founding Fathers made, that men cannot be free without a free and uninhibited press to serve them.

III. Department of Justice guidelines, recent Federal court decisions, and State action to create a newsmen's privilege.

The Honorable John N. Mitchell, Attorney General of the United States, delivered a major address on freedom of the press before the House of Delegates, American Bar Association, on August 10, 1970, the Attorney General discussed "the current controversy involving subpoenas to the press media for information that may be of some use in court proceedings."

"This is one of the most difficult issues I have faced as Attorney General," Mr. Mitchell admitted. "It is difficult constitutionally and it is difficult administratively." The Attorney General correctly stated that the Supreme Court has never held newsmen to have a First Amendment right to protect their confidential sources of the news. Nevertheless, he took the opportunity to announce "Department of Justice Guidelines for Subpoenas to the News Media," which I am submitting as an Appendix to these remarks.

The First Guideline states, "The Department of Justice recognizes that compulsory process in some circumstances may have a limited effect on the exercise of first amendment rights."

The Guidelines are considered by the Department as an "interim measure." Attorney General Mitchell called for an "immediate and comprehensive study of the fair trial-free press issue as it affects the controversy over subpoenas to the press."

And the Attorney General concluded, saying he "would not oppose legislation granting some form of reporter-informant privilege." That legislation, Mr. Chairman, is before your Subcommittee at this time. Because the Congress is equipped to balance the interests of the First Amendment against the interests of the United States in the administration of justice, no less than the courts, I urge that the Newsmen's Privilege Act be considered carefully for favorable Congressional action.

The United States District Court for the Northern District of California, and the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, held recently in the case of Earl Caldwell that newsmen have a First Amendment right to protect from grand jury inquiry their confidential sources of the news. This holding has not been appealed by the Government to the United States Supreme Court. Writ of Certiorari was granted by the Supreme Court to decide whether Caldwell—a newsman who has contacts in the Black Panther Party—may be compelled constitutionally to appear before the grand jury at all.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, it cannot go unnoticed that seventeen States have adopted, by statute, a newsmen's privilege to protect from forced disclosure confidential sources and—in some instances—confidentially-held information. There is ample precedent for such legislation, therefore, and in those States where the privilege has been effective for a number of years, there is no evidence to indicate that law enforcement officials and prosecutors have been hamstrung in ferreting out crime.

Attorney General Mitchell's second Guideline asserts, "The Department of Justice does not consider the press 'an investigative arm of the government.'" This is an entirely appropriate expression of policy, but its enforcement depends upon discretion within the Department. Freedom of the press to gather news cannot rest upon the discretion of transitory public officials, regardless of good faith efforts to restrain more zealous subordinates. In seventeen States, Mr. Chairman, legislation has been adopted to insure that the press does not, in fact, become an unwilling "investigative arm" of the Government.

The press cannot serve as an investigative organization for two masters: the Government and the public. Government has the means to hire its own investigators and informers. The public, in the final analysis, must depend upon the press.

For 180 years under the First Amendment mandate, the public has been served tolerably well. We have an opportunity, in this Congress, to perfect First Amendment press freedom. I believe it is our duty to grasp that opportunity.

Thank you.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D.C., September 2, 1970.

Subject: Guidelines for Subpoenas to the News Media.
To All United States Attorneys,

The following guidelines for subpoenas to the news media are quoted from the address "Free Press and Fair Trial: The Subpoena Controversy" by the Honorable John N. Mitchell, Attorney General of the United States, before the House of Delegates, American Bar Association, at St. Louis, Missouri, on August 10, 1970.

WILL WILSON,
Assistant Attorney General,
Criminal Division.

First: The Department of Justice recognizes that compulsory process in some circumstances may have a limiting effect on the exercise of First Amendment rights. In determining whether to request issuance of a subpoena to the press, the approach in every case must be to weigh that limiting effect against the public interest to be served in the fair administration of justice.

Second: The Department of Justice does not consider the press "an investigative arm of government." Therefore, all reasonable attempts should be made to obtain information from non-press sources before there is any consideration of subpoenaing the press.

Third: It is the policy of the Department to insist that negotiations with the press be attempted in all cases in which a subpoena is contemplated. These negotiations should attempt to accommodate the interests of the grand jury with the interests of the news media.

In these negotiations, where the nature of the investigation permits, the government should make clear what its needs are in a particular case as well as its willingness to respond to particular problems of the news media.

Fourth: If negotiations fail, no Justice Department official should request, or make any arrangements for, a subpoena to the press without the express authorization of the Attorney General.

If a subpoena is obtained under such circumstances without this authorization, the Department will—as a matter of course—move to quash the subpoena without prejudice to its rights subsequently to request the subpoena upon the proper authorization.

Fifth: In requesting the Attorney General's authorization for a subpoena, the following principles will apply:

A. There should be sufficient reason to believe that a crime has occurred, from disclosures by non-press sources. The Department does not approve of utilizing the press as a spring board for investigations.

B. There should be sufficient reason to believe that the information sought is essential to a successful investigation—particularly with reference to directly establishing guilt or innocence. The subpoena should not be used to obtain peripheral, non-essential or speculative information.

C. The Government should have unsuccessfully attempted to obtain the information from alternative non-press sources.

D. Authorization requests for subpoenas should normally be limited to the verification of published information and to such surrounding circumstances as relate to the accuracy of the published information.

E. Great caution should be observed in requesting subpoena authorization by the Attorney General for unpublished information, or where an orthodox First Amendment defense is raised or where a serious claim of confidentiality is alleged.

F. Even subpoena authorization requests for publicly disclosed information should be treated with care because, for example, cameramen have recently been subjected to harassment on the grounds that their photographs will become available to the government.

G. In any event, subpoenas should, wherever possible, be directed at material information regarding a limited subject matter, should cover a reasonably limited period of time, and should avoid requiring production of a large volume of unpublished material. They should give reasonable and timely notice of the demand for documents.

These are general rules designed to cover the great majority of cases. It must always be remembered that emergencies and other unusual situations may develop where a subpoena request to the Attorney General may be submitted which does not exactly conform to these guidelines.

Senator ERVIN. The subcommittee will meet tomorrow in room 1202, New Senate Office Building, at 10 a.m. This committee stands in recess until that time.

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 1971

U.S. SENATE,
OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to notice, at 10 a.m., in room 1202, New Senate Office Building, Senator Sam J. Ervin, Jr., presiding.

Present: Senator Ervin and Senator Kennedy.

Also present: Lawrence M. Baskir, Chief Counsel, and Bill Pursley, Counsel.

Senator ERVIN. The subcommittee will come to order.

Today the Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights continues its hearings on the subject of freedom of the press.

One of the important purposes of these hearings is an examination of the first amendment implications of government regulation of the broadcast media. Great confusion surrounds the Federal statutes, regulations, and the few court decisions which affect broadcasting. In the course of these hearings, we will consider the rationale, the operation and the impact of this system of government regulation of broadcasting. One of our witnesses today is uniquely qualified to assist us in this effort.

In view of the suspicion and fear which surrounds the relationship between the executive branch and the press, it is also the purpose of these hearings to examine the reasons underlying this suspicion and fear and the consequences of such a situation to the gathering and reporting of news.

For these reasons, it was thought desirable to invite Mr. Herb Klein, Director of Communications for the executive branch, to testify. In my judgment, Mr. Klein would be able to assist greatly the subcommittee in examining the reasons for the antagonism and hostility which have developed between the present administration and the press, and also to remove some of the misunderstandings that have fostered this situation.

Unfortunately, Mr. Klein has informed me that he will not be able to testify. Mr. Klein wrote "as a member of the immediate staff of the President, I must respectfully decline the invitation to testify." His decision not to appear seems to reflect a tendency on the part of the executive branch to assert a form of executive privilege even when it is not necessary, and even when it is detrimental to the interests of the administration. We invited Mr. Klein to testify because many questions have been raised about the administration's attitude toward the press. We wish to give the administration an opportunity to respond to the charges that have been made against it, and to provide the administration with a forum to present its side of the controversy. A dialogue requires both points of view, and a major purpose of these hearings—to try to eliminate the distrust and animosity that exists between the administration and the press—will not be accomplished if one side refuses to present its views. I am mindful of the importance the administration attaches to executive privilege, but I do not think it requires that all invitations to testify—even friendly invitations—be turned down. It should not preclude a voluntary appearance before a Senate committee.

I hope Mr. Klein or another representative of the administration will take advantage of this opportunity to improve the country's understanding of the administration's attitudes and policies in the area of public information and freedom of the press.

Counsel, call the first witness.

Mr. Baskir. The Honorable Ogden R. Reid, a representative in Congress from the 26th Congressional District of New York.

STATEMENT OF HON. OGDEN R. REID, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE 26TH CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK

Senator Ervin. Congressman Reid, I am delighted to welcome you to the subcommittee. We appreciate your willingness to appear and to express your views on this subject.

Mr. Reid. Thank you.

Mr. Chairman, may I say that I am honored and delighted to have this opportunity to appear before your distinguished subcommittee this morning to share with you briefly my thoughts on the vitally important subject of freedom of the press. There is hardly a more relevant or timely inquiry before any committee of the Congress, and I commend you, Mr. Chairman, for your strong leadership in calling these hearings. I noted a speech of yours recently before the Association of American Publishers, and one paragraph of which sums up the Founding Fathers as saying that we must have a freedom of the press. I would like to commend you for your constant concern with civil liberties in this country; we all owe you a debt of gratitude for this service.

Senator Ervin. Thank you very much.

Mr. Reid. Mr. Chairman, as events in recent months have forcefully demonstrated, the press today is under the most serious attack upon it in our history. Aside from a great volume of rhetoric on the part of certain well-known government figures, the press has faced and is facing a number of specific legal actions in which its right to function without restriction is being challenged. These include the suit by the Government to enjoin the New York Times and the Washington Post from publishing the Pentagon Papers, the CBS subpena matter in the House of Representatives, the FCC notice to broadcasters last March warning against the indiscriminate airing of songs with drug-related lyrics, and several cases involving the subpenaing of news reporters' notes.

I am delighted also, Mr. Chairman, that you will hear testimony this morning from Dr. Frank Stanton, who I think should, as president of Columbia Broadcasting System, have considerable knowledge of the Constitution, and who by his standing up to what I consider a nonconstitutional subpena by the House, has made our liberty more secure. I think his actions reaffirmed that which has been clear from the outset, that TV outtakes enjoy the same protection as reporters' notes and that both are covered by the first amendment. The fact that they were not mentioned specifically in the first amendment is merely an accident that they were not invented at that time. But I am delighted that Mr. Stanton is here this morning.

Of all the great constitutional questions raised by these actions, none is more fundamental than that of prior restraint upon publication. And in my judgment, no conceivable restriction upon the press is more dangerous than prior restraint. The gravity of its invocation in the Pentagon Papers case is underscored by the fact that this was the first time in nearly 200 years of history that the Federal Government sought to restrain a newspaper in advance from publishing, and only once, in the case of Near v. Minnesota, has a state obtained such an injunction. In the Pentagon papers case, this precensorship was claimed to be justified because of "immediate grave threat to national security."

In ordering the injunction against the newspapers lifted, the Supreme Court held that the Government failed to meet its "heavy burden of showing justification for the enforcement of such a restraint." Reading the opinions of the Justices, it would appear unlikely that the Government will soon, if ever, successfully invoke prior restraint.

There are others who have a different view. But whatever effect the Supreme Court decision will have, it is unfortunate the chilling effect that continues over the press of our country, resulting from the possibility that this Government, or any other government, may threaten or in fact seek to utilize prior restraint.

Despite this ultimate victory for a free press in the Pentagon papers case, the fact remains that for a period of 15 days two great newspapers were legally barred from publishing. It is anomalous that while the Supreme Court ruled prior restraint to have been unjustified, such restraint nevertheless existed with legal sanction for more than 2 weeks. The right to publish was denied while the courts were in the process of deciding that such right to publish could not be denied.

The viability of a free press requires, in my judgment, that it not be subject to prior restraint upon publication, even during the pendency of judicial proceedings. If there be exceptions to this rule, they should be only in cases touching upon the very survival of the Nation, and under circumstances far more dire than those presented in the Pentagon Papers case. Certainly the press may be held accountable after publication for what it has published. If a newspaper defames an individual for example, it will properly be subject to a libel action. But to permit temporary injunctions in advance of publication in any but the most extreme cases does violence to constitutional protections which I believe the press does—and must—enjoy. Accordingly, I believe that legislation should be considered and enacted to prohibit the issuance by the courts of injunctions against publication, thereby removing prior restraint from the reach of the executive. Such legislation would affirm the principles of the first amendment and make the press even more secure from attack than it is today.

I might say Mr. Chairman, that we had some 6 days of hearings before the freedom of the press committee of the House, and we had a number of distinguished witnesses, starting with Arthur Goldberg, and Philip Kurland, University of Chicago Law School, who I think is to testify tomorrow, and I might say that I listened with growing concern, because witness after witness stated that the Government had no right to invoke prior restraint. This would set a precedent, which would be very dangerous. The press in the last 200 years has served us well. I think the press also have been responsible. I can't imagine a case where the subject would be so grave that the press would not be responsive to discussion. And I can see no real need ever, for the Government to have any involvement in their right to publish.

If we need examples—if we went to another administration I suppose, that there was some feeling in the Kennedy administration, that matters concerning the Bay of Pigs should not see the light of day, yet Kennedy stated that maybe if it had been published, the country might have avoided a serious mistake. And I think we must conclude that the Government does not work well in secret, and it is only when decisions are broadly shared by the American people, and on the basis of their reading, and due to the efforts of the press, will we make decisions that both enjoy national satisfaction and public support. And certainly the record, and the history of the Pentagon Papers is not reassuring. I might also add parenthetically that the Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. MacComber, testified before the committee, that 85 percent of the classified material should not or should never have been classified in the first place. And yet, in a case pending in the courts here on Moss—they should have that knowledge. And in the Pentagon case, they received a preliminary act again, on the grounds they of national security.

Protections are also needed against other less direct, but nevertheless dangerous, forms of assault on the free functioning of the press. Recently several cases have arisen involving the supenaing of news reporters' notes in criminal cases before the grand juries. The Supreme Court is scheduled to hear the most prominent of these, the Caldwell case, and two companion cases this term. In my opinion reporters must be allowed to preserve the confidentiality of their sources if the public is to be served with the free flow of information necessary in a democracy. Should the Court deny newsmen this protection, or fail to define its parameters sufficiently broadly, it will be necessary for Congress, I believe, to enact a national Newsmen's Privilege Act—now law in 17 states—to preserve the confidentiality of sources, except in cases of threat to human life, espionage, or foreign aggression. I might note that I have introduced such legislation in the House. Consideration should also be given to a New York State statute, that provides an absolute ban against the subpenaing of reporters' notes.

Basically, in my judgment, having a little experience in the newspaper business, it is my conclusion that a reporter's confidential sources should be treated precisely the same way as the lawyer-client relationship, or doctor-patient relationship. If the Government is going on a fishing expedition, such as in the case of the grand juries, if information is given, the sources would dry up.

Reporters, at times, are subpenaed, and their freedom of the press will be endangered, and I think the pending determination of the Supreme Court—we should watch this matter very closely, and it may be that we need legislation. I know there is an inclination on the part of some to leave this question to judicial determination. I think that is fine if judicial determination clearly holds that the reporters' sources should remain a privilege—but if they go in the opposite direction, I hope appropriate legislation would be forthcoming.

The press has often been called the "fourth estate," serving in many respects as a coordinate branch of our democracy, especially when a breakdown occurs among the other three. In this vital role of informing the people, the press has encountered many of the same difficulties vis-a-vis the executive branch as we in the Congress have. Time after time the roadblock of security classification has stood between the people and the information which the people and the Congress need to make democracy work, executive privilege is another roadblock faced by the Congress in its attempts to obtain information needed in the performance of its constitutional duties. Both the unwarranted assertion of executive privilege and the indiscriminate use of security classification seriously infringe on the people's right to know, a right which a free press was intended to guarantee.

I might say that I have asked the GAO—Mr. Staats—to put together a list, which he has agreed to do, of all the instances where the Executive has claimed executive privilege, despite Congress' paramount need for the information which was withheld. I am told that it is quite a long list, and I will forward it as soon as I receive it.

Senator Ervin. I might state that the executive branch of Government withholds a lot of information that Congress needs in order to perform its functions, and they give their reasons as either it is classified or that it comes within the purview of executive privilege. I ran into that when I was investigating the surveillance activities of the Department of the Army. During this investigation, they sought to use the executive privilege doctrine, and I was flatly told by the Department of Defense that they didn't think I had any need for the information I requested. Furthermore, when I sought testimony from witnesses that had firsthand knowledge of what was being investigated, I was told that the Department of the Army selects its own witnesses. They selected some very fine gentlemen, however who weren't even connected with the Department of the Army at the time the surveillance activities took place and who knew nothing about the personnel whom they were testifying about.

The qualifications of a witness in a court of law is of primary importance.

Mr. REID. Certainly helps.

Senator ERVIN. The witnesses supplied by the Army could only read a document to the committee—a document which conceals far more than it reveals.

Mr. REID. Well, I might add, that we have a series of letters, Mr. Chairman, between Senator Fulbright, and Secretary of Defense Laird, wherein Senator Fulbright requested some information, and it was denied, and it in no way cited an executive privilege. In my judgment, this didn't fall within executive privilege. They have no inherent right just to say that they are sorry, but they don't wish to furnish the information. I don't think they have that power.

Senator ERVIN. I would have to agree with you on your views. The Executive branch not only claims executive privilege, and the right to classify documents, but they also claim a right to withhold any information they choose for reasons of their own.

Mr. REID. Well, unfortunately, I put it a little stronger. I think the Executive has no overall right, and more than that, no right whatsoever to withhold from the Congress any information which is vital to Congress' performance of its constitutional duties, and I don't think that has gotten through the executive branch as yet.

The Pentagon papers illustrate the breakdown of our constitutional system of checks and balances resulting from the fetish for secrecy on the part of those in high places. The dimensions of this problem were analyzed in hearings before the House Subcommittee on Foreign Operations and Government Information in June, and certain remedies are clearly called for if the Congress and the press are to reassert their proper role.

First, in view of the overzealousness exhibited by the FCC in its drug-lyric notice to broadcasters, the Congress should clearly reaffirm and make more explicit the mandate of the Communication Act of 1934 prohibiting the FCC from exercising the power of censorship over the radio communications transmitted by any radio station or from interfering with the right of free speech by means of radio communication.

I have here the first such notice of the FCC of March 5, 1971, and in one paragraph they talk about the dangers of drug abuse, and go on to raise the serious questions of licensee responsibility. Broadcasting licensees—before broadcasting the words or lyrics of a selection played on their station must know the content of the song just as in the case of the foreign language broadcast. This may entail reasonable efforts to ascertain the meaning of the words used in the lyrics.

While this duty may deal with the responsibilities of the licensee, he remains fully responsible for its fulfillment. But nowhere in our history—the Government has no right to threaten a loss of license if he puts on the air certain matters which the FCC doesn't like. I think they have no right, and I might say that the House has no more right to make an investigation of CBS than to check and edit what goes on in the composing room of a newspaper. If these two documents of the FCC are any examples of what is going to happen in the future, I think that Congress should making amendments to the Communication Act of 1934.

Second, the Congress must enact a new statute governing classified documents. This law must sharply limit that which should be labeled secret, and it must provide for automatic declassification and congressional oversight. If a matter should remain secret after a stated period, there should be an affirmative, positive finding as to why continued secrecy is necessary. Sanctions should be imposed for improper classification by the Executive, and Congress should explicitly reserve the right to make public material improperly classified by the executive contrary to statute when classification is not a matter of national security and is simply to avoid governmental embarrassment.

I might say that the witnesses we had before our committee, estimated the amount of improperly classified material, but one witness stated that it was as high as 90 percent. I suspect there are some of General Washington's papers still there, and still classified. Interestingly enough, Executive Order No. 10501 does provide for some declassification, yet I can find no Executive willing to testify that there was in practice any meaningful or any large scale declassification going on. The witnesses said that when in doubt you classify it, and if you are still in doubt, classify it higher. When I was in the Department of State it was a standing joke, that if you really wanted it to be well read, make it top secret, and to protect it, give it a very low classification.

The truth of the matter is that there has been massive overclassification, and the fundamental factor is that the Government withheld from Congress information which it needs to carry on its functions properly. I have seen a fair amount of classified material, and in my judgment, most of it should never have been classified, and that which should have, should have been protected. We have to look at this as a very definite oversight, but every executive seems to feel that they have an unwritten right to dictate to the Congress on classified material, as to whether or not it should be released or made available to a Congressional committee. But I am not overly impressed with those arguments, and I think we have the right to declassify that which the executive branch has classified improperly.

Further, the Congress must come to grips with executive privilege. I do not believe the President has an absolute right or an overall inrerent right to deny information from the Congress, and thereby from the press and the American people. As the Supreme Court indicated in Reynolds v. United States, 345, U.S. 1(1953), it is the courts, and not the Executive, which should properly decide controversies between the Congress and the executive branch over the withholding of information. I would add most emphatically that the executive has no right whatsoever, as I mentioned earlier, to deny Congress information which is essential to the latter's performance of its constitutional duties. The executive does not have the right to make war on its own, it does not have the right to invade Cambodia or some other area of the world, or deny any documents to the Congress. And I believe what we must seek with the executive is an accommodation, and make it abundantly clear that these decisions do not lie totally with the executive branch. If we are to have accountability, then the Congress has the right to look at any classification.

If an executive is no longer accountable to the Congress of the American people, then it seems to me that we are in a very dangerous situation, one which the American people would not tolerate. I am very concerned that any major action by the executive, in the area of war and peace, must be as a result of constitutional decisions made by the Congress, prior to said action. I cannot imagine President Eisenhower losing sight of this, for the very simple reason that he had overriding respect for the Constitution and the balance of power.

The Freedom of Information Act, which became law 4 years ago, as you know Mr. Chairman, has been a significant vehicle for the American people to obtain information from the executive branch. Yet experience with its implementation suggests that it would be tightened in two respects. The types of information now permitted to be withheld must be sharply limited, and the time permitted for Government response to a court suit must be reduced from the present 60 days to 20 days so that information can be furnished as a matter of high priority. I might say again that Congressman John Moss and I filed suit under this act on June 23rd to compel the Government to make public the Pentagon Papers. In its preliminary answer to our complaint, the Government denied that it had a legal obligation to furnish the documents. We do not consider yesterday's publication by the Government of a portion of the documents an adequate response to our suit, and we will continue to demand in the court that the Government release all the documents to the public or justify its refusal to release them. I would hope that the press would use the Freedom of Information Act more and more as a means of serving the people's right to know.

Our democracy does not work well in secret. The principle of accountability is fundamental to our system, and both the Congress and the people must be informed for accountability to be meaningful.

The historic, and indeed constitutional, role of the press in holding government accountable to the people must never be allowed to diminish. To the extent that the American people permit encroachments upon the freedom of the press, we will have failed really to understand democracy, and I believe that Congress, working with the press, can restore that balance.

So again, if I may, permit me to compliment you and your committee on what you are doing. Failure in this area may lead to nothing less than the failure of our country.

Senator ERVIN. I want to commend you on the excellence of your statement, it certainly reflects the fact that you have broad and profound experience in this field. Your committee has conducted most illuminating hearings on this subject, and you have had some of the most knowledgeable men before you.

I agree completely with you that the most perilous of conditions have been brought on the press, and that there should be no prior restraints, except in the most narrow instances where the publication would pose a great threat to the national security. I also agree with you that there should be some restraint on the dissemination of information concerning negotiations with foreign nations. Some foreign nations would be reluctant to discuss things of importance in open society like we do.

Do you not agree with the position that if we would have had publications concerning the Bay of Pigs, that that situation would never have occurred?

Mr. Reid. That is my conviction, and I have 20–20 hindsight. It would have been far better if we had had publication on the Bay of Pigs. And indeed, there are many others, because I cannot believe that in the long agony of the Vietnam war, that the number of actions taken or that our involvement would become so deep had the facts not been hidden from the American people. I might add further that I question whether some members of the House and Senate would not have voted the Gulf of Tonkin resolution if we would have had the documents that now exist. In effect, the Congress without being told the truth passed the resolution, but if we had had all the facts, it would have been different.

Senator Ervin. I think it is very unfortunate in the long run that there is so much secrecy about the Vietnam war. Generally, I think the members of the Senate and the House are divided into two groups, one group is calling for a halt in the war, and the other is calling for a military victory. Personally, I think we could have won it 5 years ago with much less loss of life. One group of Congressmen have the very strong feeling that we should not pull out of the war at all. In effect, those issues remain unresolved—but if some form of policy would have been established, we probably could have avoided most of the disastrous consequences which surround our involvement in Vietnam.

Mr. Reid. I agree with you, but what disturbs me particularly was apparent dereliction in office. Because there is a lack of policy, we don't know how high this went. Some subordinates developed a policy, and discussed the actions of the major escalation I do not think the executive has that right, I think the executive must inform the Congress. Here was a case where I think relations broke down between Congress and the executive, and the excutive was not sufficiently aware of the entire situation.

Senator Ervin. I would certainly agree. I think what the Executive has inaugurated with regard to security classification was never intended to justify such classifications. I believe that Executive order was issued in good faith for the purpose of classifying documents which pertain to national security, but the scope of that order is growing and growing. The executive branch has gone to great extremes, surpassing the intent of the order, as was brought out before your committee when one witness expressed the opinion 85 or 95 percent of all classified documents need not be classified at all.

Mr. Reid. That is correct, it was more than just a little percentage.

Senator Ervin. The fact is that there is no uniformity among the different departments. Some years ago, I requested a specific report on American imports from Japan from the State Department as well as the Department of Commerce. Both gave me a copy of the report. The copy from the Department of Commerce was not classified in any respect, while the Department of State copy was classified and it was turned over to me on the condition that I wouldn't make any part of it public, under any circumstances.

Mr. Reid. In my judgment, they have no authority to send that stipulation with the report. I think we have to make it plain in one or two letters that Congress has every right to these reports, and that they have no right to say how we should handle it.

Senator Ervin. The classification of the report I received sometime ago, didn't have anything to do with protecting national security, but it did conceal a lot of individual and official policies of the executive department.

The first amendment as I see it has certain explicit freedoms, freedom of the press, freedom of speech, freedom of religion, and it seems to me that in your statement, and I agree with this, that it is the right of the people to know, and that is really the purpose of the first amendment insofar as government is concerned.

Mr. Reid. I think so, and it was the late Justice Black who said that the first amendment was to serve the governed, not the governor, and they·have no power to censor, rather the press would remain forever free to censor the Government. We have had some come in the Government fairly recently who feel patriotic, and that censorship can become binding, and the Government could say what the American people should or should not know, to prevent the truth from getting to the American people. I think the executive has no right to do this and I think our Founding Fathers knew what they were doing.

Senator Ervin. Your statement correctly emphasizes the fact that there is just as great a need for prohibition upon censorship of the broadcasting media as there is with respect to the printed word.

Mr. Reid. I think that radio and TV need precisely the same protection, and I think it is terribly important that this be given some consideration. I also think that there are some in the administration who think they can make a distinction between radio and TV and the press. I cannot make any distinction between these modes of communication. Therefore, I was very disturbed when I saw it deteriorating that way.

Senator Ervin. Don't you agree that if there are prior restraints, a very serious threat to the freedom of the press would exist even though the Government may never take action. The effect would be that the people in the newspaper media would be fearful that they would be prosecuted by the Government for publishing information and for that reason they would be very careful not to publish things that the Government does not like, thus avoiding a confrontation with the Government.

Mr. Reid. I think that is exactly correct, and I think there are very clear dangers that you touched on, but I don't think they would be afraid of a confrontation with the Government. The interesting thing to me when I served a little on the press, was that the Executive in the past and in the present administration, are very free to leak confidential and top secret information when it will serve their purpose, but the minute there is something not put their way, it is considered almost treason. You cannot have a double standard of this kind, and I would like to see the time when the administration would say that we should not have any fear of prior restraint. And until such time, the press will be very careful with how they deal with material.

The newspaper was established to present a clear picture for the American public, and yet if a reporter is subpenaed before the grand jury and does not testify, the newspaper is faced with a shutdown. The other danger that I was concerned about is what are the courts to think? Can the courts issue temporary restraining orders while they consider these matters? If so, then for however long it may take them to make a decision, you have lost the right that we have had for over 200 years. It puts the courts in a very difficult situation.

Senator ERVIN. Years ago, the Attorney General of the United States testified before a committee I was serving on and gave us his interpretation of some FBI data to justify his conclusions. When I asked him to produce the FBI document he cited, he said that he couldn't because it was "confidential." I said that I was not going to accept his interpretation of those documents as being correct. and since he had used them for his purposes, I insist that he give them to the committee so that we could make an objective determination. I was never able to establish whether the information that the Attorney General had put in the record was correct. So the use of confidential material for the purpose of the——

Mr. REID. Mr. Chairman, I would look with favor if the Congress would subpena some members of the executive branch, be they in the cabinet or in the White House, and take that issue to court to see in the judgment of the courts whether it was proper or improper to withhold information. I think if we did that once or twice. it would serve the purpose, and the Executive would not have a lively sense of doing this every time you turn around.

Senator ERVIN. We had the testimony of a very knowledgeable witness sometime ago who pointed out that in the trial of Aaron Burr Chief Justice Marshall stated that the courts could even subpena the President of the United States. If the courts can, I think a congressional committee could.

Mr. REID. I would think so, and frankly to the extent of alarm, I am concerned about this. Certainly there would be enough reasons to be in this posture. They have the power; but they don't execute it. I would hate to see a flat out confrontation to get accommodation. But if it comes to that, we have the power. But we fail to execute it.

Senator ERVIN. I have just one other observation to make. Yesterday, Mr. Norman Isaacs, who has profound experience as a publisher as well as an editor, and who is now a professor of journalism at Columbia University, testified that we should have an absolute freedom from all prior restraints. He took the position that the press should be responsible to hold from publication information which affects national security. I have been trying to find evidence which would indicate that the press has not always been responsible in this way. There is only one occasion of which I am aware. That is when a Chicago newspaper published that the Japanese code had been broken. In your study of this subject, have you found any instances where you were convinced that the press had acted irresponsibly in printing information that really affected national security?

Mr. Reid. The Japanese code is the only instance that I know of. But I have one illustration. At one point, the Herald Tribune had an item which the Government raised some questions about. We looked at it very carefully, and discussed it, and we agreed in this instance that perhaps the column should not be syndicated. It had to do with a radar tracking installation in Turkey that had something to do with the range and character of these missiles, and for that reason—if it had been published, we would have lost that important facility.

I thought that made sense, and for that reason, we decided not to publish it. I don't know of any other than the Japanese code. And I think the Government should be very thankful that the press realizes its responsibilities. I have had the opportunity to live in other countries where the facts are very hard to get—but rather than hassling the press, we ought to be thankful for the press we have, for the group of men and women who serve as reporters—and radio and TV and editors, who really give up their life so that the public may know.

Mr. Baskir. Do you know what the consequences of the publishing that the Japanese code had been broken were?

Mr. Reid. I haven't seen any Government documents related to what the consequences were, but I merely know that the codes were changed.

Mr. Baskir. Were the changes the result of that story.

Mr. Reid. I can't say for sure, but from my own knowledge, I would presume so.

Mr. Baskir. The reason I ask is that it would seem to me that there would be some concern.

Mr. Reid. I understand while there is or was concern, this would have a great security impact. In fact, the Japanese and nobody else really realized it until sometime long afterwards, and it didn't really have an impact at all.

Mr. Baskir. You may correct me if I am wrong on this point, but it was alleged that the publication of the Penatgon papers might affect communications and our codes, and the answer to that is negative, that the publication would not affect our communications and so forth.

Mr. Reid. Without going into technical detail, there was no real reason for concern on that. Certainly diplomatic relations in Canada could have been affected.

Mr. Baskir. Do you think if the press would have published the information that Mr. Kissinger was going to visit China, that it would have had any impact on his meeting with the Chinese officials, and perhaps could have discouraged the meeting between the two governments?

Mr. Reid. My answer to this would be very simple, and it has two parts. One, the Government has the capacity in a very sophisticated way to keep secrets and move people around, and if they don't, they should. Secondly, it is a question of weighing what is important, and in my judgment, there is nothing that justifies undermining the right to publish, and in the long run this would average itself out. And so, if you weigh this case against undermining the rights of the free press, there is no question in my mind that the press must be upheld and the right to publish must be upheld.

Mr. BASKIR. I don't know if it was an American or foreign newspaper that presented enough information—somebody might have written a story, and——

Mr. REID. I think that was possible, and I think Mr. Kissinger was reported as having a stomach ache.

Mr. BASKIR. These two cases might suggest that when stories—would be damaging—they are not read, and therefore don't cause damage.

Mr. REID. I don't think you have a case there. I don't know a case serious enough to justify prior restraint that the press wouldn't recognize.

Senator ERVIN. Isn't it always the case that with every freedom there will always be abuses?

Mr. REID. I think that is the nature of the definition.

Senator ERVIN. And if we attempt to adopt laws and regulation of practices, that we eventually destroy the freedom itself.

Mr. REID. I think that is precisely correct.

Senator ERVIN. I want to thank you for making a most significant contribution to this hearing.

Mr. REID. Thank you very much for permitting me to be here.

Senator ERVIN. Counsel, call the next witness.

Mr. BASKIR. Doctor Frank Stanton, president, Columbia Broadcasting System.

Senator ERVIN. Dr. Stanton, I wish to welcome you to the subcommittee, and express our deep appreciation for your willingness to appear and to give us the benefit of your views in an area in which you are certainly highly competent to speak.

STATEMENT OF FRANK STANTON, PRESIDENT, CBS

Mr. STANTON. Thank you Mr. Chairman. I appreciate very much this opportunity to associate myself with the concern that this subcommittee, by conducting these hearings, has expressed in the effective application of the principles of the first amendment. In your address to the Association of American Publishers last week, Mr. Chairman, you stated, with clarity and eloquence, that the whole basis and rationale of the first amendment consist in an abiding faith that our country has nothing to fear from the exercise of its freedom as long as it leaves the truth free to combat error.

I agree wholeheartedly with the sense of urgency implicit in the subcommittee's announced intention of seeking to create a better appreciation of the first amendment's purpose and its crucial importance to a free society. It seems to me essential to the viability of our institutions that the Congress from time to time reassert, through such proceedings as these, the nature and extent of our basic freedoms in order that those freedoms continue to have life and meaning in the face of changes and complexities—whether they be social, economic, technical, or political—that might otherwise erode them through public fears or apathy or cynicism. The Congress, of all our three branches of Government, is closest to the people and most specifically charged and empowered to declare and illumine, on its own initiative, public policy.

In the case of the provisions for freedom of speech and of the press in the first amendment, such initiative on the part of the Congress becomes the more essential when new means of communications enlarge the capacity of the people to know, to question and to criticize. When after Gutenberg's contrivance of movable type, human communications underwent their first great revolution, a major preoccupation of Tudor civil strife was the extension to the press of the same freedom which applied to speech. And it is of pivotal significance that the First Session of the First Congress of the United States incorporated in the language of the first amendment prohibiting the abridgment of free speech, the words, "or of the press." There is no doubt whatsoever in my mind that in referring to the press those prescient authors of the Bill of Rights intended to describe all means of communicating ideas. For their point, as the Supreme Court has now made clear, was not to protect any specific medium but to assure forever the right of the people to the full and free interchange of information and opinion—and to put that right beyond the power of government to inhibit or hamper.

I am, therefore, greatly heartened, Mr. Chairman, that your subcommittee recognizes, as the courts have repeatedly declared, the applicability of the first amendment alike to both the "printed and broadcast press." For the roles of the broadcast and print media are identical: to provide the public with news and information and to stimulate public inquiry and criticism by themselves inquiring and being critical. In carrying out their vital mission, they reach for the same audience, which expects both media to perform independently and vigorously, free from governmental pressures.

In view of the essential purposes shared by the broadcast and press media, their dissimilarities pale into total insignificance. The differences are likely in any case to prove temporary. Many of the physical distinctions between the broadcast press and today's printed press, for example, will diminish when technological advances make possible the transmission of newspapers directly into the home by facsimile printout—through cable or over the air. If the same criterion now applied to the broadcast press—the numerical limitation of channels of distribution—obtains, the printed press, now readily available on every street corner, would be subject to regulation. Would this confer upon the government the power to subject the contents and the methods of such a traditionally free press to official scrutiny? Such a rationale would be wholly repugnant to the spirit of the first amendment and clearly defiant of its intent.

And yet some contend, that because broadcasting is licensed and print is not, that fact, springing wholly from technological factors, justifies governmental surveillance of broadcast journalism. We reject that view. The true test of government devotion to the first amendment is the sensitivity with which it exercises its licensing power and declines to take advantage of technical factors to impose controls that would otherwise be clearly against public policy.

Yet today, more than at any time in the history of radio and television, broadcast journalism is jeopardized by attempts to regulate its content or its methods, including unreasonable application of the FCC's fairness doctrine to the coverage of controversial public issues. In the past, CBS has had no difficulty with that doctrine because it reflected our basic journalistic goal—to present public issues fairly. Recently, however, in considering fairness doctrine complaints, the Commission has engaged in microscopic examination of a licensee's coverage of an issue, going to such extremes as counting of lines in a broadcast transcript.

In one instance, to determine whether a broadcast involved a controversial issue, the Commission considered 28 pages of correspondence, over a 5-month period, before it was able to affirm CBS's judgment that a 9-minute feature on bullfighting did not constitute a presentation of a controversial issue of public importance and did not justify a request for "equal time." This type of detailed examination by a government body is wholly incompatible with effective broadcast treatment of public issues.

Other instances abound.

In finding a Miami Beach station in violation of the fairness doctrine in its coverage of a proposal for legalization of casino gambling, the Commission actually counted the lines of copy devoted to both sides of the issue and apparently relied on the line count in making its decision that the station should have presented more progambling material.

The practical consequences of official interference in broadcast journalism are well-illustrated by the frustration of CBS's effort to periodically present a series of loyal opposition broadcasts. The loyal opposition concept was an effort to give to the major party out of power—whether Republican or Democratic—some opportunity for access to balance that so easily achieved by an incumbent President. In July 1970, following a number of prime time Presidential broadcast appearances, CBS made a single broadcast available to the Democratic National Committee to respond to the President. Whatever may be said about our decision, it surely was within the reasonable scope of journalistic judgment. On the complaint of the Republican National Committee, however, the FCC held that the Republicans were entitled to reply to the Democratic broadcast—a reply, in other words, to a reply—and 14 months later that issue is still in the courts and was argued last Friday before the court of appeals here in the District. As a direct result, CBS has not further developed its loyal opposition format, and the public is the loser.

As Commission scrutiny over our judgments intensifies, prolonged administrative and judicial proceedings are inevitable, if only to untangle the factual morass which inevitably results from overclose analysis of these highly subjective matters. Although some on the Commission fully agree that deep involvement in day-to-day journalistic practices is an inappropriate function of government, the trend unfortunately continues in the opposite direction.

A number of other matters involving the fairness doctrine are now in the courts. Some of the rulings in this area, if they are upheld will adversely affect broadcasters' ability to provide fair, balanced and meaningful coverage of public issues.

One held that a broadcaster may not have a policy which excludes all "editorial advertisements"—paid spot announcements setting forth partisan viewpoints on public issues—and directed the FCC to develop a regulatory scheme applicable to such "advertisements." Since broadcast time is limited, this decision means at the very least that the FCC, and inevitably the courts, will be arbitrating licensee judgments regarding on what issues and to whom time must be sold to enable partisans to present their views. This constitutes a real threat to a free broadcast press because it empowers a government agency to decide what issues a journalist must cover—whether or not, as a matter of substance, they meet journalistic standards of relevance and urgency.

We recognize that we and other journalists make mistakes, that all news editing involves judgments as to which reasonable men can differ, and that all of us are open to criticism. Nevertheless, self-examination by each of this nation's diverse journalistic enterprises is infinitely preferable to government inquiries, conducted to determine whether a particular news or public affairs broadcast meets government standards.

This leads me to another subject touched on in your letter inviting me to testify. I refer to the increasing tendency of governmental agencies to make print and broadcast journalists de facto investigave arms of the government through the use of subpenas—a particularly insidious threat to the ability of newsmen to carry out their responsibilities effectively. Not only is the burden of compliance with such subpenas extreme and in itself punitive; but compelling journalists to reveal their sources or nonpublished materials such as notes, films, tapes, has a chilling effect on and obviously seriously impeded their future access to such sources.

Special first amendment concerns are, of course, presented by subpenas issued for the purpose of editorial surveillance. CBS, as you know, recently contested the right of a House subcommittee to subpena nonbroadcast material—"outtakes"—in order to determine whether a broadcast produced by CBS News complied with the subcommittee's conception of correct journalistic standards. Our chief concern was the chilling effect that such legislative review would have not only on our own newsmen but on all other broadcast journalists as well. Whether a particular subpena requires the actual divulging of confidential material or the production of material which the journalist did not choose to broadcast for any number of reasons is beside the point. The gravity of this threat to the free press stems from efforts to subject professional news judgments to government scrutiny. The dark shadow of surveillance can do nothing but inhibit the free flow of information, without which we believe a robust press is an impossibility.

As noticed in our amicus brief filed in the U.S. Supreme Court in the Caldwell case, NBC and CBS alone have received 121 subpenas in the last 30 months. The cumulative effect of these subpenas has placed substantial burdens on personnel, most of whose primary function should be gathering and publishing the news.

More important, however, is the effect of a climate of "subpenability" on the ability of broadcast newsmen to obtain film interviews. Apropos is the following excerpt from an affidavit of CBS

News Correspondent David Culhane, recently filed in a New York court, which quashed a subpena for outtakes on first amendment and other grounds. Said Mr. Culhane:

> If those consulted or interviewed by me in my news gathering efforts had reasons to believe, or even suspect, that all of what they disclosed would be subject to subpoena, it is my firm belief that gathering significant news on film would be, at best, much more difficult and less effective and at worst, nearly impossible.

The U.S. Supreme Court will soon be hearing oral argument in the Caldwell case and two other related cases, and it is our hope that the Court will recognize a first amendment newsman's right on the facts of these cases. Regardless of their outcome, however, legislation clearly defining a newsman's right is, we believe, necessary to provide generally applicable guidance in the area.

We support S. 1311, introduced by Senator Pearson, which goes a long way toward the kind of definition of a newsman's rights which we believe would insure his ability to function effectively. We do have some suggestions for improvement of the bill, which include a revision that would protect not just that which is explicitly confidential but all information which has not been broadcast or published. Our lawyers are prepared to provide suggested language to the subcommittee's staff.

Senator ERVIN. I might interrupt you at this point, and say that we would be glad to receive that information.

Mr. STANTON. Thank you, we will submit it.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would like to commend this subcommittee for taking up this vital matter at a time when all our institutions are under great stress.

As William Allen White wisely noted some years ago in a Pulitzer Prize-winning editorial:

> You say that freedom of utterance is not for time of stress, and I reply with the sad truth that only in time of stress is freedom of utterance in danger. No one questions it in calm days because it is not needed. And the reverse is true also; only when free utterance is suppressed is it needed, and when it is needed, it is most vital to justice.

The fact that the responsibility of the press to report events without fear or favor—reports that often sear official sensibilities—has never been carried out to everyone's satisfaction is perhaps the strongest guaranty that it has at least maintained its independence. Thus, while Thomas Jefferson could not in 1803 attribute the shortcomings of the press to the "Eastern Establishment" he could write:

> Indeed the abuses of the freedom of the press here have been carried to a length never before known or borne by any civilized nation.

Yet he went on to write:

> But it is so difficult to draw a clear line of separation between the abuse and the wholesome use of the press, that as yet we have found it better to trust the public judgment, rather than the magistrate, with the disrcimination between truth and falsehood. And hitherto the public judgment has performed that office with wonderful correctness.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to think that it is our mutual confidence in the public rather than the magistrate that has brought us together here this morning.

Senator ERVIN. Is it not true that the over all purpose of the First Amendment is to enable people to know the truth and to exercise freedom of thought, insofar as government is concerned, for the adoption of wise governmental policies?

Mr. STANTON. Absolutely.

Senator ERVIN. In other words, freedom of the press and freedom of speech were primarily adopted for the benefit of the people, not for the benefit of those who might be engaged in commercial activities respecting communications.

Mr. STANTON. No question about that, and if our democracy is to survive we need the full application of the first amendment because the people's right to know is the most cherished thing we have.

Senator ERVIN. In a Nation founded on the free enterprise system, we recognize the necessity to have incentives to encourage men and organizations to provide media of communication.

Mr. STANTON. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. Now, as you pointed out, of course at the time the first amendment was written, no one imagined that we would ever have such a media of communications as we have today.

Mr. STANTON. That is my opinion, and certainly I think it would be stretching imagination to think they could have thought of it at that time.

Senator ERVIN. But as far as the principles of the first amendment are concerned, they attach themselves to any new conditions which fall within the compass of its spirit.

Mr. STANTON. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. Now, it is true, of course, that broadcast frequencies are, in a sense, in scarce supply. To prevent the destruction of the potentialities of broadcasting it is necessary for the Government to regulate the broadcast media to some extent.

Mr. STANTON. Yes, sir, there has to be a traffic officer to keep the user of one frequency from impinging upon the user of another frequency.

Senator ERVIN. In the absence of some Government regulation, the broadcasting media would fail in its effort to inform the people. There would be such a conflict of broadcasts that none of them could be heard.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, there was a time in our history in this country when that condition did exist, in the early days of radio. You may recall that there were a number of stations that operated on the same frequencies, and sometimes the operators of stations didn't respect another man's frequency, and would go on that frequency. In a sense, you have that condition happening at times in international broadcasting today, where some governments don't observe the rights of other governments in the use of specific frequencies. But back in the twenties, when that condition existed in this country, is when you had the Federal Radio Commission set up for the purpose of allocating and policing the use of those frequencies so that they were not denied to the public use, because if you—if more than one broadcaster operates on the same frequency, you can't very well serve much of the people. You can serve only the people immediately around the transmitter. But the vast area in between would get two signals and would be hash.

Senator ERVIN. So the broadcast media recognize the necessity of having Government licensing in the sense that the Government must restrict such media to such numbers as can actually take advantage of the airways for the service of the people.

Mr. STANTON. That is correct.

Senator ERVIN. Your position, I take it, is this: That when the Government issues a license, the licensee is entitled under the first amendment to freedom of speech; and also, in essence, the press has the same rights to freedom of speech. This freedom extends to any person speaking with his voice, or any person of the press.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make no distinction between the rights that broadcasting has under the first amendment and the rights that the print media have under the first amendment.

Senator ERVIN. You concede that something in the nature of the fairness doctrine is desirable and necessary.

Mr. STANTON. Historically, I didn't think so, and indeed, the fairness doctrine as outlined in 1949, by the FCC, was completely consistent with the policies under which we operated in the news and public affairs area. We have been able to live with the fairness doctrine up to this particular time because in a sense it was the doctrine under which we began our news and public affairs operations back in the early thirties. It is only now that we're beginning to feel the detailed—microscopic, if you will, investigations by the Commission that we are beginning to feel the negative effect of the application of the fairness doctrine. As long as the doctrine was a statement of principle and we were given some discretion in how we applied the doctrine, we had no difficulty with it, but just as soon as you begin counting words, getting into the details that the Commission has gotten into—on issues that we felt had been dealt with properly on the air, you begin to impede the free flow of information, in my opinion.

The case I cited in my statement regarding the bullfight, and the ridiculous extremes to which the Commission went in that case I think is typical of the kind of condition we now face, and I want to make it clear that this hasn't always been the case at the Commission, nor is it the case today that all Commissioners share this point of view. But the prevailing direction today is getting more and more into the areas that I think the Commission should stay out of under the first amendment.

Senator ERVIN. Isn't that one of the unfortunate facts about government, that government seems to have an insatiable thirst for more and more power. If you do not have safeguards like the constitutional provisions that can thwart the Government, the Government will never stop short in its thirst for acquiring more power. That is the reason I think the Constitution was drawn. That is the reason we have the first amendment.

Mr. STANTON. Absolutely. You are in a better position than I to judge the bureaucracy's thrust and thirst for power. But sitting where I do, over the span of years I've been in the job that I now how, I have seen an increasing involvement on the part of the bureaucracy of the FCC into things that I think we're protected from under the first amendment.

Senator ERVIN. As you pointed out in the quotation from William Allen White, we do not have any trouble with the First Amendment freedoms when everything is harmonious and there are no troubles, no stresses and no strains. It is in the times when we do have stresses and strains, and added governmental pressures to control the media of communications that we need these freedoms the most.

Mr. STANTON. I couldn't agree with you more, sir.

Senator ERVIN. And there is another danger, that when we do have any kind of Government regulations, the Government tends to overregulate. When the Government undertakes to overregulate the media of communications we have a danger that the Government regulation will ultimately destroy the very objectives which the first amendment was created to achieve.

Mr. STANTON. Yes, sir. It is my belief that overregulation in any field is undesirable but overregulation in the field of ideas I think is dangerous to the future of the Republic.

Senator ERVIN. There would be no question about that in my judgment. I certainly agree with you in the observation that the first amendment was designed to cover all methods of communicating ideas. It seems to me, that what distinguishes America from all the totalitarian states is the fact that we do have these first amendment rights, and we are allowed to say things whether the Government likes them or not, or even whether a majority of the public may like them or not.

Mr. STANTON. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. Now, unfortunately, a lot of the people—and all of us may at times share this inclination—don't like what's being said. They want to suppress the saying of it. This is a constant threat which is posed by society to the first amendment and first amendment rights.

Mr. STANTON. Yes, I think we have all had our moments when we wanted to suppress something, and it's good that we don't have that right.

Senator ERVIN. I must confess that sometimes I don't like to hear a Senator get up and express ideas not in harmony with the sound views I entertain, but I think I have schooled myself sufficiently to be tolerant, and recognize that every viewpoint has the right to express itself, whether it's pleasing to government or whether it's pleasing to any substantial portion of society. Isn't that what makes our institutions work, really?

Mr. STANTON. I believe it is, and I think it's the great thing about our society.

Senator ERVIN. In other words, if it be a free interchange of ideas, persons can exercise freedom of speech uninhibited by Government. The chances are that if we find things in our society that need correcting, they will be corrected ultimately. As long as first amendment freedoms are preserved and maintained, there is no rational and no rightful place in our land for such things as violent revolution.

Mr. STANTON. That is correct.

Senator ERVIN. I think that the closing quotation from Thomas Jefferson which you gave in your statement indicates why we ought to be very reluctant to attempt to regulate strictly any exercise of first amendment freedoms. We have the danger we mentioned a while ago of destroying the freedom if you overregulate. If you attempt to prevent all abuses of the freedom, you wind up with no freedom at all.

Thomas Jefferson, who was a great champion of freedom of speech—didn't always like it himself, when he got in political office. Some of the people didn't approve of some of his policies, but he recognized that the greatest danger to our Republic was to try to place restrictions on freedom of speech, which protects the expression of ideas which we don't like. Thomas Jefferson also said to a group of students in 1799 " . . . to preserve the freedom of the mind, and the freedom of the press, every spirit should be ready to devote himself to martyrdom. For as long as we may think as we will, and speak as we think, the condition of man will proceed in improvement." I think that you exhibited this spirit when you declined to produce the data that had been collected by CBS in the preparation of the documentary called "The Selling of the Pentagon." I couldn't see any purpose that the committee could possibly have in view in that connection, except the purpose of taking the data which was not published, and then coming up with a pronouncement that CBS had not handled the truth in the way that the committee thought it ought to have handled it.

Mr. STANTON. I share your opinion of the objective.

Senator ERVIN. And for that reason, I think you struck a great blow for the preservation of freedom of the press when you declined to produce those documents, and I rejoiced in the House vote which upheld that action.

Mr. STANTON. Thank you.

Mr. BASKIR. Dr. Stanton, in your testimony, you refer to future technological development which might substantially change the assumptions upon which regulation of broadcasting is now based. I have seen reports to the effect that with the use of cable television and perhaps inexpensive videotape recordings, that perhaps individual citizens can actually broadcast on television to their neighbors. I do not know if that is science fiction or not. I wonder if you have any view on that as a possibility.

Dr. STANTON. Well, that's—that's certainly within the state of the art, but for practical reasons I'm not so sure that it would take place quite that way. You are correct in your statement about the future and what it holds for opening up the channels. I think that there are a number of things that are here today which, when they're expanded fully, will change the availability of channels in this country markedly. It's not inconceivable to think in terms of 20 and 30, as high perhaps as 40 or 50 channels into every home in a city by cable. Once you get that kind of access in terms of all those channels you open up a whole different set of conditions than you have today with the more limited spectrum use that we have under the FCC regulations. It's also true, of course, that there will be other forms of transmission of video material, but—and here I refer to the subject that you mentioned in cassettes, video cassettes—but those will not have the simultaneity or the instantaneous quality that we had this morning, for example, when you could sit in your hotel room here in the District and watch a program coming live from Peking. Now, that's part of the magic of television, and when that's taken away from the medium, I think something will be lost

It'll become a reference machine rather than a—the kind of purveyor of current affairs. So I think that there'll always be need and public appetite for the live broadcast, whether it's done by cable or whether it's done over the air. But you're quite right that there is going to be a tremendous use of that black box in your living room with the picture tube in it by the advent or the addition of the prerecorded tape which you can circulate or acquire and look at your leisure.

Actually—and we're a little off, I think, the subject of the first amendment here, but let me just make the point, that until the video cassette came along, the viewer was at the mercy of the broadcaster in terms of when programs came on. This is not true in any other field. If you want to read, you can go to your library shelf and take down a book and read it at 3 o'clock in the morning or 3 o'clock in the afternoon. It's at your selection. You can pick the subject area and you can pick the time. In sound transmission, if you want to listen to Beethoven's Fifth in the middle of the night, or Blood, Sweat and Tears, you can get the record out of your library or the tape out of your library and you can, at your convenience, pick the material and pick the time. But until the video cassette came along, you couldn't do that, and now you've opened up a whole new field of information. But this is really, I hope, not in the area of first amendment at this point.

Mr. Baskir. The reason I asked you the question is because it might have some consequences for some of the assumptions upon which the more than traffic cop regulation performed by Government is based. It's based, as I understand it, on the fact that because there are limited channels for dispensing of news and opinion and other kinds of materials electronically, according to some remarks I've seen in Supreme Court cases, the Government regulation has to be more than that of a traffic cop, it has to go a little bit further. If in fact it turns out that there are no limitations in terms of access as a practical matter, 30 or 40 channels, it may be that those assumptions no longer will hold true.

Dr. Stanton. I would hope that would be the case. If you look at the population of daily newspapers in this country today as against the radio and television station count, there is a great difference in the two numbers. I think it's of the order of four or five to one —more television and radio stations than newspapers, daily newspapers. It's true that there are under a thousand television stations, but if you take all of the electronic means of distribution—of distributing information, and take that number of stations and set that against the number of daily newspapers, there's much more competition in the marketplace on the electronic side than there is on the print side, even today, and if you look down the road, as you're pointing out, I think it really dissolves the need for the kind of regulation that we've had, are having at the present time or have had.

Mr. Baskir. We might be coming to a somewhat absurd situation where in theory the printed press is accessible to all and everybody can enter into it through their mimeograph machine but in practice we don't have it, and yet in theory—maybe inherited theory—broadcasting press is very limited, yet in practice many, many people can get into it, and yet the one is regulated and the other is not.

Mr. STANTON. There's no question that the numbers and circulation are now on the side of the electronic media as against the print media.

Mr. BASKIR. I'd like to ask you about the fairness doctrine's application to one particular subject. It seems to me that I recall not so many years ago that persons who were unhappy about cigarette smoking tried to use the fairness doctrine to get their case on radio and television and had a great deal of difficulty before they were successful. Is my recollection correct?

Mr. STANTON. Yes, you are referring to the case brought before Mr. Banzhaf, and the Commission ruled that we have to give time to the opposing voices on the subject of cigarette smoking. And then of course, as you know, it became a matter for Congress, and then there was legislation prohibiting—I think fairly, the use of cigarette and tobacco advertising on television and not applying the same relationship to other media. It seems to me that if it is wrong and that Congress in its wisdom had decided that it was wrong for one medium, it seems to me it was wrong for all media. But that started, that had its roots at the FCC in the fairness doctrine.

Mr. BASKIR. Did Mr. Banzhaf have some trouble with the FCC in convincing them that this was a controversial issue, or other people, prior to his experience?

Mr. STANTON. I am not intimately associated with the history on that to give a satisfactory answer in detail. I don't know what his difficulties were in the early days. Obviously, there was a marked change from the initial protest to the ultimate application of legislation.

Mr. BASKIR. The reason I ask is because I understand that a court just very recently has now determined that smoking is no longer controversial, so it no longer falls under the fairness doctrine. It seems to me in a short period of years, truth has gone from one end of the spectrum to the other.

Mr. STANTON. That is why I don't think we ought to have an official agency deciding on what is truth.

Mr. BASKIR. If the FCC and the court together decide that smoking is not controversial and therefore the fairness doctrine doesn't apply, it seems to me that the power to determine what's a controversy determines whether you can hear an argument or not hear an argument, and that goes to the very heart of the first amendment. Implicit in the fairness doctrine is deciding when things are not controversy. And if you have that power, the Government has that power, they can keep views off the air.

Mr. STANTON. Well, I would much rather have that responsibility fixed with professional journalists in the multitude of stations and newspapers in this country than I would to have it set by four men out of seven as a minimum on the FCC.

Senator ERVIN. I think that illustrates one of the reasons why the first amendment was adopted—so that everybody would have a right to speak, and so neither the Surgeon General of the United States or any other agency of the Government could claim that he had possession of all the truth on the subject, and those who disagreed with him had none. I think it illustrates a growing tendency on the part of a lot of people in the Government to exercise the privilege of brainwashing the American people. I think the first amendment was adopted to keep the American people from being brainwashed by the Government.

Mr. STANTON. Every time I come up to the question of the history of the first amendment, I am more impressed by the wisdom of our Founding Fathers in establishing the first amendment.

Senator ERVIN. Because there is no doubt of the fact that if the history of the world proves anything, it proves that there are a lot of people—and some get in positions of a high governmental authority, that would not allow anybody to think anything unless their thoughts coincided with the thoughts that they entertained. They would not allow anybody to say anything unless their speech coincided with what they thought they ought to say. And that is the very reason the first amendment was adopted—to make Americans politically, intellectually and spiritually free.

Mr. STANTON. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. Thank you very much Mr. Stanton.

Senator KENNEDY. I regret very much not being here earlier. I wanted to be here at the outset of these hearings, and I would congratulate our distinguished chairman for holding them. He has been a champion of civil liberties, and I know that he has been using his efforts to extend the civil liberties. So I want to commend our chairman for the work he has done in holding these hearings.

I regret, Mr. Stanton, not hearing you read your statement, but I will read it with great interest. I was really interested in your views about the general impact of the method used by those in high positions within the administration, and I am speaking specifically of the Vice President, and the general efforts which have been made by the administration, to use the grand jury process to obtain reporters' files, and the insulting remarks to the integrity of TV, and the brazen attempt to try to suppress the facts about the South East Asia conflict. Talking about the attacks on the news media, I am just wondering what has been the effect upon the media, on the manner in which they fill their responsibilities what is the morale in news media today?

Mr. STANTON. In the first place, Senator Kennedy, I think a witness who is closer to the news beat and to the working press would probably give you a more telling response to your question about morale. As I have seen it, it hasn't suffered. The things that have happened are more in the nature of taking a lot more time to handle problems that arise out of the attacks, and the subpenas and so forth. It has not changed our dedication to getting on with the main job of letting the people know as best we can to what is happening in the world today.

I must say to you, so that the record from my side of the table reflects this, that since the Attorney General established guidelines for subpenas, the number of subpenas from our shop coming from that quarter have fallen off markedly. That doesn't reduce the numbers that we get from other jurisdictions or other parts of Government, but from the Attorney General's side there was a marked change about a year ago. But this all puts an enormous burden on the news personnel and news management, and the time that we spend on these subpenas and so forth should be spent on investigative reporting.

From my personal point of view, I have to spend a lot more time on handling mail as a result of some of these attacks. But that is a small price to pay if we continue to have freedom under the first amendment. I am not overly sensitive, I hope, to criticism, although some of my colleagues have said that I am. But——

Senator Kennedy. We are all used to a little criticism.

Mr. Stanton. Yes, some are more skillful in handling it than others. But it hasn't been—these attacks have not been overly burdensome, and I don't believe they have affected the public's right to know up to this point. But this is not a curve that's turning down: this is a curve that's going up. And where that critical point passes when things begin to happen that are against the interest of the public is my concern, and one of the reasons I'm so delighted that these hearings are being held because I think it focuses attention on this problem.

Senator Kennedy. In the newspapers and the TV, for example—do you find that media people are less inclined to pursue vigorous inquiries because of the danger of compromising the sources from which they receive information?

Is this a possible implication of this kind of a broad scale attack? Is this a concern to those trying to meet their responsibilities and to make the public aware of the attempted intimidation of sources of information? Do you understand—do you find newsmen more reluctant to jeopardize their sources without this kind of legislation?

Mr. Stanton. Well, you say is it possible, and is it a logical spin-off, and I would have to give you an affirmative answer on that.

Senator Kennedy. And obviously, that reflects, I suppose to some extent, the type of news department.

Mr. Stanton. It could. Whether it has happened up to this point I'm not in a position to state. It certainly has not come to my attention that we have avoided any stories because of that particular point. There may be—stories may be more difficult to come by, but there has always been, and I think there always should be, something approaching an adversary relationship between Government and the press. I get very nervous when I see Government and press getting close together. I think they have a role to play, and each should play it, and if the fourth estate is really going to be the fourth estate, then I think it has to keep an arm's length relationship, and it has to dig for stories and not expect to get handouts.

Senator Kennedy. But the news media are there to fulfill that function, and if I understand the thrust of your testimony, there is a heavy hand in terms of the Government's steps to intervene in the pursuit of those stories.

Mr. Stanton. Well, there is a distinction, it seems to me, that applied in the case of the early attacks from the Vice President, a distinction between attacks on print and attacks on the broadcast media. First, let me go back and say something that I said before, and that is that we all make mistakes, and we make our share of them, and we are not alleging to criticism. But when a man in the position of the Vice President makes the attacks on the broadcasting media, and when you recognize that the FCC is the controller of our licenses, and it is human nature to believe that men serving on that Commission will look to the second highest office in the land, if you will, to get a clue as to, perhaps, how they should conduct themselves.

Senator KENNEDY. Or perhaps how the man in the top office thinks.

Mr. STANTON. Perhaps, but I'll stop at the second one, for the moment. It's that kind of situation that makes our position a little different than the position of the print media. And the print media have had hundreds of years of building up their position in society in this country. And perhaps when we've lived as long with some of the problems that the print media have lived with we'll be stronger in our relations with Government. But this goes back to a question that was raised by counsel, and that it that when the day comes when you have more channels that will ease the logical reason for it. But right now I think that the Commission should ease off in its minute application of the fairness doctrine. I have no fault to find with the doctrine of fairness, but I don't like to see the kind of application made and the way that's going to lead into what I think will be the control, ultimately, of a lot of the news that's on the air.

Senator KENNEDY. We're just getting back to a point that was made somewhat earlier about newspaper subpenas. What can you tell us about them from your own experience?

Mr. STANTON. Well, I have given you in the text of my statement, I believe, the figure of 121 subpenas that NBC and we've had in the last 30 months.

Senator KENNEDY. You have indicated in later responses, that that figure has gone down in the past months, is that correct?

Mr. STANTON. The figure I referred to, Senator Kennedy, was the figure of a falloff subsequent to the Department of Justice guidelines or the Attorney General's guidelines, which were I think issued in August of 1970. We have resisted subpenas. We have a different, perhaps a stronger policy on that today than we had historically, because the problem has become more acute in recent times and we have taken a strong stand against the subpena procedure, as you know from the position I took in the House subcommittee's efforts to subpena our outtakes.

I don't know specifically what you are interested in. I would be glad to try to answer any questions you have, but I think these are the general facts that I would set forth.

Senator KENNEDY. The number of subpenas that you receive now, compared with earlier years—how do they compare.

Mr. STANTON. In total, much higher.

Senator KENNEDY. Can you give us any rough dimensions?

Mr. STANTON. No, but I would be glad to supply the information for you.

Senator KENNEDY. I want to thank you for coming here, Mr. Stanton, there is one other area—the newsman's privilege legislation. You have some reference to it on page eight. Could you tell us how helpful that would be with reference to comparing the several States that have such legislation.

Mr. Stanton. We think it would be very helpful. As I indicated in my statement, I would amend or modify S. 1311 to apply to all information, not just confidential information.

I think that if we had such legislation a year ago, or earlier this year, I wouldn't have spent 5 months in the problem that I was having with the House subcommittee. If we could get a ringing decision from the Supreme Court on this issue, perhaps that legislation wouldn't be required. But absent the certainty of a ringing decision I think this would be a step in the right direction.

Senator Kennedy. I want to extend my appreciation to you for appearing before the subcommittee. Your comments and testimony are very excellent, and I will make sure that I have a chance to go all through your statement. Thank you.

Senator Ervin. Dr. Stanton, on this last point, you are undoubtedly familiar with the decision of the U.S. court of appeals in the Caldwell case.

Mr. Stanton. Yes, sir.

Senator Ervin. They held that it would not be compatible with the first amendment to require him to make even an appearance befort the grand jury on the particular facts of the case. That case, as I construe it, lays down the general doctrine—which I think is quite sound—that government has no right—not a court nor the executive branch of the Government nor the legislative branch—to require testimony from a newsman unless government has an overriding governmental purpose to be served by the obtaining of that information, and that the information cannot be obtained by government from any other source. I think that is a rough statement of the essence of that opinion. If the Supreme Court were to review this case, and hand down a decision in substance like that of the appeals court, there would probably be no need for specific legislation would there?

Mr. Stanton. Not in the specific instance, but that would not protect—that would not have protected us in the case I had with the House, and that is one reason I have suggested the expansion of S. 1311 so it includes all information, and not just confidential information.

Senator Ervin. I agree with you on that point. Is this not fundamentally a statement of your position: While there is, owing to the scarcity of broadcast channels at the present time, some necessity for government regulations, they should be kept at a minimum. No regulation should be adopted which would enable the Government to control the content of the ideas broadcast by the media, or which would enable government to coerce the media so that the media would feel that it might be penalized if it did not broadcast in a manner pleasing to government.

Mr. Stanton. I would agree with that 100 percent.

Senator Ervin. We are sincerely indebted to you for your appearance this morning, and I want to thank you for a very fine contribution.

Mr. Stanton. Thank you.

Senator Ervin. Counsel will call the next witness.

Mr. Baskir. The next witness is Richard J. Barnet, author and political scientist.

STATEMENT OF RICHARD J. BARNET, AUTHOR AND POLITICAL SCIENTIST

Senator Ervin. Mr. Barnet, I want to welcome you to the subcommittee, and express our deep appreciation for your willingness to give us the benefit of your views on the matter that we have been considering.

Mr. Barnet. Mr. Chairman, I am very grateful for the opportunity to appear before your committee. First of all, I would like to introduce Mr. Tom Mathews, counsel for Institute for Policy Studies.

Senator Ervin. We are very delighted to have you also.

Mr. Barnet. I am very pleased to talk on a very important aspect of the people's right to know, that is, the work of the public scholar, the man who is trained to observe the operations of the Government. It is unfortunately true, that the operations and activities of the public scholar have come in recent months under increased attack. The Institute for Policy Studies, of which I am codirector, was established in 1963 out of the belief that the public had a right to know. This belief was shared by a number of us who had been in government that an institution was needed that would be totally independent financially from government but close enough to government to undertake informed critical analysis of government policies.

We have studied the performance of the television stations and networks and how they might be improved. We have studied the prison system, health education, the military budget and the foreign aid program.

Perhaps most relevant to these hearings is the study recently concluded by three fellows of the institute on decisionmaking in the Vietnam war. It draws upon confidential information obtained in the course of more than 300 interviews with the officials involved in planning and executing the war. Much of the information concerning the decisionmaking on the war was made available only on a confidential basis.

The public scholar unlike the contractor, has a constituent far beyond the Government itself. It is the public. Unlike the pure academic, the public scholar does not gather information or make analyses primarily to educate specialists or other scholars but to make available to all citizens information helpful to them in making up their own minds on critical public questions.

The public scholar has emerged in research institutions, universities and foundations in response to a pressing social need. The framers of the Constitution understood that democracy was impossible without a free press in which journalists constantly searched out the truth and publishers printed it for the citizens in pamphlets, books, newspapers and other media. Without a free press to inform him as to what government was doing, what problems were facing it, how well they were being faced, and what alternative policies there might be, the citizen was in no position to pass judgment on what elected officials were doing. The framers of the Constitution understood that if government controls information it will effectively control elections too. This crucial political function of a free press has been the principal reason the Congress and the courts have sought to protect the rights of journalists to collect and disseminate information for the public for almost 200 years.

But today, however, modern society has become so complex and the pace of events so swift that the crucial task of keeping the public informed on vital public issues cannot be performed by journalists alone. The operations of government have become so vast, the issues so intertwined that the investigative reporter with the daily deadline cannot adequately serve the public's right to know. Any member of the working press will tell you that the man who must file four stories a day will give the public a less complete and less accurate picture than the reporter who files once a day. The reporter who can work on a story for a week will give a still better picture of what is going on. Digging out the facts, checking them against other facts, putting them into a broader context takes time. Newspapers are not usually in a position to give their reporters the time to investigate complicated public questions, particularly where government agencies seek to shroud their activities in secrecy. Only a small number of newspapers or broadcasting units maintain full-time investigative or research news staff. Even the number of part-time investigative assignments has shrunk to the point where the professional journalism associations have expressed concern. Daily, weekly, and even monthly journals cannot usually afford to support investigative reporters on assignments that take many weeks or months, particularly when they do not know whether anything newsworthy will result.

Investigations by public scholars published in the form of books, pamphlets, television reports, monographs and studies are filling the gap left by the decline of daily investigative journalism. For example, the investigative report which sparked much of the original interest in antipoverty programs was based on a report by Michael Harrington which first appeared in the New Yorker magazine. The first investigative report regarding dangers of pesticides was prepared by Rachel Carson as a long article and then as a book. The My Lai massacre story was the result of investigative reports by a free-lance author, Seymour Hersh, who did not work for a daily newspaper at the time. The work of Ralph Nader, done at an independent research group, is treated as news regularly by the media throughout the world. An independent research group, the American Enterprise Institute developed the computer-based survey of prices that provided the first statistical account of the effect of the national steel strike on consumer prices. The work of that group in assembling the figures from a myriad of corporate records was exactly similar to what the financial department of a newspaper could be expected to do if it had the resources. A recent survey of the economy of an economically depressed neighborhod in Washingington, D.C. conducted by a public scholar at the Institute for Policy Studies revealed that its tax expenditures greatly exceeded its tax returns in the form of welfare payments, services, and so forth. This piece of information was of considerable public importance because it challenged popular notions regarding tax-benefit ratios. There are a few examples of the public's dependence upon independent researchers for vital information which in simpler days might have been provided by the daily press.

Senator KENNEDY. May I ask a question, and for the matter of the record, it will appear at the end of the testimony.

As I understand, various court decisions have applied a different standard to organizations such as yours, in comparison with broadcasting and newspapers. Is that right?

Mr. BARNET. That is correct, Senator Kennedy.

Senator KENNEDY. Would you talk a little about how this has developed in recent time, and what the impact is.

Mr. BARNET. This has become of immediate concern to us, Senator Kennedy. Three persons associated with the institute study of decision-making in the Vietnam war have received subpenas from a grand jury in connection with work done on that study. The decision of some courts has been to make a distinction between those who work full time for a daily press, and those who work as scholars, authors, commentators—doing precisely the same thing—the same kind of investigation, but not with a full-time employment, as in the newspaper or TV.

It seems to us, Senator Kennedy, that this is a distinction that could not be reached under the first amendment, and my point in outlining the important development of the public scholar, is that the work of such investigative scholars and analysts, fullfils an essential function in serving the people's right to know, which cannot be adequately fulfilled by the daily news media. And the effort of this grand jury to subpena such scholars' work, has a very chilling effect on academic freedom and on the right of the people to get at the facts and to understand them.

Senator KENNEDY. Am I to understand that it is your feeling that public scholar organizations such as yours, shouldn't be distinguished from newspapers or magazines for newsmen's privilege purposes? In terms of the free society and the first amendment, certainly public availability of information and access to information are affected very similarly.

Mr. BARNET. That is exactly right.

Senator KENNEDY. And you have felt adverse effects from court decisions drawing such a distinction as they apply to individuals at the institute itself.

Mr. BARNET. Some of these questions are still under consideration, but there have been cases in the past where courts have sought to make a distinction between those who work for the daily press and those who investigate with a different form of publication in mind. And this is a distinction which interferes with rights under the first amendment, and could have, I think, a very serious impact on the free flow of ideas.

Senator KENNEDY. Does the newsmen's privilege bill that is before the committee cover the policy group studies?

Mr. BARNET. Yes, the language refers to commentators and authors, and I believe it would cover it.

Senator KENNEDY. Do you have any specific—I don't know if you would have any with you right now, but might your counsel have any specific recommendations or observations?

Mr. BARNET. Well, we will give that consideration.

Senator KENNEDY. We are open on that, if you would care to comment later.

Mr. Barnet. I appreciate that very much, because we feel that this same problem faces the public scholar, or the man who is writing a book or an article instead of a daily news story. It is particularly chilling in view of the sharp increase of classification laws and secrecy in the last generation.

Recently William G. Florence, a retired Air Force security officer, testified before the House Government Operations Subcommittee that there were—there are about 20 million classified documents and only one-half of 1 percent of them were really sensitive. He said that classification was becoming a way of life, a coverup for all sorts of governmental inadequacies and failure. But this happens because the system wants to give us the kind of information that they want us to have.

It is in the nature of controversial public issues, the very issues on which citizens most need to be informed—that important information is not readily available in libraries. Usually the only easily available information is what government agencies choose to release. The reporter or scholar who relies on handouts does a disservice to his profession and to the public. The conscientious investigator seeks to develop sources of information within the government in order to report to the public on how decisions are made and the implications of such decisions for the future. If he is forced to disclose his sources, those sources will disappear.

It is our policy at the institute to disclose every source we have consulted in our investigations, wherever possible, because we believe the public has a right to check the information communicated by public scholars. It would be our preference that Government officials be directed to deal directly, honestly, and openly with reporters and scholars and to take responsibility for what they say. But the reality is otherwise. An official who in good faith provides information which he believes is important for the public to know runs risks ranging from judicial prosecution to a transfer or reprimand. The most recent use of lie detectors in the State Department to establish the source of published stories is an example of the risks public officials run when they seek to deal candidly with reporters and public scholars.

In an ideal government dedicated to full disclosure consistent with national security there might not be a need for social policy which protects confidential sources. But in the age of overclassification, the calculated leak and the elaborate programs for misleading the public revealed by the Pentagon papers, it is essential to protect the independent investigative activities of reporters and public scholars.

If public scholars are denied the rights widely accorded newsmen to protect enough only to do a superficial investigation will continue to have access to essential sources but scholars with the time and background to probe the meaning and check the accuracy of the newspaper story will be cut off from sources of information. No public official will risk giving information if he fears that the scholar will be compelled to expose him before a grand jury or in court. Unless first amendment privileges apply as well to the public scholar, he will be effectively precluded from studying the very sensitive areas of public policy which the public most crucially needs to be informed.

Senator ERVIN. You define the public scholar quite well on page two of your statement as a trained observer and analyst of the operations of government who communicates his findings to the public. This was a simpler function when society was not as complex. As you point out, since society has become so much more complex, those who gather public news are in a rush to meet deadlines and do not always consider the meaning and the implication of the policies of government. For that reason, the public scholar renders a real service in furthering the purpose of the first amendment. That is the objective of your institution, is it not?

Mr. BARNET. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I agree with that completely. But I do want you to understand that in no way am I downgrading the daily press, because in many ways, they are doing an impressive job of investigating. But the fact is that they are covering many, many areas, where it is simply impossible to do the kind of investigation that is necessary given their pressures.

Senator ERVIN. You recognize do you not, that government has an interest in manufacturing the news, so as to make it appear that its policies and activities are the most desirable for the Nation. In an effort to do this, government supplies many persons—who in essence are public relations people—with many handouts. The temptation is great for a news gatherer to use one of these handouts even though he had not investigated the matter.

Mr. BARNET. That is right, Mr. Chairman, and of course the Vietnam war has had an absolutely disastrous effect. I know that very often in the early days of the Vietnam war, it was a common thing for the press to accept a handout that told us that such and such villages were secure. It was a good deal easier, and safer, to take their word for it, rather than to go out and visit the village.

Senator ERVIN. And so, some of these handouts were absolutely untrue, and did not reveal all the truths.

Mr. BARNET. That is true in the case of the handouts that I just referred to.

Senator ERVIN. Even concerning existing policies, after the Government had formulated and carried out a given policy, it would endeavor to present that activity in the most favorable light and suppress anything about it they did not want known.

Mr. BARNET. That is correct, sir. My example in the statement, the State Department, was that the administration seemed interested in concealing the maximum amount possible.

Senator ERVIN. I think there is one other thing—Government is very reluctant to release information that puts it in a bad light.

Mr. BARNET. Yes, sir, that is absolutely correct. We have seen many examples of this, particularly in connection with the Defense budget. It is very common, as you know, around the time of the budget hearings to receive reports of new secret weapons, and great increases in Soviet arms, which allegedly come from secret documents.

Senator ERVIN. That is something which those of us who are here on the Washington level—something that we feel very strongly about, that a man who Government employs, who hears things about his department—from which information comes, is——

Mr. BARNET. Yes.

Senator Ervin. You say in an ideal world or in an ideal society, Government officials or Government employees converse freely with public scholars who are conducting investigations. The public scholars would receive information freely from the employee. The employee could also discuss matters on a confidential basis with the assurance that his identity will not be disclosed.

Mr. Barnet. That is right.

Senator Ervin. So in your quest for information regarding a particular document or Government policy, you receive much information from sources which would cease to be available to you, if you were compelled to reveal their identity.

Mr. Barnet. That is right.

Senator Ervin. It is your position that any proposal or legislation concerning sources of information of the public scholar should be under the first amendment.

Mr. Barnet. Mr. Chairman, it is my opinion that the first amendment does now, and of course should cover confidential sources of information, for both news media and all persons who are in the business of investigating and communicating information to the public.

Senator Ervin. As you see it—as the late Justice Black stated—the first amendment is absolute in nature. I believe the current interpretation is that the only time it is not absolute is when the Government can demonstrate an overriding public interest or when a criminal prosecution is involved. There is undoubtedly a first amendment interest in the gathering of information and in the dissemination of truth. Government has an interest in enforcing laws which are necessary to protect society, including the first amendment. People often must seek some way to reconcile, as far as possible, both these interests. So we must consider that problem also.

Mr. Barnet. Yes, sir, that is true, and I can certainly see a number of situations where the conflicts occur. But I think in the area that we're talking about—the protection of confidential sources of newsmen and public scholars serves the best interest of the public.

Senator Ervin. I want to thank you for your very fine contribution to this hearing.

Mr. Barnet. Thank you very much.

Senator Ervin. This hearing is recessed, and will reconvene tomorrow, at 10 o'clock in room 318, Old Senate Office Building.

(The hearing was then duly closed at 12:50 p.m.)

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 1971

U.S. SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS OF THE
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to recess, at 10:05 a.m., in room 318, Old Senate Office Building, Senator Sam J. Ervin, Jr., presiding.

Present: Senators Ervin, Kennedy, Hruska, and Scott.

Also Present: Lawrence M. Baskir, chief counsel, and Bill Pursley, counsel.

Senator ERVIN. The subcommittee continues today to focus upon the relationship between Government and the broadcast media. Assisting us in this connection is one of America's most outstanding broadcast journalists, Mr. Walter Cronkite.

In addition, the subcommittee is indebted to Professor Jerome Barron of the George Washington Law School, and Mr. Lawrence Leamer, former associate editor of Newsweek magazine, for appearing before the subcommittee today upon very short notice.

I regret that Professor Philip Kurland and Mr. James J. Kilpatrick could not be with us today because of personal considerations. Both of these gentlemen have asked to be rescheduled in the hope they can appear before the subcommittee during these hearings.

At the conclusion of today's testimony, this series of hearings of freedom of the press will recess until October 12. At that time, we will resume our consideration of this important subject and continue on October 13, 14, and on October 19 and 20.

I understand that Senator Hruska would like to make a statement at this point. Senator Hruska.

Senator HRUSKA. These hearings on "Freedom of the Press" come at a time when there are more critical issues facing the Nation than at any other. The rights and responsibilities of the press are near the top of that list.

Today, as never before, the American people dote on the news. More people want to know more of what is going on, and more are willing to take the time to find out. To satisfy this urge people must naturally rely on the news media. The freedom which our Founding Fathers properly gave to the press thus takes on dimensions inconceivable to the drafters of the first amendment. Radio, television, satellites, the mails, and mass distribution of the printed word have combined to give the news media awesome power and authority in the affairs of the Nation.

This Senator would be among the first to praise the media for the general way in which they have accepted and met the responsibility which goes with this power. As Mr. Isaacs stated on the opening day of these hearings, the press has its faults and makes mistakes. I would agree, however, that these are primarily due to limitations in time and space as well as just plain human error.

Nevertheless, the subject at hand is most deserving of the kind of study the chairman has laid out. The Government's attitude toward the press should be clarified, and the need for legislation such as Senator Pearson's bill (S. 1311) must be carefully analyzed. At the same time, the responsibility of the press should be examined very closely. It is not alone for the media to tell the people how and what it is doing. I believe this type of inquiry by public officials who are directly responsible to the people through the ballot box is essential.

While it is understood that one of the news media's most important functions, as conceived by the first amendment, is to provide a check on government, less understood are the controls on the checkers. How absolute is the first amendment? Must we indeed tolerate abuses in the name of freedom? Is prior restraint of the press ever permissible or desirable? Is there a need for a reporter-confidant relationship? Is there a way to eliminate bias in the press without circumscribing its freedom?

The sensitivity of this subject should not deter us from exploring it fully, and on every side. I am sure the people would like to be educated in the various levels of judgment brought to bear on a news article before it reaches publication. Undoubtedly there are many who would like to go behind the scenes to watch a television network's activities as it puts together its daily news program which will be watched and, in many cases, taken as gospel by millions of Americans. This has been done in other ways and at other times, but I believe some further exploration by this subcommittee would be highly valuable.

The chairman is to be commended for scheduling these hearings, and for his usual forthright approach to the subject. This list of witnesses is impressive. Their contribution to our goal will be most helpful, I am sure. As elected officials, we of the Subcommittee must make our contribution as well. Our interest is manyfold. The majority of my constituent mail is motivated by articles in the press or by news reports on radio and television. These accounts make it plain that often we see the news one way and the media another. But this Senator happens to be a subscriber to the views of a former President who observed that one in public life should depart from the kitchen when the temperature rises too high for his comfort.

I would like to finally observe at this time that a critical examination of the press and its responsibilities does not constitute an attack on the first amendment. This bulwark against oppression should not be used as a shield against valid criticism. I am confident that the Chairman shares this view—his opening statement for these hearings makes it plain that he agrees.

There are 90 million television sets in 95 percent of American homes, and countless radios. In 1969 some 62 million newspapers were sold daily. As we say in the legal profession, res ipsa loquitur—the thing speaks for itself.

Senator Ervin. Mr. Cronkite, I want to welcome you to the subcommittee and express our deep appreciation for your willingness to appear and give us the benefit of your observations on what I consider to be one of the most important of the problems which confront our country.

STATEMENT OF WALTER CRONKITE, NEWS CORRESPONDENT, COLUMBIA BROADCASTING SYSTEM

Mr. CRONKITE. Thank you. Senator. I would like to express my appreciation to this committee for going into this subject with the view to drawing up whatever corrective legislation it finds necessary to bring up to date our guarantees of free press and free speech.

I would like to make it clear that I am speaking here only for myself today, and do not represent the Columbia Broadcasting System as such, and my association with CBS news staff is that of contract talent. That is a euphemism, I am sure.

The testimony I give today is completely my own, it has not been approved by CBS. I would hope that the executives thereof agree with most of it, but am not sure they agree with all of it.

Most of us in journalism are deeply concerned over such issues as right-of-access to news sources, Government secrecy, harassment by subpena, and the protection of news sources. These are concerns common to all communications media.

I know you are going to hear a lot about that from other media, and I would restrict my presentation, therefore, if I may, to the special problem inhibiting the freedom of broadcast journalism.

It is assumed, of course, that we do want a free press. Such is synonomous with democracy. There are a few who would argue otherwise. However, I daresay there is scarcely a public figure anywhere who has not at one time or another, perhaps more frequently than not, railed at his treatment by the press. And, of course, right here I am referring to the press as a generic term to include all media.

Senator ERVIN. As I stated at the opening of these hearings, I guess I am one of the few men in political life who doesn't complain much about his treatment at the hands of the press. The press takes me to task every once in awhile, but they have always been very kind, not attributing my hypocrisy to bad motives. They have always attributed it to a lack of mental capacity.

Mr. CRONKITE. I know from time to time, sir, and not always without reason, we are considered untrustworthy, disloyal, unkind, disobedient, sullen, cowardly, dirty, and irrelevant. And this is as it should be. To be trustworthy in one man's eye may not be to warrant trust in another's. While individual reporters or journalists may at one time or another place their loyalty at the feet of one man, or ideology, it is the very strength of a free press that not all reporters and journalists will do so. In this diversity, is the strength of the free press.

Down through our history, particularly at times of national stress, there have been calls for bringing the press to heel. Now, again, much is being made of that. Much is being made of the alleged prejudices and bias of newsmen, particularly those of us in this powerful new medium of television. These charges, I submit, are not unique to television.

So strident, we might be reminded, did they become that following the 1962 election that there were congressional demands then for investigation of newspaper bias. As late as the forties and fifties, there were demands for licensing of journalists. This was before television drew the attention of those who feel threatened by freedom of expression.

We newsmen are biased and we are prejudiced. We are human beings.

There is not a man who can truthfully say that he does not harbor in his breast some strong sentiments pro and con on most, if not all, of the issues of the day. Yet if there is any single hallmark of this professionalism we claim—indeed that distinguishing characteristic that makes us professionals and not mere craftsmen—is that we have learned in our journalism schools and in practice, to recognize the symptoms of personal opinions and to seek to avoid them in reporting the day's news. None of us succeeds in this difficult task in all instances, but we know the assignment and the pitfalls and, I submit, we succeed far far more often than we fail or that our critics would acknowledge.

We are far from perfect. There is a fair portion of what we do that is not done well. There are things that we are not doing, which we ought to do. There are challenges we have not fully met. We are a long way from perfection.

But that is not the point. How could we be improved by outside monitors without destroying the independence which is so essential to a free press.

Vice President Agnew was right in asserting that a handful of us determine what will be on the evening news broadcasts or, for that matter, which he didn't specify, in The New York Times, or The Chicago Tribune, or The Christian Science Monitor, or The Wall Street Journal, or anywhere else.

Indeed, it is a handful of us with this immense power, power that not one of us underestimates or takes lightly. It is a strongly editorial power.

With each item we report, we can and do seek factual honesty, fairness and balance, but we must also decide which news items out of hundreds available we are going to expose that day. And those available to us already have been culled and reculled by persons far outside our control.

The local newspaper, let us say the Kansas City Star, decides each day which of the events of its area will be covered. The local press service representative in Kansas City, AP or UP, decides which of those items will go onto his wire. A regional relay editor decides which of the items on the regional wire shall go on to New York, or Washington, or Los Angeles. And we decide which of these items remaining are to go on the air.

In the case of television, the decision frequently involves which items will be illustrated by film, which we freely acknowledge gives the item far greater impact than the paragraph recited by the broadcaster. And film choice, in a sense, also may be taken out of our hands by technical considerations—fogged film, unintelligible sound tracks, and a dozen things can go wrong. I don't mean to impugn my friends the cameramen, the most gallant and brave of our craft.

Many factors go into the decisions we make, so many and so complex that it would be hopeless to attempt to detail them here.

With the difficulty of proving a negative, I cannot in any way produce evidence to support the next statement. I can only give you my personal assurance—and what that is worth is only as much as you judge my veracity—but I assure you that I have never heard nor guessed nor felt that the news judgment in making any one of those decisions was based on a political or ideological consideration. Not one. I believe, I trust, that my colleagues at the other networks can say the same.

Yes, only a handful of professional journalists make the significant judgments on the news of the day, and it is a lot of power for a few men. But what would be the alternative? We would never get on the air or go to press if we attempted to submit each judgment to a committee of Congressmen, bureaucrats, sociologists, teachers, policemen, union leaders, or women liberationists, nor can we go to a plebiscite for each decision.

No one is suggesting, as far as I know, that ludicrous thought; but there are those who propose ex post facto examination of the journalist's copy's judgment, and this, on the surface, may seem innocuous enough. Far from it. It would be as effective a clamp on press freedom as direct censorship.

Any Government panel that presumes to call a news organization to account for its actions must be presumed to be hostile and scarcely would seek to investigate the reporting with which it agrees.

To place the licensed broadcast medium under the threat of such investigation, is to place it permanently under the fear of accountability to unfriendly antagonists wielding the power of legal restraint.

The effect would be more than chilling in broadcast reporting. It would put journalistic enterprise in the deep freeze with the rigidity and heart and compassion of a block of ice.

Rare, indeed, would be the station or network management willing to commit unlimited resources of its legal and executive staff to defend a documentary or daily reportage when it would be far more confortable simply to forego mention of the item or the subject.

Impossible would be the position of the journalist working under such understandably timid management. For each piece of potentially controversial reporting, and there is scarcely any copy, as my mail would prove, and that includes the weather, that is not controversial. He would, presumably, have to go to management for approval of every item.

Or, since this would be impractical, he would ignore the item and fill his broadcast with something less likely to involve his company and himself in lengthy review by nonprofessional and frequently politically biased critics.

It is not as if there were no monitoring on our performance in broadcast journalism. The newspapers have served this function very well. They have proved to be, and will continue to be, severe critics of the broadcast medium. There is adequate check and balance here between competing media to assure sound performance without the interference of Government.

To deny the free play of these forces by putting one of them under the surveillance of Government would be to deny the people a balance between media that can assure a free press we want.

News and dissemination cannot be accomplished without fear of failure, that is the only way that counts, and if the reporter or editor constantly must be looking over his shoulder for those who would have this product reflect their standard of right and wrong, of fairness and bias, that can't be achieved.

If broadcast journalism is brought to that state by the courts, or Congress, or anybody else exercising a right to question the judgment of its practitioners, then it ceases to be a virile seeker of the truth and becomes a pallid conduit for that propaganda which is palatable to the majority of the people, or the Congress, or the administration of the moment.

Let me go on to say, to point out, that the greatest threat to freedom of information, therefore, it seems to me, is the Government licensing of broadcasting.

Broadcast news today is not free. Because it is operated by an industry that is beholden to the Government for its right to exist, its freedom has been curtailed by fiat, by assumption, and by imtimidation and harassment.

That fiat comes through the Supreme Court. It has stated that as long as we are licensed by the Government, we are not as free as the printed press and, therefore, not eligible in the same manner for its first amendment guarantees.

Astride of this constitutional protection, broadcast news stands, before those in power, now or in the future who, for whatever motive, would like to see its freedom restrained. Some do this by assumption—assuming that a Government-licensed industry is fair game for legislative inquiry. The House Interstate Commerce Committee's attempt to investigate the CBS news broadcast, Selling of the Pentagon, is the most recent case in point and a perfect one.

Whatever the gentlemen of the committee thought of the broadcast, none alleged that any crime had been committed in the reporting, editing, or broadcasting of it. What they were examining was a matter of news judgment.

In the debate over the contempt action against CBS President Stanton that ensued, several members of the House expressed the belief that there was a need for legislation to control broadcast news. We do know that there have been bills introduced in this session of Congress, to "provide for more responsible news and public affairs programs," and "prohibit the broadcasting of deceptive news and public affairs programs."

Besides the restrictions that would be imposed by this assumption of power over broadcast news by Congress, our freedoms also are curtailed or endangered by intimidation and harassment.

There are the pressures exerted by high Government officials who suggest that if we don't put our whole house in order, that is, report the news the way they would like it reported, then "perhaps it is time that the networks were made more responsive to the views of the Nation, and more responsive to the people they serve."

The speaker might, indeed, disclaim any intention of censoring broadcast journalists, but when the speaker is a high official of the administration that appoints the Commission that holds life or death power over the broadcast industry, a broadcast journalist and his employer might be excused for thinking that it sounds like a threat. A timid broadcaster might very well feel constrained to avoid offending an administration whose spokesman openly carries such a club, whether he disclaims intention to use it or not.

This sort of executive department pressure inspires ancillary pressure—the stone in the pond and ripples thereform. Goverment bureaucrats, friends of the administration, Congressmen, and the general public, pick up the cue, and threaten local stations with Federal Communications Commission complaints if they do not make their news conform.

The FCC has a procedure, as you know, to handle such complaints, and it, in itself, provides a legal channel for harassment of broadcast journalism.

As you know, if the FCC thinks any complaint to it is worthy of answer, it can request an explanation from the station or network within 20, sometimes 10, days. If dissatisfied with the answer, the FCC may charge the network or station with violating the fairness doctrine and court action can ensue.

Any influential person or group can, with the most capricious complaint, fire a 20-day letter. To answer it, stations must strain their limited reserve of executive talent and time. Newsmen are diverted from their jobs to provide documentation to support the station's answer. It is only natural that station management should become timid, and newsmen should sidestep controversial subjects rather than face the annoyance of such harassment.

The ultimate intimidation is to attempt, or even threaten to attempt, through the licensing procedure, to take a station away from its owner.

Minority groups have used this practice to try to force broadcasters to pay greater attention to their aspirations. And when, shortly after Vice President Agnew's attack on The Washington Post, among others, that newspaper's recent acquisition of a station in Miami was challenged. Broadcasting magazine felt it important to note that "several persons importantly involved, in the competing application, were friends, supporters or former business associates of President Nixon."

We certainly would not want to inpugn the motives of any such group, but the Post management might have had some cause to wonder whether this action constituted a subtle warning. In any case, one would not expect such tactics to influence the editorial position of so powerful and financially substantial a paper as The Washington Post and its television station manager. But can we be sure?

What about a station placed in a similar position with the resources, or, for that matter, the tradition of independence of The Washington Post? And, even on the Post, might there not be a tendency—just a tendency, ephemeral, unspoken—to "avoid offending" until this thing blows over?

Over news broadcasting then hangs perpetually this cloud of Government license.

Licensing came about because in the early days of radio, and then, again, in the first days of television, there were only a few frequencies or channels available and clearly some authority had to assign them. But even in the conception of the Federal Communications Commission Act, there was recognized a need to protect the freedom of broadcasts. The law specifically forbade censorship by the regulating agency. The law only gave the new authority the right to determine that the licensee operate it in the "public interest, convenience, and necessity."

The FCC has interpreted that right to examine a station's programing, to require a certain portion of time to be allotted to so-called public affairs programing, to provide rebuttal under the fairness and equal time doctrines.

Tribute should be paid to the wisdom of Federal Communications Commission members, past and present, that the regulatory body has not gone further. But the power to make us conform is too great to forever lie dormant. The axe lies there temptingly for the use of any enraged administration—Republican, Democrat, Wallaceite or McCarthyite. We are at the mercy of the whim of politicians and bureaucrats and whether they choose to chop us down or not, the mere existence of their power is an intimidating and constraining threat in being.

And yet the situation that caused this power to be vested in Government largely has been dissipated by technological progress. Since the law's inception the ultrahigh frequencies in television and frequency modulation (FM) band in radio have been developed and scores of additional channels have become available.

A little recognized fact is that, today, in many markets it is not the availability of channels but the capability of economic survival that limits the number of radio and television stations.

Let me repeat: In a great many cities today, including major markets, there are unused radio frequencies and television channels and the number of broadcasting stations is not limited as much by technical considerations as by a market that will support only a maximum number of stations, the same rule of the marketplace that determines the number of newspapers in a community.

Putting it more simply: The doctrine that the air belongs to the people because broadcast channels are a rare resource is today largely myth.

The myth is further exploded by the advent of cable television. The wired cities of tomorrow—not using the "people's air" at all—will have an almost unlimited number of channels available.

In passing may I note that one might be excused a certain sadness in observing the hope with which special-interest groups seek access to the airwaves. They somehow have deluded themselves into believing that access to an audience assures an audience. Nothing, obviously, could be further from the truth. If these groups were given a half hour in the middle of a network's evening prime time broadcast schedule, there is nothing to assure that a single viewer would still be with them at the end. The same is true whether they owned their own station or had unlimited access to a cable television channel. The fight to get on the air may seem like a great and heroic battle against insurmountable odds to those who so desperately seek and need a voice, but more access could prove to be a tragically hollow victory for them.

But already without the cable and without the maximum use of all the available radio frequencies and television channels, there is no monopoly in broadcasting. That myth, too, should be exposed.

Already there are more radio and television stations than there are daily newspapers in the United States. There are 1,766 daily newspapers, but there are 6,976 radio stations and 892 television stations.

It is the rare city today that is not served by more television stations and radio stations than by newspapers.

There are more television networks serving radio and television stations than there are general news agencies serving the newspapers.

The monopoly today is in publishing, not broadcasting. Broadcasting has brought this about, so splitting the advertising dollar that only one newspaper can exist in most American cities.

Unfortunately, too, broadcast news is not an adequate substitute for the newspapers it has driven out of business. I happen to believe that we do what we do rather well, but our time limitations and the transient nature of what we do will forever prevent us from taking fully the place of the printed page with its greater bulk of news and its permanent, timeless accessability. We cannot supply the wealth of detail that the informed citizen needs to judge the performance of his city, county, state or nation.

If we do our jobs thoroughly, however, we can be a superb monitor—perhaps the only one—on the monopoly newspaper to assure that it does not by plot, caprice, conspiracy, or inadvertence miss a significant story.

We can do that, gentlemen, if we are left alone to perform that essential journalistic function. The trouble is, of course, that we are not free, we are Government licensed.

So we have on the side a monopoly press that may or may not choose to present views other than those of the dominant majority. On the other side, a vigorously competitive but federally regulated broadcast industry beholden to the favor of the powerful for its existence.

This scarcely could be called a healthy situation. There is a real danger that the free flow of ideas, that the vitality of minority views, that even the dissent of recognized authorities, could be stifled in such an atmosphere.

The untrammeled, uncontrolled flow of information betweeen our people, and our people and our Government and the essential confidence of the people that they have access to the truth could reach a perilous state in this Nation if broadcasting is not set free, as free as the printed word.

The least that must be done, and really it is only a minimal remedy, is to legislate assurances that the restrictive laws or Government decrees do not interfere with broadcast journalism's full exercise of those freedoms of press and speech guaranteed by the first amendment.

That would be a restraining influence on those who would contro us, even as it has proved to be the unbreachable barrier protectin the printed press.

Even this easiest and smallest step is flawed. For even with suc legal assurances, the law cannot protect a licensed broadcast statio against oblique pressure from the politically powerful who may tak offense at the station's news reporting. Motivation is difficult t prove, and as long as broadcasting is under Government license, har assment is possible through many means that ostensibly would hav no direct relation to news operations.

The cleanest and perfect solution—clearly much harder to obtai than the first amendment guarantee would be to eliminate all Gov ernment control of broadcasting. Clearly a Federal authority woul have to assign channels and monitor the station's technical perform ance to assure that it remained on its frequency with the prope power. But, as I have suggested here before, the time is past whe here can be any legal justification for controlling broadcasting's pro gram content. There is no monopoly today. The open competition o the market place, the laissez faire economy in which we are sup posed to believe, does pertain in broadcasting. There is no reason t believe that broadcasting, set free, would not act with the same vari ety of motives, principles, and performance that have worked prett well in publishing. There would be horrid stations and good, even a there are today under license. There would be some that rendere excellent journalistic service, and some that belied the trust in the —even as there are newspapers with such marks today.

As for the fairness doctrine, and equal time and the people' access to the people's air—the Nation has done rather well withou imposing these artificial standards on the newspapers.

The difference between publishing and broadcasting today ar mostly myth. They are perpetuated by a set of endless reflections i opposing mirrors. Broadcasting is different because it is Governmen licensed. Broadcasting needs to be licensed because it is different. I there is any chain of reason that binds this theory together it ha rusted through time and technological development and today it weaker links have the strength of wet tissue paper. It exists becaus no one of authority, until perhaps now, has dared to undertake clos examination of it.

This may not be the proper body to do that. But I would urg you to give the matter some consideration as you ponder means o protecting our freedoms of press and speech. It may prove an ulti mate solution. Meanwhile, the most immediate need and the strong est interim measure would be to grant us broadcast journalists imperfect as we may be but as eager and dedicated as we are, th protection of the First Amendment as surely the Founding Father would have intended. To fail to do so. would be to deny the people powerful tool in their attempt to exercise their right to know and t perpetuate a system that cannot assure the freedoms fundamental t the maintenance of our democratic form of life.

Senator Ervin. It always seemed to me that the Foundin Fathers put the First Amendment in the Constitution for two rea ons: As philosophers they believed that free and full discussion of all public questions would make certain that the American people would not be subjected to the worst kind of tyranny, which is tyranny of the mind; and as pragmatists they recognized that full and frank discussion of all public issues was necessary to the proper function of the institutions, which they established. They proceeded upon the theory that, if you left truth free to combat error, truth would ultimately prevail.

It seems to me they were actuated by the principle that Christ once expressed: "You shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free." As I infer from your statement, you take the position that the First Amendment applies, or at least should be recognized as applying, to all medias by which ideas are communicated, and that the broadcasting media is entitled to the same rights and same protection as the print media is entitled to.

Mr. CRONKITE. I feel that is absolutely essential, sir, absolutely essential.

Senator ERVIN. The Supreme Court in interpreting the Radio Act of 1927 and the Communications Act of 1934 has held in substance that there is an obligation resting upon the broadcasting media. It has proceeded upon the theory that owing to limited broadcast frequencies it is necessary for the Government to make an allocation of those frequencies among those who wish to engage in broadcasting. In interpreting these acts the court has said that the Congress has established three obligations on the part of the broadcast media. Briefly stated, they are, first, an obligation to present both sides of a public issue; second, an obligation to give equal time where political editorializing or political broadcasting is done; and third, an obligation to give an individual who is subject to personal attack an opportunity to reply.

I would like to have any comments you might make on that in addition to those that you set forth in your written statement.

Mr. CRONKITE. Senator Ervin, I believe I can only repeat, reenforce perhaps what I said here. I feel that all of these regulations were set down and the rulings were based upon early interpretations of the limited number of stations available. This doesn't really apply any more.

Yes, there is a limitation, a technical limitation, although that can be opened up by certain technical developments and even an assignment of some frequencies that are withheld for various Government reasons and not used, but that is still beyond the point.

We have found in this country, in the publishing business, that without any controls over publishing, the most powerful newspapers may be charged by some with denying them access to answer, with denying them fair treatment, with denying them those guarantees that legislation and these FCC doctrines are attempting to guarantee in broadcasting, but there are other papers that will print their side. We don't have a one-party press in this country. Oddly enough, in every political election there are charges of "one-party press" but they come from both parties, and so clearly I don't think it really applies and we know that it is not so.

Tribune could be looked at by some as a right-wing, conservati Republican newspaper. There is a balance through the laissez fai operation of publishing in this country. Now the situation is getti more difficult in small cities and large in this country where on one newspaper exists. Those monopoly newspapers in almost cases across the country so far have proved to be responsible. T old-line publishers have proved to be good men, they know t responsibilities of monopoly publishing, they try to make their ne columns fair, they try to give everybody equal access and chance those pages. But sometime, somewhere (maybe it is happening tod and we don't know it), the monopoly newspaper changes publish and the next publisher may be evil in his intent to control the ne in his town. Already today the news in the minority paper might happening today through inadvertance. When there is only o newspaper there is no monitor.

In my younger days as a young man on a competing newspap the first thing we did when the opposition paper came out, was fl it on the desk to see what stories we missed and what actions missed on the stories we had covered to be sure we couldn't accused or charged with having missed the news and also to kee our circulation up. That doesn't happen today. And monopoly new papers can sit there and unless somebody calls them on the sp could eventually almost quit covering the town or a single report might fail to report something he thinks is unfair to his friend the county court building or city hall. But what we have now in t city are three or five or sometimes eight or nine or ten radio st tions, perhaps two or three television stations. They are the monito on the monopoly publisher to be sure that this does not happ by inadvertence or, as I have said, by plot or conspiracy.

Throughout the country there are all of these stations availab Now, one of those may indeed be unfair but if you get one that unfair you will find another that is going to see the same opport nity that we used to see in competitive publishing to capitalize the unfairness of the other. He will come back and show how fair is and thus win the audience that the other fellow is going to lose continued unfairness. Competition is there and as long as it is the then any of these restrictions are inhibitive.

These restrictions might quite conceivably be necessary if it we true that broadcasting were a monopoly. Put only one newspaper a city or town and only one television station, and mutual ownersh would be another problem. But that is not the case. We have go technologically beyond that stage and I think these are old-fas ioned rules and regulations and they no longer pertain.

Senator ERVIN. There is no doubt that people have a somewh friendly idea toward freedom of speech and press. We all welcom the expressions of opinion of those with whom we agree and praise them, but we have some difficulty in being ready to extend t same freedom to people whose ideas are hateful to us. Doesn't hi tory teach the fact that Government is always fearful of the pre or any other media of communication expressing ideas that do n project the Government in the light in which Government thinks ought to be presented?

Mr. Cronkite. Always, sir, and it applies to every administration and every political party, every ideology.

Senator Ervin. The history of expression and the press shows that in all generations, at least since the invention of movable type, Government has tried in one way or another to intimidate the press and make it say what the Government wants it to say. Isn't that true?

Mr. Cronkite. It goes down through history.

Senator Ervin. Shortly after the printing press was invented, the English Government instituted licensing for the printing of books or pamphlets or the operation of newspapers. Of course this system of licensing was finally abolished.

Do you have any doubt in your mind that the Supreme Court would hold an act of Congress which undertook to require the newspapers to be licensed by the Federal Government, before they could operate as a violation of the first amendment?

Mr. Cronkite. Not a chance in the world, that the Court would not do so.

Senator Ervin. Now, your contention, which you present most ably, is that——

Mr. Cronkite. Senator Ervin, could I address myself to that last question? Not only is it a question of the Supreme Court not accepting such an act of Congress but I think it is so generally accepted in this country, particularly by those of any authority, and wisdom in these matters, that bills to do so never get anywhere here. They have been introduced from time to time. I don't know what the frequency of them is. But in the 1952 days, there was all this indignation about the biased press among Democrats and they were coming in and bringing in bills to license the press or bring it under control. They don't get anywhere because it is just fundamental that you can't do that and maintain this bastion of democracy which is the free press in the country, and they know futhermore they are not going to get past the Supreme Court.

Senator Ervin. You point out that there is no longer a monopoly on the part of any broadcast media as there was—I don't think there ever really was—but it is very interesting in connection with the figures you give in your statement to note that in Washington, the Capital, we have 19 FM radio stations, 20 AM radio stations, seven TV stations and only three daily newspapers. This indicates the absence of monopoly of the broadcast media as far as the Nation's Capital is concerned.

Now, I think that the legislation we have on this subject arose out of a realization that the broadcast media, particularly the television stations which operate on VFH frequencies, are undoubtedly the most powerful means of communicating ideas, and a fear that they might present one political side of a controversy and thus control the elections in the country. Also the legislation grew out of a fear that there may be a personal attack and no way of redressing it.

Now, there is no doubt that the broadcast media like the printed page would be held responsible under the law of libel and slander in cases of unjustified personal attacks.

Mr. Cronkite. Not at all. That has worked pretty well in restraining the press in this country.

Senator Ervin. You take the position that the FCC is like a sword that hangs perpetually over the broadcast media.

Mr. Cronkite. Yes, sir, I do. I think that what you have is this: Perhaps we have reached at the moment a pinnacle of this pressure against television and the news media generally; We might find we get into a valley later when the pressure is off for a while. It usually works that way in these matters. But it can come back again at any time. At any time an administration is offended this threat can be raised again and it is a constant threat in being that is certainly deleterious to full operation of a free broadcasting medium.

Senator Ervin. Is there any law placing any obligation upon the newspaper with respect to what opportunities exist for a person who feels that he has been subject to personal attack, so far as you know?

Mr. Cronkite. No; except I do get back to this. Except the journalist's sense of fairness and his responsibility and this operates pretty well.

There are evil publishers, there are always going to be evil publishers even as there are going to be evil Senators and evil Congressmen and evil industrialists and evil consumer advocates and evil everything else. There are bad eggs occasionally. But generally through the publishing history of this country, the proof has been that the big papers, the good papers, the powerful papers, are also fair for the most part.

Senator Ervin. From my own experience, on three occasions I felt the necessity to reply to what I considered personal attacks. I didn't think the newspaper publishers were evil, but I thought they were considerably misguided. They attacked positions I had taken and while I normally never explain, your enemies won't believe you anyway, I did on these three occasions feel I ought to reply. Twice the publishers were from North Carolina newspapers, and one was The Washington Post. I replied and explained my side of the issue and they freely gave me space, and I think The Washington Post on that occasion gave me three-quarters of a full page.

Is it your view that anyone who feels that he has suffered a personal attack will ordinarily be given an opportunity by the broadcast media, just as they are given by the press, to present his side of the case?

Mr. Cronkite. Absolutely, sir, absolutely. It has proved to be so up to now and I see no reason why that should change.

Senator Ervin. I have frequently said that I think the First Amendment was drafted not only for the brave but also for the timid. One of the dangers that arises out of governmental regulation is that the timid will cease from printing anything which Government doesn't like.

Mr. Cronkite. This is the very heart of the matter, Senator.

Senator Ervin. It is just as easy to destroy freedom of speech and freedom of the press by intimidation and implanting fear as it is by an absolute ban of this kind.

Mr. Cronkite. Absolutely. The great danger is silence through timidity. I would rather have the newspapers and the broadcasting medium make all of the errors in the world than be quiet and silent on issues of importance to the people. We can get through the errors eventually but if silence is the case there is no hope.

Senator ERVIN. I am not knowledgeable enough in the field of technology, but you pointed out as far as UHF stations are concerned that there has been a development which permits the use of many more channels than there were available originally. What about VHF stations?

Mr. CRONKITE. VHF, I think, I don't have those facts immediately in front of me. I didn't come equipped with all of the technical details, but in VHF my assumption is that most of those channels are occupied and in full use, they are not available.

It is interesting, sir, that on UHF, and this is becoming more and more popular thanks to the wisdom of FCC Commissioner Minow who pushed through putting UHF on all sets, 56 percent of the 625 UHF channels in the country, 350 of them are currently available for prospective applicants, and they are located in 277 cities, 68 percent of the total number of cities covered by UHF. The channels are available in major markets: Albany, Schenectady, Troy, Birmingham, Boston, Buffalo, Charleston, Huntington, Cincinnati, Dallas, and Forth Worth. You can go on. It is a long list. Miami, Kansas City. A long list where UHF television channels are available and people are not applying for them. It is an economic circumstance that makes it difficult. They probably couldn't survive in the community.

Senator ERVIN. And that same circumstance is what controls the newspaper industry also, is it not?

Mr. CRONKITE. Precisely.

Senator ERVIN. Your solution to the problem, I think, is stated very succinctly on page 20 of your statement. You say: "Clearly a Federal authority would have to assign channels and monitor the station's technical performance to assure that it remained on the frequency with the proper power".

That would be the limit of Government regulation, would it not, under your view of the matter?

Mr. CRONKITE. Absolutely.

Senator ERVIN. And the broadcast media in all other respects would be granted the same freedom to report news and to express ideas that are granted to the newspaper industry.

Mr. CRONKITE. Without exception. I think that some stronger laws are needed to protect press freedoms generally, the subpena problem and right of access and a few things like that, but what I am saying here primarily is that television and radio journalism, should be put under exactly the same blanket guarantees of freedom as the press.

Senator ERVIN. To be sure there are some people in all media of communication who succumb to the temptations to slant the news, and my observation for different media of communication leads me to the belief that in the great majority of instances that they make a distinction between what is news, which they report normally, very objectively, when they are opinions which they rather editorialize, just as the press man operates in the best fashion.

Mr. CRONKITE. I believe there are sins committed, of course, in news slanting, bias and prejudice shown, but I think these are far fewer than some of the accusations would indicate, and against broadcasting particularly. I think that we can safely say that most broadcast journalists are observing the same high standards of objectivity—which, in contrast to some of my friends I believe is perfectly possible to achieve—that the newspapers do.

I might note that a lot of criticism, as you have suggested yourself, sir, is in the eye of the beholder.

On the same broadcast we frequently get letters of complaint from two opposing sides and I had it just the other day. I had an interview with the commissioner of corrections in New York, Mr. Oswald, on the matter of the Atticca tragedy. I had letters that came back to me. I would like to cite a couple. Here is a case which I wouldn't have thought was basically a major political matter, it was a straight interview with him. But one letter says:

> Interrogating Commissioner Oswald did more to uphold the lawless in the prison than the law-abiding citizens of New York. The reporters for years have started more trouble with your slanted questions than any comments.

On the other hand—

> The last thing our country needs right now is for the network to give free time to public officials who defend official murder without at least presenting the minority opinion.

These are pro and con on the same broadcast. Some accuse me of showing bias toward Mr. Oswald, others claim I show bias against him for the "lawlessness" on the other side.

I think this is inevitable, every newspaper publisher knows this, every broadcaster knows it. This we are willing to face. That is part of the game. It's not part of the game, however, when those who have political power say you are slanted because you do not agree with my particular view and my ideology and, therefore, you must be brought under even stricter controls or lose your license to operate.

Senator ERVIN. To corroborate your statement, I served on the Watkins Committee which recommended the censorship of Senator McCarthy. I immediately got about 4,000 telegrams and letters telling me what a miserable wretch I was and I got about 4,000 letters and telegrams telling me what a great patriotic service I had rendered and I had to make a talk to the eastern North Carolina press a few days later and I didn't have time to get up a speech and I talked out of some of the most emphatic of those letters and read them to the press meeting and all of the editors assured me that reminded them of the kind of mail they received.

I have always liked an expression, I can't quote it exactly, of Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes in which he said, "The validity of any idea lies in its ability" or rather "The validity of an idea lies in its ability to get itself accepted in the market place of ideas," and I take it your position is that there should be a freedom of speech for all media of communications and that in the long run the people will be able to determine which are valid and which are not?

Mr. CRONKITE. Yes, sir. E. W. Scripps said it and I think it is carried in the masthead of his newspapers, "Give people light and they shall find their own way."

Senator ERVIN. Senator Hruska.

Senator HRUSKA. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Your statement was very helpful. It seems to me to reflect your philosophy very well and we appreciate your presence here this morning.

In the course of your statement you say, among other things, "it is not as if there were no monitor on our performance and broadcasting journalism. The newspapers have served this function well. They have proved to be and will continue to be severe critics of broadcast medium."

Is the converse true, Mr. Cronkite?

Mr. CRONKITE. That we are monitors of the newspapers?

Senator HRUSKA. Severe critics of them when the occasion arises for such a position?

Mr. CRONKITE. I don't think that we do nearly enough of this. There have been from time to time programs and there may be in local markets programs of viewing the press on the part of the broadcast media. We had one at CBS that has been on from time to time. It has not been a highly popular program as far as ratings go and I suppose that is why it is not on the air today. But at any rate, we don't do enough of that, I would agree with you, Senator Hruska. But I don't think that is the important aspect of our monitoring of the press. We monitor them by doing our own coverage, by competing with them in reaching news sources, in attempting to assure that all aspects of a story are covered where they might have missed—one aspect or another. This is the area of monitoring where we are most effective and are the only available means.

Senator HRUSKA. Well, we have known of newspapers that criticize each other, both editorially and otherwise. Sometimes it is a feud that lasts for generations within a community. And it is said of some newspapers that they wait for the other newspaper to take a position and when it does they take the other side of the position as if by knee jerk reaction.

Is there any comparable situation within your world as a commentator. of the CBS and NBC and so on?

Mr. CRONKITE. Well, sir, I think that probably there is not on the air so much. There certainly is in print when others interview us. We occasionally write articles and so forth. There has been considerable debate between us as to objectivity, slanting, all that sort of thing. There are different views. Not everybody holds mine. I didn't come here representing broadcast journalists as a group, only my own views. That is certainly true. But I don't know, on a network level, which is what you asked, of any feud that has been set up similar to those which have racked publishing in some cities over the years. I don't think that that, however, is a very important consideration. If we did more editorializing, did more commentary on television, I think that probably would ensue eventually. It would come about, because certainly network newsmen do not view every issue in the same manner. So that it could undoubtedly come about. But there isn't that commentary, that editorializing on network television today and I don't think there is likely to be. There isn't the opportunity for it.

Senator HRUSKA. There would be general agreement that feuding after all probably is not the most correct basis nor the most desirable.

Let us remove from this discussion the matter of feuding and say difference of opinion and criticism. Certainly occasions must arise when one network pursues either a given slant or a given comment to a point where it is not in agreement with those views which you or CBS officials hold. Is there any disposition under those circumstances to criticize the other network or the viewpoint they take or is there some sort of a professional courtesy which is extended within your fraternity so that one doesn't hit the other if the other won't hit him?

Mr. CRONKITE. Senator Hruska, if I thought the other network slanted its news or injected editorial opinion into its news broadcast I think I would find some occasion to make clear that what they were doing was wrong. I think I would in some way find a way to emphasize the fairness of our broadcasting, hold us up against what I thought was wrong about their reporting. But that hasn't happened yet, sir, in my opinion. I don't have any reason to have that attitude toward their broadcasting. Now I think we should differentiate here between straight news broadcasting and commentary. Straight news broadcasting is laying out the facts as clearly as you can and as honestly as you can with the problems and limitations which I point to here, but done as objectively as your principles tell you it must be done. But then if you want to take time on your news broadcast period, you can put in a special feature, an individual who will have comments beyond those of straight news. It can be analysis which is simply taking the news and breaking it down and trying to point out the various aspects which have fed into that particular story and influenced that story. It can be commentary which is the individual's opinion of that story or it can be editorial which would urge action on that story in one direction or another. It can be one of those three things.

Now, we at CBS believe that Eric Sevareid on "The Evening News" is an analyst. He borders upon commentary at times. This is a very thin line at times and we would be the first to acknowledge, that he gets into personal opinion occasionally. He swings over that line because it is very hard to hue to strict analysis, and even there, you are picking out the things you are going to analyze and throw into the mix.

On the other hand, at ABC, Howard K. Smith and Harry Reasoner do a commentary which they frankly label as a commentary and it is a commentary. It is their opinion on a story of the day in the news.

On NBC now David Brinkley is doing a piece, David Brinkley's Journal, which is uniquely his and it is analysis sometimes and commentary a great deal of the time. It almost borders, I would say, on editorial in suggesting a course of action. It seems to me that getting into that is perfectly all right, it is fine. I wish we all had more time to do that sort of thing. I think it is a use of the medium which should be explored and we don't under our present time limitation for the news. I have a strong feeling we can't nearly get all of the news in a half hour we need to and, therefore, commentary and analysis maybe should take a back seat.

All right, given all of this, I don't necessarily agree with what

Howard K. Smith or Harry Reasoner say. I don't know what percentage of the time but perhaps a fairly substantial amount of time I don't agree with what David Brinkley says. I don't agree with what Eric Severeid says a portion of the time. But I don't have the access nor should I, nor do I wish the access, (I probably could have it if I begged and pleaded and asked and screamed and hollered and kicked my feet) to do a commentary of my own. I don't do that. Therefore, I am not answering Eric Sevareid or answering David Brinkley or answering Harry Reasoner or Howard K. Smith nor are they answering me because I am doing news, nor are they, to get more direct to your question, answering each other except in the implications of the things they say.

It may be that we are being a little more dignified than the press in the past that carried these battles into their own news pages and on to their front pages. At any rate, that, I think, is the way we are operating.

Senator HRUSKA. Of course, there is a very, very thin line, isn't there between commentary and editorial? After all, if an editorial is defined, we conceive of its essence as being an urge to action. What difference is there between an editorial and a comment if the comment says political figure No. 2 is a very undesirable rapscallion coupled with a bill of particulars that will be very damning. They don't have to go the step further that would make it an editorial and say, therefore, do not vote for him, vote for his opponent.

Now, at the same time implied in it is that he is such a bad character he shouldn't receive any further consideration for your support. Now, where is the line? Would you have to use the last words in order to make it an editorial?

Mr. CRONKITE. I think it is sort of unnecessary argument but the point might be made, sir, that you are not urging people to not vote for the fellow; maybe people want that kind of fellow to represent them.

Senator HRUSKA. It could be. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRONKITE. So actually I do agree with what you say, between all of these things there is a thin line. The analysis is way over on one side and editorial way over on the other. As they move from one category to another the line is indeed quite thin, I agree with you there.

Senator HRUSKA. Now, in your statement you also suggest that the time has passed where there can be any legal justification for controlling broadcasting program content.

Would you consider that there is an element of controlling program content in the so-called fairness doctrine?

Mr. CRONKITE. Yes, in a sense, although I think that is something of a stretch to call it controlling content, but the case can be made, I believe, Senator Hruska. The case can be made in that it controls content through this intimidation of which I speak, through the thought in every news man's mind that somebody is looking over his shoulder and that if he is not performing in conformance with their standards, which may be based purely on political ideology and bias, that he is going to have to spend a great deal of time documenting what he has done, answering inquiries about what he has done, explaining to his management what he has done, because the management lawyers are the ones who have to answer the FCC and so forth.

Yes, sir, I think in this sense it is an influence on a program.

Senator Hruska. Certainly it would result in some sense of inhibition, wouldn't it, leading some broadcast stations to avoid topics that would call for the application of the fairness doctrine by allowing somebody of opposite viewpoint to be heard and to be seen in opposition thereto?

Mr. Cronkite. If you mean it is an inhibition, yes, I think I understand you. It is inhibition of a station to not put on only one side of an issue. Is that what you are saying?

Senator Hruska. Yes.

Mr. Cronkite. I think that is probably so. It is inhibition in this case. But I am saying that there are enough stations available for that other viewpoint that you will get this very thing you were talking about in the publishing trade, you will get two stations locked into a debate here with one giving one side and the other the other.

Senator Hruska. Unfortunately those who clamor for the application of the fairness doctrine do not go to the other station, they insist on the one station that expressed a view in the first place be required to entertain their viewpoint and so that principle of competition doesn't apply.

Mr. Cronkite. Well, I think that is again in the view of the beholder. It could apply if they go to the other station. I don't see where they are being denied a voice simply because they are not given time and place exactly where the other broadcaster may. That is like saying that somehow or other you have to be able to roll back the clock and, because a newspaper on a certain date, with a newsstand sale that day was 100,000, printed a piece that was objected to, the next day you have to be sure that all 100,000 people who bought the paper the first day bought it the next day. There is no assurance of that in publishing, there is no assurance of that in broadcasting. Access is not an answer.

Senator Hruska. Now, you undertake to suggest that as a minimal remedy legislative assurances should be made that no restrictive laws or Government decrees interfere with broadcast journalism's full exercise of those freedoms of speech and press guaranteed by the first amendment.

Just how would you cast such legislation, what language would you suggest for that purpose?

Mr. Cronkite. Senator Hruska, if I were as skilled in that I suppose I would be on the other side of the table here. I don't know what specifically should be said in the legislation. I am not a lawyer. All I know is that it should be as clearly stated as the legal profession can state it to make it perfectly understandable to one and all that we are guaranteed exactly the same freedoms as the press.

Senator Hruska. Well, of course, you have suggested that there have been some proposals in this field to the contrary, for example, the licensing of the press, and they haven't even received any consideration because the fundamental proposition of the First Amendment is so paramount and so plain. I just wondered if that situation and that thinking should not apply to this?

Mr. Cronkite. I wish that that were so. As a matter of fact, this is a matter that has been discussed among us about this thing in a sense of legislation: that if you say that Congress has the right to say that we are under the first amendment guarantees, then presumably it has the right to say we are not under the first amendment guarantees. That we don't believe is so because the Constitution itself does say it, but I think clarifying legislation would be possible to make it clear that the intent is to leave broadcasting as free as the press. How specifically that is done in legal phrasing, I am just not qualified to say.

Senator Hruska. What is the line where criticism of the press, including the broadcast press, leaves off? Where is the line where such criticism leaves off and an attack on the First Amendment begins. Could you tell us?

Mr. Cronkite. Yes, I think so. I think so. There is no reason at all that the press should not be criticized, that broadcasting should not be criticized. Attack begins when a high official of Government that holds the power to appoint the Federal Communication Commission says that unless we put our house in order, the broadcast media must be examined; when a rather high official says that unless we put our house in order we must be called to account. Account to whom? "We must be brought down from our ivory tower." By whom; under what circumstances?

That to me is a clear intimidation and it has been interpreted as such by most of us in the press.

Now, the claim that this is not an attempt to censor the press may be a perfectly honest assertion by individuals making such a charge but the fact is that such oft-repeated statements certainly spread a state of alarm among us and the attitude on our part is one of repression. Whether it is meant that way or not it certainly is accepted that way and it certainly seems to me the evidence is there.

I have papers here (I thought it might come up) citing several instances, episodes of repression. They have been rather widely publicized but they all add up to this atmosphere of intimidation.

Senator Hruska. I wasn't speaking of intimidation as much as I was of criticism.

After all, one need not criticize but he can still try to intimidate. I mean real criticism. Because after all most of the commentary I have heard consists almost entirely of criticism of somebody. Once in a while they praise and they should be praised for praise, but primarily broadcast remarks consist of criticism and sometimes it is quite severe, sometimes it is considered fair and sometimes it isn't.

Now, in view of that fact I just wondered where is there ground for suggesting that such criticism is really an attack upon the rights that are guaranteed by the First Amendment on free speech and free press?

Mr. Cronkite. Well, I thought I said, sir, in regard to the fact that we are licensed. We are licensed, can be removed, our license can be taken away, the station management knows that is the fact, they live under this sword at all times. Those who are politically powerful, who can influence the TV Commission that has this power of execution says, "You are not performing up to your standards and if you don't we are going to take a stronger look at what you are doing."

What do they mean by that if that is not intimidation? What do they mean by it? If they say simple "You are not doing your job, we think you are not fair, you are biased, you are prejudiced, here is a bill of particulars on the way you are doing this." That is fair criticism. But the minute they say, "And if you don't perform" then that is intimidation.

Senator Hruska. Then it depends on who is making the criticism and the nature of the criticism, doesn't it?

Mr. Cronkite Yes, indeed.

Senator Hruska. Well, thank you very much.

Mr. Cronkite. Thank you, Senator.

Senator Hruska. I would like to have inserted in the record at this time an article published in The Wall Street Journal by Michael Gardner entitled, "When Fairness Gets Out Of Hand." It appeared in the Journal for September 8, 1971 and it bears on some of the aspects of the fairness doctrine to which reference was made a little bit ago.

Senator Ervin. I think we have an illustration of the suppression of freedom of speech by the Government in respect to North Carolina's principal agricultural product, tobacco, and with respect to one of the chief manufacturing industries, the manufacture of cigarettes.

The Surgeon General of the United States takes the position that he has absolute possession of all of the truth on the subject of cigarette smoking and those who disagree with him have none and he has persuaded Congress to pass a very curious law that outlaws advertising of cigarettes on the broadcast media but permits it in the printed media. And this business of tyranny is sort of contagious, like smallpox and other things, because the FCC now takes the position that you can attack cigarette smoking on the air but that cigarette smoking is no longer a controversial subject and, therefore, the cigarette people cannot reply to the attacks made by Government on cigarette smoking.

I won't ask for any comment from you on that but as a North Carolina Senator I say there is a great deal of controversy about this because it is illustrated by the story of this man who had been very prominent and on his 96th birthday anniversary all the newspapers send out a reporter to interview him and one of them asked him to what did he attribute his long life and he had some of the instinct of the Surgeon General and he said he attributed it to the fact he had never taken a drink of alcoholic beverage or smoked a cigarette in his life. Just that moment they heard a tremendous noise coming from the next room, it sounded like an earthquake and a cyclone rolling in together, and one of the newspaper men said, "Oh, Lord, what is that?" He said, "Nothing except my old dad in one of his chronic drunks."

Isn't this the fundamental parallel in respect to freedom of the press and freedom of speech? There is no freedom which cannot be abused. In other words, if a man has a freedom and can exercise the freedom. he can exercise it wisely or foolishly. And when you undertake to let Government regulate freedom to prevent abuses, you are in great danger of winding up stifling freedom and destroying freedom.

Mr. CRONKITE. Absolutely, sir. There is no way of exercising control without it becoming a political control really under politics of the street of the moment or politics of establishment or politics of what not. Whoever is in control controls and the news will, therefore, be cast in the light of those who are in power at the moment.

Senator ERVIN. The tobacco case indicates the power the FCC has assumed over the life of an industry. It says the Surgeon General has possession of all of the truth on the subject and those who disagree with him have none and, therefore, since the truth has been established to his satisfaction and ours you can't have equal time to reply.

Mr. CRONKITE. Right.

[From The Wall Street Journal, Wednesday, Sept. 8, 1971]

WHEN "FAIRNESS" GETS OUT OF HAND

(By Michael Gartner)

It would be a perfect question for a law school examination. Here are the facts:

Fact No. 1: An independent government regulatory agency has certain powers over the television industry. It has promulgated a "policy statement" that on "controversial public issues" both sides must be aired. For purposes here, we shall assume that the policy is legal.

Fact No. 2: Some years ago, this policy was expanded to include commercials for cigarets because there was persuasive medical evidence linking cigaret smoking to various illnesses. As a result, broadcasters airing cigaret commercials were required to show a significant (but not necessarily equal) number of anti-smoking commercials.

Fact No. 3: Later, because of the grave danger of smoking cigarets (or perhaps because of a political compromise), all commercials for cigarets were banned from television. For purposes here, we shall assume that the ban is legal.

Query: If a station continues to show anti-smoking commercials, is it required to present the prosmoking side, too? Expound and expand.

It seems easy. If you are stating one side of an argument and are required to give time to the second side, logic dictates that if you are espousing the second side of the argument you should be required to take notice of the first side. This exam is a snap.

Logic dictates that—but the law is not always logical. And a few days ago, this very question was decided in the illogical way. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit in Richmond, Va., upheld a Federal Communications Commission ruling that this fairness issue was up to the corporate consciences of the individual stations. In other words, stations that were required to air antismoking commercials and that have continued to do so on their own since the ban are not required to tell the other side of the story.

"It is reasonable for a licensee to assume that the detrimental effects of cigaret smoking on health are beyond controversy," the court ruled. Such an assumption, of course, is one that certain people—cigaret manufacturers, say, and perhaps millions of smokers—aren't willing to make.

A SECOND CHANCE

All right, you flunked Question One, but you have a second chance. Here is Question Two, based on the same fact pattern plus your new knowledge of the court's answer to Question One. Query: If a television station runs an advertisement urging the viewer to buy a certain kind of an automobile, is that such a "controverisal issue of public importance" that the station is required to present the arguments of people who contend that you shouldn't buy any car.

Well, you say, this one really is easy. If smoking is no longer a controversial issue, then driving certainly can't be, either.

Wrong again. Again, recently, a U.S. Court of Appeals—this one in Washington, D.C.—held in a two-to-one decision that the advertising of cars and leaded gasolines is a controversial issue and that antipollution forces must be given their say, in free ads or in documentaries or what have you. (This decision incidentally, ran counter to the position of the Federal Communications Commission.)

These two examples point up the complexities of the FCC's so-called fairness doctrine, a well-intentioned policy that lately, at least, seems to have gotten out of hand. The anti-smoking case is merely absurd. ("An utter joke," is the way one broadcaster terms it.) But the automobile case, in which the court seems to greatly extend the doctrine, raises an issue far broader than the pollution question before the bench.

The issue is simply, "Where do you draw the line?"

"Dentists are quite reasonably concerned about the effect of sugar-laden confections upon dental health, particularly among children. Should candy, gum and soft-beverage commercials be embraced by the fairness doctrine?" a staff report prepared for the Senate subcommittee on communications asked in 1968.

It went on: "Another minority . . . is determined that a substantial number of society's problems would be obviated if all consumed only 'natural foods.' Saturated fats are linked with heart disease. Firearms and ammunition arouse the passion of others, both pro and con. Among those lawfully licensed to practice the medical arts are some who oppose ingestion of medications of any sort, while their opposites may fervently believe them to be 'cultists' whose very existence constitutes a threat to public health. Religious beliefs militate against other products and services. . . . Just how far may the fairness doctrine be extended to embrace broadcast announcements favoring commercial products and services?"

The staff answered its own question. The fairness doctrine, it said, should not apply to "broadcast advertisements primarily soliciting or encouraging the purchase or use of a lawful specific product or service."

But even that answer, ignored by Congress, doesn't avoid the problem. What about issues and ideologies and concepts? The Army is spending millions for commercials to entice youths to sign up. Should antiwar groups be given time to shoot down the armed forces? Assume that a struck store is advertising its wares on television. Should the strikers be given time to say "Don't shop there, the store is unfair to its workers"? Suppose a woman is made to look like a scatterbrain in a promotional ad for a TV series. Should women's lib advocates be given time for rebuttal? Suppose the cancer fighters have an ad saying "give to cancer." Should the heart-attack fighters be given time to say their cause is worthier?

"There is almost nothing advertised that might not be deemed controversial by some group," maintains Grover Cobb, an executive vice president of the National Association of Broadcasters in Washington. If the fairness doctrine continued to be expanded, he says, "stations would be at the mercy of all types of fringe groups representing an infinite number of various opinions."

A man at a network in New York puts it another way. "If a station shows a spot for The Wall Street Journal," he says, "should we then have to give time to The New York Times?" And he answer himself. "Of course not. This is getting to be absolutely stupid. They're tearing us to pieces."

Thus, the nation's 625 or so television stations are in a dilemma. One way out, of course, would be for them not to accept ads that they know to be controversial—ads relating to the ecology arguments, for instance. But that is not a way out at all.

Earlier this summer, the Court of Appeals in Washington ruled that commercial television stations can't arbitrarily deny the purchase of time to espousers of controversial issues. That is, if you want to buy an ad urging peace in Vietnam (which, in fact, was the ad at issue), a station must sell it to you. But then, of course, with the fairness doctrine in operation the station must be prepared to give time to the opposing view.

"The only answer," says a network official in New York, "is to go noncommercial—then you would have no problems." Of course, you also would have no revenues and no profits, which could upset the stockholders.

THE FCC TO BLAME

The Federal Communications Commission itself opposed that decision, as it opposed the court's ruling on the antipollution issue. But the agency has only itself to blame. It is the agency, not the courts, that promulgated the vague policy in its ceaseless efforts to expand control into the nontechnical areas of broadcasting. (Control over the technical aspects is a necessity, of course; without it, anyone could compete for the same frequencies and chaos would result.) If no such doctrine had been laid down in 1949, no such court decisions would have been handed down in 1971.

In June, the seven-man agency announced that it would undertake a broad-ranging inquiry into the effectiveness of the doctrine. It is asking now for broadcaster suggestions, and it probably will report its recommendations and conclusions to Congress by mid-1972. Clearly, some changes are needed. "There are so many gray areas in the current doctrine," complains Mr. Cobb of the National Association of Broadcasters. "The fairness doctrine as it now stands is nebulous, hazy and unworkable."

It is indeed unworkable, as the spate of court decisions this summer has shown. And there seem to be just two workable conclusions that the FCC could logically reach: Keep the policy but simply take over the industry, parceling out time to whatever causes government czars might deem worthy; a private industry, concerned about making money, cannot afford this luxury. Or else abandon the policy and let the industry get back to running itself.

Anything in between these poles seems illogical and impractical. But, then, agencies, like courts, aren't always logical and practical.

Senator HRUSKA. If the chairman will yield, this article to which I referred and which has been inserted, gives us a further example. It discusses for example, the dentists, the dental viewpoint that eating of sweets by children is harmful to their teeth and so on.

Would that enable the candy manufacturers association to come in and rebut that sort of a viewpoint? Or the case, where the automobile association says, "Well, you can buy automobiles, especially in these days of economic difficulties, and get employment going again," and then there will be those who say don't buy automobiles because they emit poisonous gases and pollute the air.

Are these groups entitled to make their point and then is it up to the FCC to say whether rebuttal should be heard. Or should these views be banned outright. Sometimes it results in an incongruous situation.

Senator ERVIN. It results in the fairness doctrine becoming very unfair.

Senator SCOTT. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I will try not to say anything important, Walter, until the cameras come back on. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRONKITE. I was wondering how you fellows stand these lights.

Senator SCOTT. We can stand the lights in view of what they connote because they help us find our way.

Senator ERVIN. Maybe we are like our old partner, a reconstruction judge in North Carolina. A lawyer lost a point of law arguing before him and he said that the more lights you shed upon him the louder he got. Maybe that is our condition.

Senator SCOTT. I think that when I attend some of the executive sessions of the Judiciary Committee.

In part of your comment you say that any government panel that presumes to call a news organization to account for its action must be presumed to be hostile. I want you to clarify that because is that to be read the Federal Communication Commission with the power granted under the law is automatically presumed to be hostile by the networks and, if so, does that mean that the networks would respond defensively automatically to FCC regulations?

Mr. CRONKITE. I don't think so, Senator, and that wasn't quite my intent in there. I wasn't directing that at the FCC. As a matter of fact, the FCC has been quite good about the 20-day letters. As a matter of fact, I don't think it has relayed the more capricious requests they have for investigations. It has relayed those which are more important, and in most cases it has accepted network and local station explanations.

I was thinking more of the type of congressional investigation, well, as an example, the recent one in the House of the "Selling of the Pentagon" and others which could ensue if we are not protected from that sort of pressure or even if an independent group were set up as monitors on broadcasting, not the FCC charge as it is. As I say, I would like to see that gotten rid of, too, but a new panel of any kind, a committee action is even more dangerous. It is not likely to call anyone before the bar to explain reporting that it hasn't already decided is in some way unfair. We are going to be, we will be in front of the bar explaining every item on the program every night, which is impossible.

Senator SCOTT. I would think that would follow. I am simply asking a couple of questions here to clarify statements in your statement which left alone could be misleading. The other one is that the Government limits freedom of information through secrecy, their almost uncontrolled use of the document classification privilege. That is the end of the quote. And I would agree with those who say that we are overclassified and that it should release a vast amount of its classified material.

In that statement you would not mean to imply, I am sure, that Government should not retain certain essential secrets to the operation of the Government or the national defense or its intelligence operation? There is no such implication there is there?

Mr. CRONKITE. No, sir, Senator Scott. There is not. Clearly some secrets must be kept. I would like to think, though, that they were kept to the absolute minimum of those necessary for the function of Government and not used for political purposes.

Senator SCOTT. I would like to see that, too, because far too many papers are sent up here marked classified that everybody knows about already.

You had spoken of the bias implicit in silence and that to me is the theory of the dog that did not bark and I am wondering why there hasn't been more coverage on television and by the networks of the fact that, if it is a fact, that this was a long, cool summer, for example. I have seen very little. I know I am walking in the dangerous area where I say why don't you cover good news, there is no use you covering things that are routine and the fact people got up in the morning and did not have a fight with their wife and did not get fired from the job and did not murder anybody. I know that. But it seems to me it was essentially newsworthy, if it is true, that there was indeed a long, cool summer contrary to the predictions, many of them on television, that we could have expected a much more riotous and disruptive summer, and I will give you one other illustration and ask you to comment, and that is the better coverage, and there has been some good coverage, better coverage, for example, of the life of nonmilitant in the cities surrounded often by situations which might create a militant and which don't.

Why don't we have coverage of the things that do not happen and the nonhappening, is it news?

Mr. CRONKITE. Well, sir, I think it does get back to the good news syndrome in a way. The difficulty; what it really amounts to, is the bad news crowding out the good.

Senator SCOTT. Gresham's law again applied to the communication field.

Mr. CRONKITE. There is so much happening and we are in such constant turmoil and we have such limited time on the air, much too limited time on evening news broadcasts. To belabor what must be the obvious to at least a fair portion of the population is to us not a useful use of the time. It would be if we had more time, but with the limited time it doesn't take its priority in that order.

In the case now of the cool summer in the inner cities, this is an interesting story. There is no question about it. And, as a matter of fact, we are working on it right at this very moment. I am sorry I am telling the opposition we are. But it is something to be looked at now that we are at the end of September. I am not so sure, we thought about this not once but several times during the latter part of the summer—it would have been a good idea to have said at that point, "Look how lucky we are, everything has gone so well. Despite all of the provocations there haven't been any great riots in the cities this summer." Wouldn't that perhaps inspire somebody to say: "We will take care of that, let's have one?" I think it is better to wait until the period is finished and you take a good look at it and see whether it is true. I have a little bit of a feeling that whether intimidation played any part, or not, that maybe we didn't pay enough attention this summer to some things that did take place in the cities and which didn't get much publicity or any publicity on a national basis; that maybe there was more of that than we think there was. Maybe this is only partially because of the kind of normal journalistic pogo stick effect of jumping from one story to another, from one headline to another, and the summer riots weren't the popular story of the moment, they weren't in fad, but they might have taken place. Obviously there wasn't anything like Detroit or Newark but small occurrences.

Senator SCOTT. I am delighted you all are working on it because I think it may help to lift the mood of the American people if they know everything isn't all bad.

How would you propose to handle the forthcoming, which I suspect is going to create quite a sensation within the industry on the Efron book. This is going to be a book which will be hostile to television broadcasting in its conclusions and I have no way of knowing whether the graphs and charts are accurate or not. As you know, one chart shows each network using, for example, one network, as I recall, using 7,000 words of criticism against one candidate and 1,500 words of criticism against another over a 7-week period in the period from 7 to 7:30.

Now, that book is not going to be popular with the industry and I am just wondering whether it will be handled on a balanced basis with objectivity and if this TV essence of what you plead for here? I think your own self criticism in your statement is unwarranted. I think you are the best in the business and I think you know I believe that over the years that we have known each other. You deny being the spokesman, but if you are a spokesman for the industry you are the best they have got.

I wonder how you think it would be fair to handle the Efron book if it should boil up into a newsworthy controversial story? Because upcoming is the thought you hate. That is what I am getting at. In Justice Charles Evan Hughes, freedom of speech being the freedom of the thought we hate, and here is a thought broadcasters will hate. How will they handle it?

Mr. Cronkite. I can't predict, Senator, how each individual will handle it or each individual network or station may handle it. Miss Efron already is beginning to make the appearances on television, clearly she is not being shut out from her chance to tell her story on television and that is being done. I would assume if the book is a major controversial issue, a front page story, it will certainly be covered as any other story on "The Evening News." I would cover it by the statements that people make pro and con on the book which I assume will follow. I suppose network executives will make statements, I may end up quoting myself, I may make a statement about it, but there won't be any blacking out of that story if it gets to be that kind of story.

I have just thumbed that book. I haven't had a chance to read it yet, but I immediately picked out some things I think I would quarrel with quite naturally. Just one of the first things that strikes me —I really hesitate to get into it at all in detail—but just one broad thing is that when she puts a checkmark pro or con this again is judgmental.

Senator Scott. Each time it is done.

Mr. Cronkite. It may be that while she thinks an item is for somebody, someone else may think it is against.

Senator Scott. The reason I raised that particular question, I think it draws the distinction between the situation you were discussion with Senator Hruska where you hit on the highly felicitous euphorism of public official No. 2. I was wondering how to handle that myself.

Now, if public official No. 2 indicates certain things are said in the form of a threat, you say your reaction, you have certain points of view, but, this book is not by a public official, it is not by anyone who can do anything about it except by public opinion, so it clearly comes within the category of criticism which has a right to be heard, discussed, debated, dissented with, and all the rest. That was the point I was making.

Mr. Cronkite. Certainly.

Senator Scott. There is no threat in the book.

Mr. Cronkite. Not at all that I know of. I haven't read every word.

Senator Scott. I haven't read it all other than the threat implicit is in any words that they might be true.

Mr. Cronkite. Yes, sir.

Senator Scott. I appreciate the chance to hear you and thank you.

Mr. Cronkite. Thank you, sir.

Senator Kennedy. I want to extend a warm welcome to Mr. Cronkite, as well, and apologize that I was unable to be here for your statement and for your comments.

I asked Mr. Stanton yesterday, Mr. Cronkite, whether he felt that the attacks by the Vice President on the news media, and the utilization of a grand jury to try to get newsmen's notes, and the comments that have been made by the administration on the development of various programs, whether he felt that there had effectively been intimidation of the networks and, particularly, those that are charged with reporting the news and the development of stories.

I think that he commented on that, about the challenge that it presented to the newsman. He, I think, in fairness, said that he didn't feel that the news that is being presented to the American public now is really being affected in its accuracy or presentation even since these attacks had taken place.

I would be interested in your own views whether this kind of attack has been effective to any extent in infringing, to some extent, on the public right to know various news stories and matters which those that are responsible for the development of these kinds of stories would feel to be important.

Would you comment on this?

Mr. Cronkite. Well, Senator, although I consider myself an independent man, it is clearly more comfortable to agree wholeheartedly with your boss, but I think in this case, I really don't fully, in the sense that I am not so certain that there hasn't been some reaction to this, whether we consider it correctly or not, intimidation. If there has been, it is indeed an insidious thing, even as intimidation itself is. It is like a poison gas in a room, or like perhaps the first effects of narcosis on a deep sea diver. He is not aware of it exactly, you are not sure you are dying, but you may have a sense that something is wrong.

The effect I know on myself. I think that is really about all I am qualified to say. It is a matter here of, as insidious as it is, being constantly alert to my own reactions of being influenced by this threat in being, and, therefore, bending over backwards to be sure that I am not threatened, and that I am not influenced. Therefore, if that happens, if I am conscious of that, the news is being influenced. There is a new element of awareness of things over here that are extraneous to the clear objective judgment of that news as I make the news judgment. I may feel that I have not been influenced, that I have not been intimidated, in other words, but in bending over to avoid being intimidated, I am intimidated. It is kind of a rapidly accelerating merry-go-round, but I think this is what happens.

Now, I think it also should be said here that on the network level it is true, we are powerful, we are rich, we are strong. We are not as immediately subject to an intimidating phone call or a letter from somebody in power as is a small station which does not have the resources for legal, constant legal attention, to these matters that we have. And if we get the 20-day letter, we can send it to a lawyer and it is not going to break the company; it is not going to knock our profit picture into a cocked hat; not going to prevent us from doing other programing we want to do perhaps to answer that letter. But you get a very small station out in the country and they get a phone call from Washington and they are shaken by the telephone call from Washington asking "how are you." No threat, no intimidation. This is a little bit like the comedy act in wrestling. The fellow is sticking his finger in the other wrestler's eye. But when the referee admonishes him he feigns innocence. The other fellow just knows he keeps getting a finger in his eye. It is like this, with these little stations. There may be all the denial of intimidation in the world, but if they are getting phone calls from Washington and letters from Washington, and they hear the speeches being made, their reaction is going to be: "Let's not take a chance the next time that story comes around. Let's not take that chance. Come on, fellows, let's lay off, it is not going to make that much difference if we let that story go." I think clearly intimidation is there.

Senator Kennedy. In another area, in your comments on the fairness doctrine, which you have talked about in your testimony, I am wondering what forces or factors you feel will be effective and will work to ensure that either minority rights or minority representatives, or perhaps even persons attacked will be given the opportunity for response. I am concerned, particularly, in light of the recent development of a greater concentration of power with the newspapers operating radio and various television stations. I know you have commented on this earlier, that you think there are factors and forces within the industry which would provide adequate response or competition. But I think some of us are mindful for example of the evolution of children's programs, with the violence and fantasy that have been associated with television programs for a period of years. It was really only after the FCC became involved in it, I understand, that there were some rather serious changes.

So I would be interested in whether, first of all, you are completely satisfied that the forces within the industry would offset in a reasonable way any inequity, or whether you have other suggestions as to what steps you know might be taken, if the fairness doctrine that were eliminated, to assure adequate protection of minority rights generally.

Mr. Cronkite. I feel, Senator, the assurance that fairness will prevail is in the diversity of broadcasting station ownership, television station ownership. All of the owners are not going to look at things exactly alike. Where, as I say, it may not be possible for the offended to get air time on the station that offends, I think he will have every opportunity on another station to air his views because there is natural competition in the marketplace of ideas, too, and competition in the marketplace in radio and television station availability, that they simply will get on somewhere.

As I said, it would be nice to think you could get a fair hearing by simply granting access, if that could be done without inhibiting freedom of press and speech, which I think it would. Even that is not an assurance of an audience. Even getting equal access in newspapers is no assurance that people are going to read the other view. I don't think there is any guarantee of that, and I just don't believe —I think the dangers, the inhibitions this poses, are greater than in the calculable benefit of total freedom.

Senator KENNEDY. But certainly the trend in recent times has been for the competition and interplay among the various media, whether it is radio or newspaper, or television, to be toward greater concentration. There may be greater utilization of assemblage of power with the newspapers owning radio stations and even television stations. So I am just wondering, I can understand somewhat the argument, if you had either the television stations owned independently or television with more variety of competition between the TV stations, or the newspapers not owning the television and not owning the radio, perhaps there would be a greater opportunity. But given the fact that certainly the trend recently has been for a greater concentration of power in terms of ownership, do you feel that your argument is just as presentable? And I would suspect the trend would probably continue over the next years.

Mr. CRONKITE. I think in all honesty, I would have to say, Senator, that the trend is in turn an inhibition toward this very diversity of which I speak. There is no doubt about that. It is perfectly as one follows the other, as night and day, it can't be helped, but I think the facts are that where there is this concentration of power, in most cases, in the larger markets, the larger owners, the chain owners and so forth, want the big market ownership, they want to get the biggest market they can and they have the power to get the biggest market they can. But the result is, it being a large market, there are more radio and television stations in the market, and it is rare that they own the only station in town, and the only newspaper in town. I think it is unfortunate when that happens, but I don't believe there are many such cases really.

Senator KENNEDY. And you think there is sufficient motivation within the networks themselves, that they would be willing to subjugate the economic interests which obviously are a significant factor in the development of the programs, and be willing to subjugate these interests to the more general public interest?

Mr. CRONKITE. Are you talking about entertainment programs?

Senator KENNEDY. I was thinking of the news, the availability of public service time, the amount of news broadcasting. I suppose there would be those who would say without any kind of regulations, that perhaps the economic interests for the particular network would come into a more prominent position.

Mr. CRONKITE. I think that this in effect, would be equalized as we go along. If there were no FCC controls over a program, no dictates that so much time be used for public affairs programs, I would suspect a trend in the direction you suggest initially, but I think it would come back very shortly, I think we are seeing it even now to a certain extent, that there is a public demand, a request for this type of programing and the stations that are doing it are getting good audiences again after a sag. There will be a flow of a certain type, and it is certainly true if there were Government dictates that a percentage of time be used for public affairs programing, there might be more of it than there would if there wasn't, if that was not the case, but, again, I take the lesser of the evils.

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you.

Senator ERVIN. I want to thank you again for your kind contribution you have made to the hearings

Mr. CRONKITE. Thank you, sir.

Mr. BASKIR. Our next witness this morning is Professor Jerome Barron, professor of law at George Washington University Law School.

Professor Barron is appearing on very short notice and does not have a prepared statement.

Senator ERVIN. I am delighted to welcome you to the Subcommittee and express our appreciation for your willingness to appear and give us the benefit of your views on the very short notice we gave you.

STATEMENT OF JEROME A. BARRON, PROFESSOR OF LAW, GEORGE WASHINGTON UNIVERSITY

Mr. BARRON. Thank you, Senator Ervin. I was lucky that I was able to hear most of Mr. Cronkite's testimony this morning. I think the best way for me to start is perhaps to give my reaction to it. I might borrow something from you, Senator Ervin, to frame that reaction.

You said the First Amendment was drafted not only for the brave but for the timid, and I would just like to put an addendum to that:

The first amendment was not drafted for the broadcast networks. Yet I think really that is the conclusion which we got from Mr. Cronkite's testimony.

I had said before in print that I think that it is one of the great public relations triumphs of the 20th century over the 18th that broadcasters have managed to identify themselves so completely with the First Amendment.

I think the problem comes because we are groping for a constitutional theory which will somehow be adequate to the communication problem of the 20th century.

I think all of our difficulties stem from a rather myopic view of what the freedom of speech means in broadcasting.

I think the conventional view has been that freedom of speech in broadcasting is exhaustive when the freedom of speech of the communicator is protected. In other words, if Dr. Stanton, Mr. Cronkite, Mr. Reasoner, Mr. Brinkley, have their say, then freedom of speech in America is safe; but they are three or four people out of 200 million. I don't think it is conspiratorial or anything like that. It is a combination of the marriage of technology and the pressure of the concentration on the economic system, which has given them this enormous power. I don't accuse them of seeking it, I realize in many ways they just find themselves at the throttle. But our problem is, what are we going to do about it? As far as the Supreme Court of the United States is concerned, the beginning of wisdom came in the Red Lion case in 1969. Most people in this room, I think, are familiar with that case, where the fairness doctrine and personal attack rules were validated, held to be consistent with the First Amendment; the Court suggested perhaps that fairness was compelled by the First Amendment.

When that case was up before the Supreme Court, there were long, and I daresay extensive, briefs filed by the networks opposing the validity of the fairness doctrine, asking that it be held unconstitutional. I am sure that the networks were very much surprised when the Supreme Court went much further than the FCC had done, and gave a constitutional dimension to these regulatory ideas. One of the things I wondered about is how Mr. Hugo Black would vote in Red Lion. Surely Red Lion would be a test, I suppose, of the meaning of the First Amendment in the fundamental sense, in the sense that he understood it. I was very happy, very gratified to see that Justice Black joined in the unanimous opinion of the Court as well as over what Mr. Justice White said for the Supreme Court in the Red Lion case. He said that in First Amendment matters, it is the interest of the reader, the listener, and the viewer that is paramount. In other words, Mr. Justice White was not suggesting for a moment that the interest of the communicator was not important, but in his view, it was not paramount, and this is where I would like to begin.

Mr. Cronkite talked this morning about there being more outlets in broadcasting than in the print media, and that, of course, is true. But the point that we should look for, if we want some understanding about our communications system, is not just for a multiplicity of outlets but for a multiplicity of ideas. The point is that the VHF markets between 7:30 and 11 emit exclusively, in their prime time, programing that is originated in New York with the three major networks. Diversity in terms of what people actually receive, is completely a myth. It is very interesting, considering the testimony we have had this morning about network great concern for diversity that those same networks fought the prime time access rule that the FCC has been trying to implement this year to free up an hour of broadcast time across-the-country for programing originating in sources outside of the networks.

So what I say to you is that we have a very difficult problem, and a problem that, to use a phrase of Mr. Justice Frankfurter, will not be solved by uncritical libertarian generalities applied to the networks or broadcasters.

Now, I think as far as the fairness doctrine, personal attacks rule, equal time rule, and the rising access principle, are concerned that these procedures cannot be called government interference with broadcasting, and for this committee to think that they are governmental interference with broadcasting would be a grave mistake.

There is the situation when the Government substantively tries to interfere with the opinion process in terms of ideas, in terms of content. There is also the situation when the Government tries to provide a procedure for dialogue. That is what these various rules and doctrines do; they provide a structure for dialogue. They reflect an awareness that the real opinion of this country is made in broadcasting and in television. I don't have to tell people in Congress that this is true.

The question is what can we do to share in the opinion process.

When I read the Supreme Court opinion in the Red Lion case, it was really a great experience. Even after having read a great many opinions, nevertheless, I found that opinion full of surprises. One of the surprises I found in it, was a remarkable sentence by Mr. Justice White where he said something like this. He said: "Broadcasting doesn't really have to be set up the way we have set it up." Conceivably and legitimately it could be allocated among each of 200 million Americans, because it is they to whom it belongs. And I think it nothing short of amazing for a representative of broadcasting to content they should be free from all regulations. They don't suggest everybody should be licensed anew as an original proposition. To that extent they are not willing to abdicate or abandon government aid.

Well, I think this gives you the general tenor of my views and I would certainly be happy to answer any questions you might have.

Senator Ervin. Well, you have a very unique, and I might say original approach to the First Amendment.

It is undoubtedly true that the First Amendment gives certain expressed freedoms, freedom of speech and freedom of assembly, freedom of petition and freedom of religion, but undoubtedly, there are certain other freedoms which are not given in the expressed words that are necessarily implicit in the First Amendment, such as freedom of thought. It is not expressed but it is certainly implicit there.

It is also implicit that there be freedom to dissent.

You take the position there is another implicit freedom, freedom of access to communicating ideas?

Mr. Barron. That is right. The view that I have been urging, the view that the Supreme Court, I think, accepted in the Red Lion case. It is a view which now is being carried out in some of the more recent decisions of the Federal Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia. It is the idea that there are some issues so important that as a First Amendment matter, they merit a right of entry or right of access to broadcasting. I will give you an example.

The Democratic National Committee, almost a year ago, I suppose, asked the three broadcast networks for two things. They asked them for time to make spot announcements, appeals for funds, and then they asked them to sell them some program time to develop commentary on various social and political issues.

The response of the three networks, although they had different rhetoric to deal with the requests, was negative to both requests. And it was negative, they said, because this is like advertising time and they don't sell advertising time for ideas. They sell advertising time for soap and for automobiles and for beer, but they don't sell it for ideas, and that is their policy.

Well, the Democratic National Committee, using the ideas in Red Lion, and taking the view that the First Amendment encouraged access for ideas in broadcasting, after having lost at the FCC, went to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. There, Judge Wright, writing for a panel of three—and one of those dissented—held for the court that as a first amendment matter, broadcasters could not refuse to take a whole section of time and say this is reserved for commercials but not for ideas. In other words, this would be taking the First Amendment and putting it upside down, for commercialism would be preferred over ideas.

He said any such rule, in his view, violated the fundamental notions of freedom of speech.

It seems to me that in a medium like broadcasting, this decision is completely consistent with the intent of the framers. I cannot imagine that the intent of the framers, if they could have envisaged anything like the electronic media, would have contemplated that the 20 or so people who write network news should have no accountability or responsibility for it.

Senator Ervin. Isn't advertising an expression of ideas?

For example, I look over this media of communication and I read in the papers that if I use Aqua Velvet all the girls will immediately become enamored of it. I think that is a rather foolish idea because I have used it and it hasn't had that effect at all on me. But still it seems to me that the question of whether you need this can of peaches or patronize this tailor, and that sort of idea——

Mr. Barron. This happens to be, as I think we are all aware, a very exciting time in broadcast regulation. It is very clear when we are at the beginning of a new approach to the whole process.

You talked earlier about tobacco. The conventional FCC doctrine was that product advertising was not subject to the fairness doctrine and the first significant break in that position was, of course, the Banzhaf case, which went first to the FCC and then was affirmed in the U.S. Court of Appeals. The case held that cigarette smoking was different. That case resulted in the extension of the fairness doctrine to the problem of cigarette advertising. We have now extended product advertising under the fairness doctrine and the access concept to other kinds of commercials. Environmental groups recently prevailed in a case here in Washington in the Federal Court of Appeals, the Friends of the Earth case. They contended that the ad for big cars, and pollution laden gasoline, were as much a threat to the health of an asthmatic in New York City as cigarette smoking is to someone who has emphysema, for example. They said environmental groups ought to have the right of reply. There ought to be an opportunity, they said to give the position of the environmentalist group about what the constant push for the purchase of these products is doing to the Nation. The court of appeals agreed, although the FCC did not.

I really felt sorry for the FCC as I read the testimony yesterday and listened to it today, because no one has been a better friend of the broadcasters than the FCC. The FCC has been dragged by the neck to move and respond to the petition of citizen groups around the country. It is the citizens group who brings the petition for access and fairness. It is the FCC which has used the fairness doctrine to block the rights of access to broadcasting. I really feel sorry for the FCC, and the people working for it. The FCC has been working for so long and yet the broadcasters have been so critical of them because the FCC is the best friend the industry has.

Senator ERVIN. I don't know whether I caught your statement or not, but if I caught what you said, when you first stated this, the First Amendment didn't apply to broadcasting?

Mr. BARRON. No, I didn't say that.

Senator ERVIN. I want to clear that up.

Mr. BARRON. In United States v. Paramount Pictures in the 1940's, and only this June in Rosenbloom v. Metromedia, the Supreme Court made it clear that the First Amendment speaks to broadcasting. But in what sense does it speak to broadcasting?

What I said was that the First Amendment, the meaning of the First Amendment is not exhausted by protecting the networks. That is what I said.

Senator ERVIN. I am glad you clarified that because it does seem to me that since the First Amendment says Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech, and the broadcasters certainly do speak, there is no question about that, and it comes down to the question then whether the right to speak is limited to the use of those powers which nature endowed us with, or whether we can artificially multiply our powers by, and you quoted Justice Frankfurter, and I have always been intrigued by Justice Frankfurter, the remarks of his, I believe, in the New Rochelle case where it involves the question of whether the police could prohibit setting up a loud speaker by a gentleman in a park to disturb, to multiply their voices and hurl them.

Mr. BARRON. I think that was Saia v. New York.

Senator ERVIN. And he said, there ought to be such a thing as freedom to listen, and that is, of course——

Mr. BARRON. Yes. Another thing Justice Frankfurter said in the opinion you are talking about, was that we have to interpret each medium in context. That is exactly right.

It makes no sense for these people who can reach 60 million people nightly to say that they ought to have the same freedom as anybody in a public park can have. I don't think it makes any sense for them further to suggest that they should be the sole censors of what appears in broadcasting. I think it is an intolerable suggestion.

Senator ERVIN. That is what everybody else criticizes, the freedom of speech and freedom of press, and would you extend the theory of access to the newspapers?

Mr. BARRON. Yes, I would, and I have written in that direction.

The first piece I wrote on this subject in 1967 is in the record, an article on access to the press, which was in 80 Harvard Law Review. I was very pleased this summer because of a case that applied the New York Times v. Sullivan doctrine, the Rosenbloom case. The opinion for the court in Rosenbloom said in a footnote that it might be time to consider the responsibilities of the press. The Court said it might be a task for constitutional adjudication to fashion a right of access to the press. Certainly in terms of the monopoly problem, I would agree with Mr. Cronkite; the newspaper monopoly problem in some cities is even worse than the broadcast problem. I think that is true.

Senator ERVIN. That article was printed in your article on access to the press, the first amendment right, which is published in the Harvard Law Review for June 1967, which is a very intriguing article and I would like to have permission to put it in the record, if you have no objection.

Mr. BARRON. None at all.

Senator ERVIN. I am sure we can secure permission from the Harvard Law Review. I will ask counsel to contact the Harvard Law Review for permission.

Since you mentioned the Red Lion case, I would request counsel to put a copy of the Red Lion opinion in the appendix of the record.

Now, if Congress is going to give the right to any legislative body on a State level, is going to give the right of access to the broadcast media or to newspapers, Congress, in effect, is going to have to curtail or express to some extent their right of freedom of speech.

Mr. BARRON. Senator, I would like to bring to your attention a very interesting thing that happened here in Congress. I guess it occurred the summer before last here in Washington. The matter concerned the question of access to the press.

At that time, there was a bill pending before Congress called the Failing Newspaper Act. I think the final title of the bill was the Newspaper Preservation Act. I thought the passage of the bill was one of the more hilarious events of my experience with press law problems. Here were all of these publishers who for so many years had contended that government and the press were mortal enemies and that the hand of government should never be placed on the press. Here they were begging Congress to pass special legislation aiding them, and immunizing them from the antitrust law. That special legislation didn't violate the First Amendment. Not a single publisher of the ones that wanted that legislation thought there was any First Amendment problem at all.

All right, at the same time, a Congressman tried to introduce another bill. There was a thought perhaps that it might be amusing to tack it all on a rider and call it the Truth Preservation Act. The intent of the other bill was to suggest that if you got that government aid maybe you had a responsibility, if you attack somebody in an editorial to give him the right of reply. That the bill didn't pass shouldn't surprise anybody. Such a bill violated the First Amendment! I began to wonder about the view of the First Amendment, at least as it is held by the newspapers and broadcast industry. It seems to me that if the amendment does not forbid government aid for the press, it ought not to forbid government aid for the reader.

Senator ERVIN. The Failing Newspaper Act, as I recall from hearing much of the discussion of it on the Judiciary Committee, didn't attempt to place any limitations upon what editors or journalists could say, it merely permitted newspapers to use certain physical facilities such as the same presses, or the same buildings in certain instances, to say what they wished to say. There was no expression that I see.

Mr. BARRON. That problem with the bill was this. In a country where we only have something like 50 cities with separate ownerships, if we then go ahead and say that where two papers do exist, and can pool facilities, the prospect of a new entrant, already remote, would be nil. In terms of stimulating diversity of ideas, that would be an undesirable result.

Senator ERVIN. Of course you had an undesirable result that had already been reached. In other words, with the increased cost of publishing newspapers you wound up with virtually the same people owning, where they had formerly been competing newspapers in most of our major cities.

Mr. BARRON. I agree with you to some extent on this. The economics of the problem make it unlikely that antitrust policy is going to solve our immediate problems.

I think that the weapons that have been devised in broadcasting, the legal weapons like the Fairness Doctrine or the access principle, things like that, are more likely to be responsive to the problem because they are indifferent to the question of ownership and yet they get the ideas out. I think we need a similar approach to some extent in the press.

Of course, the broadcast area, as I say, is an exciting area right now in broadcast regulation because the courts are leaving uncritical libertarian generalities as an approach to broadcasting.

On the other hand, we have in front of us the rise of another technology, cable television. It is still unclear to what extent cable is going to make available the access for ideas that so many of us would like.

Senator ERVIN. It seems to me that the right of access would require a curtailment or limitation on the news media right to freedom of speech. In other words, to illustrate what I mean, a newspaper that customarily has, we will say, eight pages in it, and if you give the public or the individuals the right to access to that, it is going to have to curtail part of the paper that I used to exercise this freedom of the press——

Mr. BARRON. One thing——

Senator ERVIN (continuing). And, furthermore, it is going to curtail the newspaper to say things that the newspaper doesn't believe.

Mr. BARRON. Well, I have tried to begin in that area by suggesting something that I thought would leave the editing process alone, would meet the economic objectives. I would start with the very modest suggestion that there is a right for nondiscriminatory publication of editorial advertising in newspapers.

I think that if the papers were paid at the regular rate and the group wanted to buy an ad, that the paper ought not to be able, particularly in monopoly situations, to say they can't.

Now, to me that seems a fairly reasonable proposition. We have had some cases recently on it in the Federal courts and the newspapers have won. They have been fighting access.

To give you an example of how it would work. In Chicago, a Chicago group of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers Union were picketing the Marshall Field Department Store and they were picketing Marshall Field because Marshall Field was selling textiles made abroad and they contended that the result was the loss of jobs for the American working man. They had pickets out in front of the store making that contention. The union felt that they weren't getting across to the people of Chicago and so they went to each of the four Chicago dailies. Although there are only two ownerships, there were still four dailies in Chicago. The union argued this access approach to the First Amendment. Really the union was completely shut out, yet they were willing to pay for the ad. They had the State action problem. There was a very interesting ordinance in Chicago that only newspapers printed in the city of Chicago can be sold on the streets of Chicago. A very unusual ordinance. The union tried to show that the ordinance would be sufficient State action. The union lost in the Federal District Court and the court of appeals. One of the grounds on which the union lost was that Chicago was not a newspaper monopoly situation. I thought this was a very strange comment.

Senator ERVIN. I should certainly think, and I don't see how any court could have denied them that adjudication to the effect that an ordinance that prevented any other newspapers being sold in Chicago on the streets of Chicago, was clearly an infringment of the First Amendment.

Mr. BARRON. Well, I wish you had been deciding the case, because I felt it was a very strong case. I felt it was a controversial issue, I felt it was a complete shutout, and I thought to say that this was not a monopoly situation made no sense.

For first amendment purposes, the test of monopoly is whether there is any outlet for ideas.

Senator ERVIN. And I think that illustrates another situation in which individuals are denied the freedom of speech, because evidently the Chicago papers would refuse to take their advertisements, they figured that they would profit more by getting advertisements in the long run from Marshall Field than they would have these people and, therefore, not offending Marshall Field they denied these people something, I think, a person willing to pay for an advertisement in the newspaper has the right to get it.

Mr. BARRON. I think there is probably considerable justice in your observations although these points didn't come out in the opinions. But I think you are right and I think that this kind of press action is an illustration that the kind of advice you heard this morning from Mr. Cronkite is not really the kind of advice you ought to act on. Although I have no doubt that he means it, it is not the kind of advice that we can rely on for communication policy. The idea is that the wicked will not prosper. If they don't give everybody a chance, this reasoning says, they won't prevail.

Well, I am willing to share and hope that the wicked won't prosper, but I am also unwilling to give them the opportunity. I would think it would be a great mistake for this committee to suggest anything critical about the fairness doctrine and personal attack rule or anything like that.

Senator ERVIN. I hate to see the wicked prosper, and that is the reason Gun Smoke is my favorite television program because the righteous always prevail, even though they have to resort to illegal violence to do it.

Mr. BARRON. I am glad they prevail somewhere, but I must say I don't think they prevail in the media.

Senator Ervin. That, of course, one of the objectives of freedom of speech is the hope that the truth will ultimately prevail rather than a falsehood and I am optimistic, I believe as they say in North Carolina, I am not plum-certain of it.

Anyway, if you give a right of access, every individual ought to have the same right of access, shouldn't he? Do you have some ideas?

Mr. Barron. No, I don't think so.

Senator Ervin. The reason I fear we have to have a tremendous amount of Federal regulations.

Mr. Barron. I haven't suggested Federal regulation in my own writings on access to the press. I have not suggested that the press be subjected to Federal regulation as an overall proposition. I am not that enamored with the history of the Federal Communications Commission to enlarge their jurisdiction to include the press. What I have suggested is that in a situation like the litigated case I just gave you that the appropriate remedy should be to the Federal courts for enforcement of what, after all, are first amendment rights. One of the courts in the Chicago area, the District Court, hinted if there were legislation affording the right of access they would have upheld the union. The case for access is a much stronger case because of the remarks in the Rosenbloom case. The opinion of the Court seemed to be sympathetic to the idea that the First Amendment demanded some kind of right of access to be enforced through the constitutional adjudication. But I think you would have to show a shutout. I think you would have to show that you had made a request for publication, that the advertisement had been denied and that it had been denied essentially for discriminatory or ideological reasons.

Senator Ervin. It would seem to me you have a difficulty of creating the right of access, and then limiting to certain groups of people that you come to the same things you have to give everybody the right of access.

Mr. Barron. Well, you know, a similar argument was made, sir, several years ago in the broadcast area. The law used to be that a citizen group did not have a right to participate in the renewal proceedings. The idea was that if you wanted another license, if you wanted somebody's license in the broadcast business and wanted to get in it, and wanted a license, you had standing and you could get an evidentiary hearing. The idea was that you and I as viewers and listeners didn't have a sufficient enough stake to entitle us to the same opportunity.

In the United Church of Christ case, which arose down in Jackson, Mississippi, a case which was decided, two opinions on it, by Judge Burger, when he was on the Court of Appeals here, changed the law. Judge Burger thought that the listeners' and viewers' interest was what broadcasting was all about. He thought certainly they ought to have standing. The FCC incidentally was opposed to this position. Needless to say, so was the industry. Their argument was something like yours; that this would have no stopping place. As a matter of fact, the citizens groups had still been successfully sabotaged until quite recently in their efforts to get evidentiary hearings before the Commission. The decision has not led to an intolerable floodgate of litigation. In fact, Judge Burger said every reform of the law always meets the floodgate argument and he was unimpressed by it.

Senator Ervin. It seems to me a fellow who couldn't get a person to agree with his views and couldn't get any group to form around him, would be more in need of access than the people who had some folks that agreed with them.

Mr. Barron. I am sure that would be his opinion, but I don't think I would begin my efforts in securing his rights first. He would not be my ideal client, I guess I would rather start with community groups.

Senator Ervin. But he would be the one most in need.

Mr. Barron. I would rather think that the claim of the union, for example, ought to be something that would be clearly and more easily recognized than that of an individual. But I agree with you in theory, I agree with you as a matter of the inherent merit of the idea.

Senator Ervin. I think the one individual who might not agree with the view of the union and wanted to express his views on the subject, would be just as much entitled to express them on your theory.

Mr. Barron. Commissioner Johnson has taken in broadcast renewals, the position that even one listener or viewer is enough. I certainly would be glad to see this result. But it is a question of where you begin in terms of legislation. I guess I would suggest starting with groups as Judge Burger started with the Church of Christ.

Senator Ervin. Well, individual rights ought to be just as sacred as those of the group, even more so.

Mr. Barron. If you will introduce legislation to that effect, I will be glad to support it.

Senator Ervin. It seems to me this is forcing people to broadcast things they don't believe. It is also in a sense a confiscation of their profit.

Mr. Barron. I would like to respond to that.

Senator Ervin. By people who have made no investment.

Mr. Barron. I would like to say a couple of things about that. First of all, it isn't their property. That is where we begin, with broadcast legislation. And in the Red Lion case, Justice White said that the broadcast licensee has a license that is up for renewal every three years. The spectrum belongs to the public. What has happened is this. The Federal Communications Act, the one we are now living with, dates from 1934. But from that time until very recently, the broadcast licensee has been automatically renewed even though there was nothing in the statute itself to suggest that such would be the result. So as a consequence, the industry has decided (and in light of the history I suppose with some justice) that they have an expectancy of renewal. But in very recent cases, in the two United Church of Christ cases, in the Citizens Communications Center case in the district court, and the Red Lion case, the courts have all emphasized the broadcaster does not have a proprietary right in his franchise. Thus the response that the broadcaster objects to what is being presented is completely irrelevant. The broadcasters have also long argued they don't own their franchise. They say they are the trustees for the public.

Senator Ervin. But they own the buildings and the electronic devices used to broadcast things.

Mr. Barron. Well, right now in the Commission and in the United Church of Christ, which brought many of these cases, they are trying to work out formulas for reimbursement in terms of paying a reimbursement sum to which previous or past licensees would be entitled.

Senator Ervin. You say this same doctrine should apply to the newspaper. The newspaper certainly owns everything they use.

Mr. Barron. That is why I have not suggested it go to a Federal commission. It seems to me the most expeditious and fairest way to handle those problems, such as the one I gave you in Chicago, would be in the Federal court.

Senator Ervin. I have a friend, or old schoolmate, who has notions which are rather peculiar from my viewpoint and he used to send me these long documents and ask me to put them in the Congressional Record. I disagreed with everything in them and declined to put them in the Congressional Record. So he said he had a right to forward them and since he was an American citizen and paid taxes and this was at the expense of the taxpayers, he had the right to require me to put them in the Congressional Record.

I told him I had a right to say what I was going to put in the Congressional Record, because everything I put in there people attribute to my views, and I told him I would get a thousand letters protesting my putting such foolish things in the Congressional Record, and I refused to put them there.

I think maybe the media or communication, whether they are broadcasters or newspapers, ought to have some say in what they will disseminate and it seems to me it is fundamentally a denial of freedom of speech to tell them, to say they have to publish something that they don't want to publish.

I don't think it would be much freedom if a man is compelled to say something he doesn't want to say.

Mr. Barron. I think that it is all how you go about solving the First Amendment interest in these media problems. Say to yourself, who is the addressee of first amendment protection? Suppose you ask that question? The traditional response to that question has been that the newspaper publisher is the addressee of first amendment protection—the publisher and the broadcaster. My difficulty with that response is that it doesn't give enough protection.

One must go back to Red Lion as a first amendment matter. There the Court said it is the right of the public to receive esthetic, social, moral, political ideas, and that right was spoken of in terms of a constitutional right. But if we take an approach to first amendment problems which exhaust the First Amendment in terms of the property notions of those who are the media proprietors in an age of such complete concentration, I think we have an inadequate theory.

Senator Ervin. I will agree that people are entitled to hear, but are people entitled to compel someone to speak things they want to hear, rather than what the speaker wants to say?

Mr. Barron. In terms of the advertising pages of newspapers, we had a number of cases in the early days of the Vietnam war when papers wouldn't sell ads against the Vietnam war, for example. But it doesn't matter what the ideological position is.

It seems to me that when you are talking about the traditionally open section of the newspaper, particularly in a monopoly situation the papers have an obligation. I don't think that obligation hinders their freedom of maneuver. They can still print an editorial opposing the ad. But at least the people in the community have some idea of what is going on.

Senator Ervin. You have presented a most intriguing viewpoint, and on occasions when I have wanted to say something, and I was denied the right, I was inclined to agree with you.

Mr. Barron. Thank you, sir.

Senator Ervin. At least, temporarily.

Mr. Baskir. If I can summarize your position, if I can do it justice, I gather you are unwilling to leave to the economic market the decision about access to media, and the case you gave in Chicago where the decision was based on advertising revenues, is one you don't like. You would rather give it to another determining factor, another determining body other than economics?

Mr. Barron. That is right.

Mr. Baskir. I gather from what you said, you would not prefer Congress, you would not prefer the executive agency?

Mr. Barron. Well, I would prefer the Congress to act in one respect. If the Congress would enact legislation in this area which would then be implemented through the Federal courts, I would be all for that. But the enforcement level should be, in my judgment, in the courts.

Mr. Baskir. I was getting to enforcement, it should not be in the executive branch, but the courts?

Mr. Barron. Absolutely.

Mr. Baskir. I gather because you have more confidence in the objectivity of the judicial branch as an institution as opposed to the executive branch?

Mr. Barron. Exactly.

Mr. Baskir. Without getting into the question of whether the people who wear the robes are human and politically affiliated, and politically appointed, and whether a judge like Skelly Wright might be entirely different in his point of view than a judge like Harold Cox, let's say, which would give you a very difficult problem, maybe the same kind of problems?

Mr. Barron. Well, it all depends on your idea of the Federal judiciary and how much they managed to achieve. I think their record in recent years has been a credible one.

Justice Frankfurter used to say that people change once they are appointed judges. A lot of people said that when Justice Frankfurter went on the Court he was a Liberal and that when he came off he was a Conservative. He used to contend that wasn't true, that the difference was that he was now a judge and had to call issues the way he saw them as a judge.

I think this controversy between Mr. Stanton and Mr. Staggers comes from the fact that each is claiming a kind of absolutism in determining very difficult questions: the networks accountability for propaganda and the question of Government censorship over broadcasting. Both issues are involved, and yet each spokesman says that he should be the sole determinator. But I don't think such absolution that is adequate for a solution. Each spokesman is too much interested in the issue at this point. The questions we are talking about belong in the courts. That is why Federal judges write opinions.

Mr. Baskir. We all know because of the current interest in the two nominees, that although there are judges and even justices and they are human beings and the choice of the particular human being has a great influence on the course of the law, and the course of the Nation, and it may be a risk that we are willing to take in all issues of human society, to give it to the courts that decide this fundamental issue, because they are the best we have.

But maybe in the area of ideas, that is too great a risk if, for instance, a President manages to get the opportunity by chance to appoint five or six people to the Supreme Court, they will be people of different ideas and different ideas and different approaches than if a different President had appointed them, and those are the people who are determining who have the right to get into the newspapers under your theory, and they will make different decisions than another set of judges.

Mr. Barron. I will tell you what I think about that, Mr. Baskir. I teach Federal jurisdiction at my law school. During the past few years the object of most of my students has been to develop theories that would expand the Federal jurisdiction, because in many areas they have more confidence in the Federal courts than they have in some of the State courts. But I then raise with them the question you have just asked me. If you like the Federal courts so well, if some President came along you did not like as much as some of the Presidents who appointed some of these Federal judges, would you then be constructing theories to get the Federal court back in the State court? I think the answer to that kind of inquiry shows some of the genius in our system. We have enough room for maneuver in the court system, State and Federal, to take care of the problems you are talking about. It is not the greatest system but in terms of entrusting it to regulators for a term of years, I prefer the court system.

Mr. Baskir. My point is that maybe the better thing is not to even go to the courts but in the area of deciding which ideas are important enough to be expressed under your theory, that is too important a decision?

Mr. Barron. Then the question gets back to the question who do you leave it to? Dr. Stanton?

Mr. Baskir. Yes, indeed.

Mr. Barron. These are questions of ultimate choice. I think he is a good man. I think most of these people are good people. But I think that they are much too involved in the controversy to be allowed to have the complete say. They have, as I said earlier, too much power. Mr. Cronkite conceded that himself this morning. I would be the last to say that they have sought this power but they have it. I think all power merits some oversight and some accountability.

Senator Ervin. That is a danger. I think you wind up eventually with limiting freedom, when you try to prevent an abuse of freedom and. for that reason, I am not much inclined to give much power to the Government. I would rather have power in the hands of individual than in the hands of Government because you can do something with individuals when they exceed their power, but you can't with the Government. It is an intolerable thing to say that the Government should have the power to pick out which ideas are worthy of dissemination and which are not. I am sure, since I am so much in the minority, they wouldn't pick out many of my ideas for dissemination of freedom of the press; I wouldn't like that a bit.

Mr. Baskir. You made reference to the Banzhaf case. As you reminded me, he had initially a lack of success in getting access in the Fairness Doctrine and now it looks like his success has gone full-circle, because now at least his opponents have succeeded in getting a judge to say that smoking is no longer controversial, and would you be willing to say with me, as long as one person wants to smoke, or even if nobody wants to smoke, in a sense the issue of smoking, like the issue of just about everything else in the world, ought to be controversial?

Mr. Barron. My problem on that issue is this. I have serious doubts about the constitutionality of the statute Congress passed. I think a statute which says that an idea, any idea, even cigarette smoking, is such a threat to the public interest that it cannot even be discussed. I think it violates the First Amendment.

Mr. Baskir. I agree with you on that, but in the application of the Fairness Doctrine, it strikes me as being sort of a small example of——

Mr. Barron. I don't agree either with the FCC position on that. I don't agree with their position on it.

Mr. Baskir. Isn't the Fairness Doctrine in a sense an undeveloped version of your concept of access?

Mr. Barron. Well, it is very undeveloped. Yet we have it and I wouldn't want to get rid of it. But it is not great by any means.

The problem of the Fairness Doctrine is it has a trigger mechanism. In other words, you put on a conventional idea, you put on an issue, and then that puts on or gives a group or individual a right to ask for an opportunity for a reply. But the problem is, of course, the path of evasion is very simple; you don't put on the issues. It is in that respect that the access principle is very helpful in regard to the Fairness Doctrine. The access principle says if you have a constitutional duty to provide access for ideas of public importance, for controversial ideas of public importance, you can't avoid the whole thing by saying we don't want to hear from that group. If there is a duty to give access, as an original proposition, for controversial ideas, you have sort of outfoxed the trigger mechanism aspect of the Fairness Doctrine.

Senator Ervin. To me, the tobacco situation is an absurd position because the Supreme Court of the United States, as I read its opinions, has held in many cases that the Government cannot put any limitation upon freedom of speech of persons who even advocate the overthrow of the Government of the United States by violence, as long as they do not advocate action to carry out that, and yet under the amendment that protects peoples' rights to advocate overthrow of the United States by force and violence, as long as they don't accomplish that; that very government can prohibit a person saying on the air, but, advocating smoking cigarettes, even when he doesn't urge anybody to smoke them.

Mr. Barron. Well, I agree with you on that. The analogy I use on the problem.

Senator Ervin. And that is the reason I am rather strongly opposed to the Government having any power to say what anybody shall say about anything.

Mr. Barron. Well, I guess that is where I think you and I differ because I think we should be concerned with a mechanism for dialogue on the broadcast media today. To me censorship is no less censorship if it is in a few private hands that have Government licenses than if it is directly wielded by the Government. I don't think anybody should be under the illusion that there won't be any censorship if the legislation that Mr. Cronkite asked for here this morning were granted. Then you would have the complete censorship, a censorship which neither the courts nor the FCC, nor anybody could do anything about.

Senator Ervin. I have to agree there is tremendous power in the media of communications. No question about that. But I am just one who happens to entertain the view you have to be careful when you start limiting freedom on the theory that freedoms are being abused.

Mr. Barron. My test is a practical test. Are you excluding anything, or are you really adding to the information process? I think that a generous construction of the Fairness Doctrine is intended to add to the information process. And, oftentimes, the Fairness Doctrine has received a very wooden mechanical response by the Commission, and I think that has been very unfortunate.

Mr. Baskir. I think you used your definition up, I don't have it completely right, something in the idea of public importance or some such phrase.

Now, I am not sure you will concede that the opportunity to get through the airway media is limited, so is the newspaper limited by practical things, and so if you have a definition and a power to decide things that come out, you also have the same power to decide whether an idea falls outside of this role, and Mr. Banzhaf 15 years ago, because he is the only one who thinks there is a danger in smoking, can't convince the FCC or Judge Skelly Wright or any other judge, it is an idea of public importance, and now you have the opposite situation where at least two judges, I gather, out of three, have the idea that smoking is not dangerous, is not an idea of public importance.

Any time you have a definition like that and somebody to decide —they have the power to decide that it falls outside—they are the censor, and in your theory, they would be government officials, be it judges, they are still government officials, and aren't you trading one form of censorship, private censorship, for another, public?

Mr. Barron. In the sense that someone has to make a decision as to whether one of these procedures, equal time or fairness, or personal attack rules apply, or access rules apply, I suppose you are. But I think it is an advantage when you can talk about these problems in the open in a court where you can brief the issues and where you can show the community interest in the matter, the media silence on the point, or the media partisanship on the point. I think the opportunities for public expression in such a situation are likely to be greater than if it is confined to some network board room.

Mr. Basker. John Banzhaf is a lawyer and, therefore, he got the free legal assistance. However for the person who feels that adding fluoride to water is dangerous, who is considered a crank, and he turns out 30 years later not to have been such a crank after all, going to the court is cumbersome and expensive.

Mr. Barron. You are taking a theory in its most ideal sense and saying, since it would be unlikely to expect success there, that, therefore, it is not usable. I don't think that is really the alternative. Our alternative isn't the ideal that you are talking about. Our alternative is really the reality we have now, and I don't think it is a satisfactory one.

Mr. Baskir. I think my feeling is trading two unsatisfactory situations. I think the one with the government wasn't making satisfactory decisions. I resent the fact a judge doesn't like smoking can tell me——

Mr. Barron. I guess you and I have different opinions of the judiciary. I know some years ago, the Public Utility Commission here in the District of Columbia was sued along with D.C. Transit because they had some music, canned recordings on the bus. You couldn't turn it off. Justice Frankfurter used to take the bus from Georgetown to the Supreme Court. The case came up there and he felt so strongly about the intolerable intrusion into his privacy in regard to the noise that he refused to participate in the case. And I think that reflects well on the character of judges. If they think the matter is something that they cannot conquer their personal opinion on, they won't participate. His would have been a useful opinion in the case but for the reasons mentioned, he did not participate.

Mr. Baskir. I would say if all judges were like Justice Frankfurter, even when I didn't agree with him, I would have more confidence the issues had been wisely decided, but the eight other Justices felt very strongly about that, as I suspect they do on many other issues, and they felt they had to decide the case.

Mr. Barron. I think the legal architecture is there in the broadcast media.

I guess my final words to you people would be, if you don't want to go any further, certainly don't recommend doing any less. I think the public needs the opportunities for dialog that section 315 provides. I think they are in no sense unconstitutional. I agree completely with the Supreme Court. They are completely valid, and I further agree with the Court on the affirmative view of the First Amendment.

Senator Ervin. I want to thank you again for your appearance here, and say your viewpoint is very intriguing and I think you made a substantial contribution to the hearings. In the absence of a consideration of the weight that should be given to the question of right of access, I think the hearings would be decidedly incomplete.

Mr. Barron. Thank you very much for asking me to come.

Senator Ervin. We have one other witness, and it is such an interesting subject, and I would rather come back this afternoon.

Suppose we recess until 2:30.

(Whereupon, at 1 p.m. the hearing recessed to reconvene at 2:30 p.m. this day).

AFTERNOON SESSION

Senator Ervin. The subcommittee will come to order and Counsel will call the next witness.

Mr. Baskir. Our witness this afternoon is Mr. Laurence Leamer, author and journalist, who is the author of the forthcoming book, The Paper Revolutionaries, which is a product of a grant from the Twentieth Century Fund, to be published by Simon & Schuster.

Senator Ervin. I want to welcome you to the subcommittee and express our appreciation for your willingness to come and give us the benefit of your views in respect to a very important aspect of the matter we have under study.

You have done some very original research and so we welcome you with considerable interest in your views.

STATEMENT OF LAURENCE LEAMER, AUTHOR AND JOURNALIST

Mr. Leamer. Thank you very much, Senator.

I would like to begin by giving a little bit of background.

Perhaps you remember just half a dozen or so years ago coming upon someone selling a strange, colorful tabloid publication. An underground paper. Back then in the midsixties there were only a handful of such papers put out by people dropped out of the American dream. On little money and even less journalism background, they popularized New Left critiques, the hippie philosophy, rock music, and other hip cultural activities. Now all that seething anger, alienation, and yearning has erupted into a mass radical youth movement. There are over a million teenage runaways, several million adult dropouts, thousands and thousands who call themselves political radicals without fear or apology, countless sympathizers, hip areas in every major city in America, and communes from one coast to the other. Now the papers take a wealth of forms. There are youth-oriented undergrounds; tens of undergrounds put out by GI's at great personal risk; high school undergrounds in hundreds of schools; women's liberation papers; homosexual papers; commune papers; and college papers every bit as radical as the more militant undergrounds.

The underground press includes the largest paid weekly in Georgia and one of the largest in California; the two biggest weeklies in Berkley; and important papers in Chicago, Detroit, Philadelphia, Boston, and in towns and cities across the United States. In all, over 200 newspapers, publishing at a given time, are part of the loose confederation known as the Underground Press Syndicate (UPS). Membership in UPS would be the narrowest possible definition of an underground paper, and that alone adds up to a circulation over 2 million. By using the formula employed by mass magazines (six readers to one magazine) this would represent a readership of over 12 million. And by including high school undergrounds, reupholstered old left papers, rock culture papers, and other publications that identify with youth culture, it's possible to come up with a circulation figure of 3 million, or 18 million readers, an even better idea of the enormous audience for a medium that is blatantly anti-establishment.

In other words, we are not talking about a sideshow; the freak show of American journalism. We are talking about what is probably the most important innovation in print journalism in the last 40 years. We are talking about the first mass radical media in this country since the first decade of the 20th century. We are talking, too, about the most venerable and one of the most respected traditions in American journalism, that of impassioned dissent. You will remember, of course, that America's first newspaper, Benjamin Harris' Publick Occurrences, lasted only one issue because Boston officials found it too critical. We are talking, thus, about a press whose problems should be at the focal point of this committee's interest—for nowhere else in American journalism is freedom of the press so grievously and immediately threatened.

Underground editors are arrested on trumped-up charges. Paper sellers are pushed off the street. Printers are warned not to take work from the underground press. A thousandfold worse than such common and frequent harassments as these are other abuses that lie in that dark and growing area beyond the traditional boundaries of civil liberties. Here lie monstrous evils that some day may step over into conventional life to haunt us in ways we can scarcely imagine. Nowhere is this more true than with the historic case involving the Los Angeles Free Press. Its 90,000 circulation makes the paper the largest underground in the United States. In July 1969, 24-year-old Jerry Resnick came into the Free Press office. He said he was a clerk at the State Attorney General's office. He told Jerry Applebaum, then a free-lance reporter for the paper, that he had something the paper might be interested in. Resnick showed Applebaum a Xeroxed copy of a report that had been sent to Chief Deputy Attorney General Charles O'Brien by Richard Huffman of the DA's Los Angeles office. It was a shocking document dealing with alleged misconduct on the part of members of the UCLA police department. No journalist could ignore such a document. After deleting the name of the accused officer the Free Press placed an account of the report on the front page of the next issue under the headline "Secret Report Probes Crimes of UCLA Cops."

Several days later Resnick returned, this time with a printed pamphlet containing the names, addresses, and phone numbers of 80 California State narcotic agents, many of whom were involved in frequent undercover work. The Free Press justified its position in publishing the names with typical elan and bravado, stating that there should be no secret police. The 80 agents suffered mild harassment, and within days their phone numbers had been changed.

The State of California immediately set out to silence the paper.

The State filed a $10 million obstruction of justice civil suit against the paper, and some of the agents filed a $15 million action claiming invasion of privacy. Soon afterwards, the State charged Art Kunkin, the publisher, and Jerry Applebaum with receiving stolen property. The act of publishing the documents, then, was theoretically not in question, and the State did not appear to have much of a case. Irresponsibility is not a crime. If the Free Press were convinced that any editor who even looked at a proffered document, or a Xeroxed copy for that matter, could find himself charged with a criminal offense. As any reporter knows, investigative reporting is a necessary and nefarious craft. Often stories are built out of the whispered tales of the bitter and the discontent or the frankly amoral cunning of the reporter. It was Seymour Hersh who broke the story of the My Lai massacre. The trail that led him from a Washington rumor to Lt. William Calley, convicted murderer of Vietnamese civilians, in Fort Benning, Ga. was constructed out of bluffing and half-truths. At one crucial point as Hersh himself admitted in an article in the Saturday Review, he got a private "to steal Calley's personal file," not a Xeroxed copy or a printed pamphlet but the battalion information sheet itself.

For his troubles Hersh received the 1970 Pulitzer Prize in International Reporting, the highest honor in American journalism. For their troubles Kunkin and Applebaum were convicted, put on 3 years probation, and fined respectively $1,000 and $500 apiece. The civil suits were settled out of court for sums that have helped to bankrupt the paper.

I happened to have been in Los Angeles when the trial was going on, sitting in a half empty courtroom. Almost no members of the press even looked in on this precedent making trial. A few blocks away, though, scores of journalists scrambled into the Manson trial to provide grist for the public rumor mill. The local Los Angeles media did not consider themselves the least bit derelict in their duties. "It's just an ordinary trial," Bill Thomas, city editor of the Los Angeles Times told me. "It has nothing to do with freedom of the press. For what they did they got what was coming to them." The Los Angeles Times finally woke up. "Should this case stand and become a precedent," wrote Gene Blake in the September 20, 1970 issue, "the impact on the investigative efforts of the press to disclose wrongdoing in government could be devastating." The Los Angeles Times reprinted that article and mailed it to about 1,000 publishers and journalism schools across the country.

Our mandarins of the press did not have long to wait before the Pentagon Papers proved that they too were subjected to the most overt kinds of government pressures. The ePntagon Papers case, in fact, almost exactly parallels the case of the Los Angeles Free Press. But look at the difference in treatment. No one is accusing the New York Times of fencing stolen merchandise. No one is trying to put Katherine Graham behind bars.

Imagine, if you will, what would have happened if Daniel Ellsberg had gone to an underground paper with the Pentagon documents. The paper would have published them, of course, and then almost certainly the editors and publishers of that paper would have been slapped with criminal indictments. The mass media can't always hope to be handled so gently. It is time, past time, for the establishment media to realize that the underground press stands at the forefront of everyone's first amendment freedom. And it would only be self-interest for publishers and top editors to see that that freedom is protected.

There are other areas that lie in this dark area beyond conventional civil liberties. Printers, for example. What does freedom of the press mean if you can't find a printer? Jackson, Miss.'s Kudzu has to be printed in New Orleans. Austin's Rag has to be printed in a city 100 miles away. Atlanta's Great Speckled Bird has to be printed in Montgomery, Ala. New York City's Rat has to be printed in various cities along the eastern seaboard. One man, one printer, resisted all intimidation. Bill Schanen of Port Washington, Wis. In 1970 he began printing Milwaukee's underground paper, Kaleidoscope. along with his own weekly Ozaukee County Press. Local right-wing industrialists and such organizations as the local American Legion told Bill Schanen he had better stop. He refused and they organized a boycott. During June 1970, the very week the Press won first place in general excellence in the 1969 National Newspaper Association contest, 25 advertisers canceled. In all, Bill Schanen lost about $200,000 in 1970, but he refused to stop printing Kaleidoscope. He was a stubborn man and he said that he believed in freedom of the press and earlier this year at the age of 57 he died of heart attack.

The drug bust is another familiar scene on underground papers; drug laws represent yet another of those dark areas I've been talking about. Bret Steiner, the former editor of Dallas Notes, says about the police raid on his office: "If they had gotten us for dope during the police raids, the ACLU wouldn't even have taken the case." It is not the drug laws themselves I am objecting to here but the enforcement of those laws. The hip radical's very looks are enough to render him suspicious. He's the one most likely to be busted. And since marijuana is as ubiquitous in the underground as crabgrass in suburbia, underground press people live with the pesky fear that today may be the day of the big bust. To all this one might well argue, "Well aren't the police just doing their duty?" Imagine, though, if some police posed as waiters and bartenders while others hid outside elite drinking places, in order to enforce the laws against drunken drivers. That kind of duty would last about one weekend. And that, please remember, is exactly how most police go after marijuana violaters.

Discrimination does not end once the arrest is made. The sentence often depends on the whim and wisdom of the individual judge, the wits of one's lawyer, and the wealth of one's family. In Texas, in August 1968, Lee Otis Johnson, a former SNCC organizer was sentenced to up to 30 years in Federal prison for handing a marijuana cigarette to an undercover police agent.

This harassment of underground papers pushes them relentlessly away from the trust and openness that once were the essence of the movement. In San Diego, for instance, one of the nightly duties of a staff members on the Street Journal is to take a watch sitting on the front porch shotgun in hand. These underground journalists are not acting out somebody's fantasies of revolution. Since the fall of 1969 when the paper began featuring exposes of such individuals as C. Arnhalt Smith and John S. Alessio, then both leading citizens, the Street Journal has suffered persistent harassment. November 18th: bullets from a .38-caliber weapon shot through the office window. November 23rd: five patrol cars surrounded the offices, entered, and searched the premises without a search warrant. November 29: the office's glass front door smashed, and 2,500 copies of the Street Journal stolen; little police investigation. During November more than 20 street vendors arrested for "obstructing the sidewalk," handcuffed, searched and jailed under an ordinance since declared unconstitutional by the municipal court. December 11th, police without a search warrant entered the paper's residence and arrested a guest on "suspicion of burglary," handcuffed him, but later let him go without taking him to jail. Christmas eve: someone broke into the offices and destroyed over $4,000 worth of typesetting equipment; little police investigation. January 3rd: a Street Journal car firebombed; little police investigation. January 18th and 25th: more vendors arrested, handcuffed, searched and booked for littering.

Any journalist worth his salts would have taken one look at the Street Journal's troubles and known he had the makings of a great story. It was a story that involved freedom of the press, and newspapers are inevitably conscientious about protecting their own freedom. But the Copley-owned Union and Evening Tribune exercised their news monopoly in San Diego by burying the story.

In Jackson, Miss., in June of last year, the local vice squad rented a house directly behind the residence of the staff of the Kudzu, the local underground. Now they could keep the Kudzu under surveillance 24 hours a day. The police could drive up to their quarters through driveways on either side of the Kudzu house, but whenever a car belonging to the Kudzu people or to one of their friends was parked in one driveway, the police would choose that side and force those inside to come out and move their car. On the morning of June 12th, the police agreed to use whichever driveway was vacant. That evening, however, the Kudzu people heard a police car honking and one staff member, Bill Rusk, went out to talk to the officers.

"I reminded them of our intentions to be neighborly," Bill Rusk said later, "and I ended up saying "Now you mother——— come and do this." Twenty minutes later the car I was driving was stopped and I was arrested on warrants for abusive language. I was immediately handcuffed behind my back. While being frisked at the side of the car, I was lifted off my feet. As I came down the officer said that my elbow touched him and that was assaulting a police officer. Saying that he hit me below the right eye with the butt of his flashlight.

> Inside the patrol car the officer said that I was four-eyed and hardheaded and that he would take care of me. Then he took my glasses off saying that otherwise they'd get broken. At the police station basement I got out in a circle of five policemen. Each hit me with openhanded roundhouse blows around the head. Then I was dragged across the floor 20 or 30 feet. At the elevator I was picked up and my head was rammed against the cement wall. I fell down and was told no sitting's going to be allowed and yanked me up by my hair.

I found out standing wasn't allowed either. They knocked me up and down several more times. Inside the elevator two other officers got in their licks. One jammed his elbow in my stomach.

Upstairs Rusk was charged with resisting arrest, abusive language, assaulting an officer and failure to yield to an emergency vehicle. After paying $162 bail he was released. Eventually, all the charges except abusive language were dropped. On the latter charge Rusk paid a small fine. As for Rusk's story of having been beaten up, police spokesmen say it is a complete fabrication. The surveillance of the Kudzu house is no longer an issue since everyone has moved out.

I could go on with this—Houston, Buffalo, Chicago—adding to this litany of woes, but to what purpose. I think we have seen enough examples of harassment and outright repression to realize that the traditional mechanisms and institutions for protecting civil liberties are shoddy instruments for guarding the rights of the citizens of Woodstock Nation. Authorities, lawyers, journalists and others most capable by position and sentiment to stand in the forefront of the constant vigil to protect our civil liberties are barely able to see that rights are being violated. As specifically regards the underground press, the melange of politics and youth culture found in most papers is simply too much for many of those concerned with civil liberties. Why, rubbing up next to a power structure exposé is a collage of naked bodies! Within a lengthy expose of city government, the writer spatters four-letter obscenities and insults. An article details the half-truths and deceptions of U.S. policy in Vietnam and then concludes with a histrionic tirade against American imperialism. How can one consider such papers worthy of high regard or protection? They are not serious. More likely, the underground press represents its own kind of seriousness, a seriousness that those brought up on more sedate journals of opinion cannot understand.

Let's take an example of this. In January 1970, Nola Express, an underground paper in New Orleans, became the first underground paper indicted under Federal obscenity statutes. If convicted, the two editors could have been sentenced to up to 5 years in prison and hit with $10,000 fines. The Nola Express issue in question was the November 21, 1969 one, specifically page 16, which the indictment characterized as "obscene, lewd, indecent, filthy and vile matter." Page 16 was a parody of a Playboy and touting the magazine as the bible of swinging affluent young Americans. The ad as it originally appeared in the New York Times showed a cleancut college man helping a pretty girl out of a sports car. "What sort of a man reads Playboy," the copy read, "he's on his way. He is young active, affluent. A hard man to get through to." The Nola Express version kept the copy intact but pictured a nude man masturbating before four Playboy centerfold nudes. It was vulgar and offensive and like most good satire, it struck at something very real.

The picture incensed the U.S. attorney's office. "The court has before it issue No. 43 of the Nola Express. The first government memo stated, "a cheap and unorganized tabloid consisting of trashy editorials, letters from its readers, classified ads, cartoons and on page 16, an obscene (sic) and filthy picture of an ugly naked man with his hand wrapped tightly around his erect penis masturbating to a climax in front of four pictures of Playboy Magazine."

Look at how Nola Express had succeeded in shaking up, in outraging, its audience. It had gone beyond permissible excess. The Government attorney quite obviously was outraged. He calls the naked man ugly, which doesn't happen to be the case. And despite all his mention of nudity he forgets to even mention that the pictures from Playboy are themselves of naked women.

Judge Rubin of the U.S. District Court at New Orleans dismissed the case, and his ruling is one of the most perceptive statements about the underground press that I have read anywhere. It deserves to be quoted at some length:

> Contrary to the government's assertion, it [Nola Express] is remarkably uniform in its approach to its general subject—the assumed foibles of the way of life generally accepted in this country today. Because it is a newspaper it is comprised of discrete articles, but it is more thematically integrated than most magazines or newspapers of general circulation and, in this regard, it adopts a single point of view of life, much like a novel or a film.
> Critics of the established order have frequently found it necessary to use language that shocked their audiences—neither Ezekiel nor Martin Luther spoke in bland terms. The defendants in this case were engaged in another kind of social and political criticism: they were attempting to expose what they consider hypocritical and venal in everyday life. They used emphatic, shocking and disturbing language and techniques of communication in their paper both to express their own depth of indignation and to arouse their audience. While their editorial format may be experimental, their objective is serious. . . .

I can't do any better than Judge Rubin in trying to bridge the generation gap. One unfortunate result of this gap is that the aboveground media have almost completely ignored the problems of the underground press. When Attorney General John Mitchell issued guidelines to limit the subpoena of newsmen and their information, and the Justice Department pointedly refused to say whether the underground press was included, there was no outcry. No professional organization of journalists jumped in realizing that some aboveground papers might next be excluded from the administrations definition of the "press." Since then part of the liberal establishment press—the Washington Post, the New York Times, and the Baltimore Sun—have had their reporters excluded from at least one presidential briefing.

It seems to me then that any legislation involving freedom of the press must—simply must—specifically include the underground press. Freedom can't be hoarded. It's perishable. You either use it or it dies. The underground press's only crime is to use that freedom. The papers expand the boundaries of journalism. They open up the media to ideas that are found nowhere else. They print articles and opinions that are not found elsewhere. Sure some of it is terribly biased and opinionated but so are some of the articles in your local paper and in mine. And so we just can't sit by, like good Germans, and let underground papers have their freedom taken away, for it's your freedom and mine, and it's our fight to see that underground papers can be sold freely on every street corner in America.

Senator Ervin. Some people think freedom of speech and freedom of the press is absolute, is that your opinion, it is absolute?

Mr. Leamer. I think you, in the morning session, Senator, were talking about the use of advocating the violent overthrow of the Government, and you made the distinction between talking about it and specifically advocating it, and I suppose in terms of the Constitution, that is the distinction, I suppose, one makes.

Senator Ervin. I think there are some people who occupy high positions, such as Justice Black and Justice Douglas, who have taken the position that freedom of speech and freedom of the press are absolute and there are no limitations whatever on it.

I think the generally accepted position among most people in the legal field is that, with the exception of the freedom of thought, which is implicit in the first amendment, that other first amendment freedoms can be subjected to limitations in extraordinary circumstances by Government.

So decisions are largely, to the effect, despite some recent holdings, which seem to conflict with it, that freedom of the press does not protect, has no application whatever to obscenities.

There are other decisions which recognize that freedom of the press does not extend, does not protect the right to incite others to the commission of crimes, and that freedom of the press does not protect people who libel or slander others and the majority of the Justices in the Pentagon Papers cases held that the freedom of the press does not protect the publication of information which may pose an immediate threat to our national security.

Now the courts have said, have gone pretty far to extend the freedom of the press to words in a speech which attacks the establishment. They have gone so far as to say, as stated this morning, as I construe the decision, that the Government cannot limit even the right to advocate the overthrow of the Government by force or violence or by other unconstitutional means, as long as it is the advocacy of ideas and does not teach action to accomplish that purpose.

As I further construed the decision, that they make a distinction between an individual and a group on the theory that a group can have a potentiality of being more dangerous than an individual, so they say that an individual cannot be punished or limited in advance in his right to exercise freedom of speech even though he may advocate unlawful acts unless his speech is other than such circumstance that it creates a clear and present danger, that it would incite action to accomplish the unlawful act.

They had sort of modified that in the Dennis case in respect to a group and they said that the Government could punish a group or limit the power of a group to advocate the overthrow of the Government by force and violence, only if the exercise of speech occurred under certain circumstances as to reasonably justify the conclusion that it would result in acts, either immediately or at some future time, of which the group deemed officious for accomplishing that purpose, and certainly under the recent decisions, the underground press has the protection of the first amendment insofar as it does not incite others to criminal action or to actions to overthrow the Government by force and violence, or engage in obscenity.

I have to confess what is obscenity is a very difficult thing, exactly. The old decisions were very plain on the subject, that obscenity was something, the publication of something which offended the sense of the average person in the community.

Of course, the Supreme Court in 1958 started putting some limitations on that, they still pretend they are not dealing with obscenity, but they are dealing with just discussion of sex, and they say the Government can't prohibit it unless it meets several particular qualifications, one of which it must destitute of social value—what that means nobody knows. Justice White suggested in one case, if you had obscene matter in a pretty binder, that while obscenity might not have any social value the pretty binder would.

I think the point you make insofar as the underground press does not go beyond any of these limitations which are very far out really, it has the same right of freedom of the press as anybody else.

Mr. Leamer. Which is a point which I suggested has not been made clear at all.

Senator Ervin. Undoubtedly what they say and what they advocate in many cases is rather offensive to the State and the sturdy people of the establishment.

Mr. Leamer. I think the obscenity issue has been used as kind of a screen for what are essentially political issues. When they talk about the underground paper, they immediately talk about sex and obscenity, which, actually, the underground papers never had more in them three or four years ago, which was not to sell newspapers. It was a part of the whole kind of contention of freedom. Whatever a person wants to advertise in a newspaper is fine, and the classified ads also, whatever one wants to put in the classified ads.

Senator Ervin. I was very much interested in your account of what happened to the Los Angeles Free Press.

The people were convicted of receiving stolen property?

Mr. Leamer. Yes; at that point there was not a law against publishing stolen documents. The State legislature again hurriedly put a law through and now there is such a law. But at the time, that was all they could get them with and the young gentleman who had in fact taken these documents, I believe received a suspended sentence. He turned State evidence and received a suspended sentence, and in that case there was a very high ranking, I believe, official involved, I think the deputy State attorney general was involved in trying that case, and the State went all out with the kind of the case they prepared to get them. And in their case, then, obscuring the fact to the jury that the publication had nothing to do with it, that the regular publication was absolutely no matter——

Senator Ervin. Are these things that gave rise to these prosecutions eventually the fact that they charged certain people occupying public positions with what is essentially corruption in office?

Mr. Leamer. Yes, they had a documented report about robbing a dormitory and the alleged rape of a student, I believe.

Senator Ervin. They were certainly publications which were designed, or rather would have the inevitable effect in the mind of those who read them, of lowering those in governmental power in the estimation of the readers?

Mr. Leamer. Excuse me.

Senator Ervin. In other words, a publication of this kind has a tendency to give the people who read it a very lower estimate of those people exercising Government power referred to in the publication?

Mr. Leamer. Yes, I think with reason, not only individuals involved, but also that the Government had been sitting on those documents for a long time in the case of the curruption in the police department, and nothing had been done.

Senator Ervin. That comes awfully close, a person prosecuted for that, assuming they are prosecuted for the publication.

Mr. Leamer. The fencing of stolen merchandise, the coercing and fencing, were the more serious crimes, and coercing a person to steal the merchandise.

Senator Ervin. They were not prosecuted for making the publication because that would have been essentially in the nature of one of the old common law prosecutions for seditious libel.

Mr. Leamer. Yes.

Senator Ervin. In those days they prosecuted anybody who said anything that affected the good reputation of the Government, no matter whether it was true or false, and so they seized upon the other pretexts which may have been legally sound, receiving stolen property?

Mr. Leamer. Yes, and the paper since then, because of the damage suits, has been forced to sell because they had other financial trouble but the civil law suits were settled out of court because he didn't feel he had the money to go ahead and pay the legal fees.

Senator Ervin. I would say undoubtedly under this system, these people certainly are entitled to their day in court because Justice Frankfurter spoke a great truth when he said many of the great rights which the law, the Constitution recognizes, had been proclaimed by the Supreme Court in cases which involved not too reputable people. And they are the people whose rights need protection more than those who have in high society more respectability.

Mr. Leamer. My point is, if we protect Arthur Kunkin we have protected Walter Cronkite as well, and the Los Angeles Free Press has not been able to get press passes. They have a circulation of over 90,000 and they have been refused time and time again. If there is a question about their bias, well it certainly makes it difficult for them to get the other side of the story when they don't have the traditional prerogative of the newsman, and that is true in other cities.

Senator Ervin. I look forward to the privilege of reading your book. I might say I haven't subscribed to these underground newspapers, and have seen only a few that have been sent to me by constituents, so I am not as thoroughly posted on the character of their publication as I should be.

It may be that some of them run afoul of the limitations that are placed upon them by the first amendment rights by most of the decisions and certainly a lot of them do not.

Mr. Leamer. I doubt again it's a question of how we are going to define these things. I am not a lawyer, but it seems to me they are performing an extremely important function, and we would be better off if we would look at some of the things they were saying 4 or 5 years ago. They might seem terribly radical but we are reading it in the editorial pages of other newspapers.

Senator ERVIN. I have frequently said and firmly believe, even though society may be very much annoyed by a publication of or the demonstrations by people who are dissatisfied with conditions or policies, that it is a value to society to listen to them because if the protests which they are voicing are valid, it should ultimately lead to reforms that are necessary and if the criticism is not valid, it is a good thing to allow them ordinarily to express their criticism, because it certainly has therapeutic value in relieving the tensions of those who are protesting.

Mr. LEAMER. I might add that President Nixon's State of the Union message this year could have been lifted almost directly out of a 1963 Port Huron SDS statement. Many of the kinds of issues being brought up then are now accepted as the problems we have.

Senator ERVIN. Thank you very much.

I think that we are slowly getting consideration of all of the questions that arise in this field, as we consider your testimony, which is thus far without parallel within the hearing, and also we have the very intriguing viewpoint expressed this morning by a professor from George Washington University Law School.

Thank you very much.

The subcommittee stands in recess until the 12th of October, at which time the place of our meeting will be designated.

(Whereupon, at 3:25 p.m., the meeting adjourned to reconvene on October 12, 1971.)

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1971

U.S. SENATE,
OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to recess, at 10 a.m., in room 1202, New Senate Office Building, Senator Sam. J. Ervin, Jr. (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senators Ervin and Thurmond.

Also present: Lawrence M. Baskir, chief counsel; and Bill Pursley, counsel.

Senator ERVIN. The subcommittee will come to order.

Today the Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights resumes in hearings on freedom of the press.

Our first 3 days of hearings were designed to bring into sharp focus some of the issues surrounding the First Amendment's guarantee of freedom of the press. We heard newspaper representatives underscore the threat to the independence and integrity of reporters posed by increased issuance of government subpenas. Several witnesses expressed their continuing concern, despite the Supreme Court's holding, over the impact of the Government's recent attempt to secure injunctions against certain newspaper publications. Broadcast executives and journalists pointed out existing and potential threats to the first amendment from too much Government regulation of broadcasting. Several Members of Congress testified that they share the concern of many Americans about the state of freedom of the press and suggested various solutions to some of the problems.

Over the remaining 5 days of hearings we will continue to hear witnesses with different perspectives on the issues. However, it is clear that there are many more individuals and groups whose views should be presented than can be accommodated in these 5 days. For this reason, the subcommittee will conduct a second series of hearings on freedom of the press in early 1972. At that time we will hear from individuals and groups whom we have not been able to schedule during this first series.

The second series of hearings is also necessary because the subcommittee thus far has been unable to arrange for the presentation of the views of the administration. Already, several witneses have challenged, directly and indirectly, the commitment of the administration to the principles of the first amendment. Widespread public concern over the relationship between the White House and the press is obvious.

Regrettably, Mr. Herbert Klein, the President's Director of Communications, has declined the subcommittee's invitation. As the man most concerned with communications policy for the President, he was, I thought, the ideal witness to speak authoritatively for the executive branch.

The Attorney General, Mr. John Mitchell, who was invited to testify today, is also an ideal person to present the administration's views. As chief legal officer and one of the President's most trusted advisers, his testimony would be invaluable. However, thus far we have not been able to complete the arrangements for his appearance. While I hope that we can arrange for his appearance sometime before the end of this first series of hearings on October 20, it will probably be more convenient to plan for his testimony in the second series.

The need for having a senior administration figure testify as to the administration's views and policies on the First Amendment issues and controversies seems obvious to me. There is no more important liberty than freedom of thought and expression. The first amendment stands at the pinnacle of our system of individual liberty. It incorporates what have often been called the "preferred freedoms." Certainly there can be no more important subject for the administration to address itself to than this. It takes no great perception to see that the issue of press and government directly concerns the administration. The witnesses last week, the hundreds of letters I have received in just a few days, and dozens of editorials and articles I have read attest to this. Our hearings give the administration an opportunity to present its views that it should not pass up. Furthermore, I believe the administration has an obligation to the Senate and the people to address itself to the issues before the country. That obligation cannot be filled by anyone other than a senior official of the administration who speaks for it, and who is publicly recognized as speaking for it. Quite obviously a third-echelon official, no matter how well qualified, is not an adequate substitute for the Attorney General on an issue as important as this.

Counsel will call the first witness.

Mr. BASKIR. Mr. Chairman, Mr. Stanford Smith, representing the American Newspaper Publishers Association, has an engagement later on this morning, and the other two witnesses, Mr. Goodman and Mr. Friendly, have kindly consented to let him appear in advance.

Senator ERVIN. Mr. Smith, I am delighted to welcome you to the subcommittee. And I wish to thank you for your willingness to appear and express your views and those of the organization you represent respecting this very important matter.

STATEMENT OF STANFORD SMITH, PRESIDENT AND GENERAL MANAGER, AMERICAN NEWSPAPER PUBLISHERS ASSOCIATION; ACCOMPANIED BY ARTHUR B. HANSON, GENERAL COUNSEL

Mr. SMITH. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

In the interest of time and trying to be equally accommodating to the other witnesses, I would suggest, sir, that I can summarize fairly briefly the prepared testimony, and you can receive the prepared testimony for the record in the form in which it was submitted.

Senator Ervin. That will be entirely satisfactory.

Let the record show that the entire written statement of Mr. Smith will appear in the record at the end of his oral testimony.

Mr. Smith. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the newspaper publishers congratulate you on the timeliness of this study. Our testimony seeks to supply some of the historical background of freedom of the press in America.

As I have been identified, my name is Stanford Smith. I am president and general manager of the American Newspaper Publishers Association. I am accompanied by our General Counsel, Mr. Arthur B. Hanson.

Our membership is more than a thousand daily newspapers whose circulation represents more than 90 percent of the total daily newspaper circulation in the United States. Therefore, we are concerned with all matters of general significance to the profession of journalism and the daily newspaper business.

We concur completely, Mr. Chairman, in your statement that "it is necessary at this time in our Nation's history to reexamine the purposes and the principles embodied in the constitutional guarantee of freedom of the press."

In attempting to assess where we are in that respect, we believe it is important to review the point of origin and to retrace highlights of the journey to the present. And that is what our statement essentially does.

History teaches us many lessons if we will but learn. The genesis of freedom of the press under the first amendment to the Constitution is an example. The important point which is sometimes ignored today is that the original demand for a guarantee of press freedom came not from those who were then engaged in the business of publishing newspapers or other types of publications. The demand came from persons in all walks of life who knew from their own experience at that time the threat to all individual liberties if there is no freedom of the press and no freedom of speech.

We need to emphasize that point continually. Freedom of the press is embodied in our Constitution for the benefit of all the people and not as an exclusive prerogative of those who are engaged in the business of news dissemination.

Our statement traces some of the historical background. As a matter of fact, through most of the world's history, tyranny was the norm, dating back to Emperor Augustus. And we trace our origins from England, and the situation in the Colonies. An early Governor of Virginia, for example, promulgated an order that no person be allowed to use a printing press on any occasion whatsoever.

There was one brilliant triumph of freedom of the press. And that is the famous John Peter Zenger case, which I need not recite at this time.

But an interesting point of history, to this day many consider it odd that the Constitutional Convention did not include any section regarding the press in the original draft. The main reason was the theory that the powers of Congress extended only to matters expressly delegated to it. By that reasoning the freedom of the press was not mentioned, and Congress would have no authority to legislate on the subject. But others took an opposite and ultimately prevailing position, that Congress had implied as well as express powers, and that it was therefore necessary specifically to preclude Congress from legislating in the area of freedom of the press.

Ultimately it was the assurance that the first Congress would remedy the Convention's omission that resulted in ratifications. Those assurances were accepted in faith, as was the entire foundation of this nation. And those assurances were not betrayed.

The first Congress in 1789 did indeed, as the primary order of business, set about buttressing the Constitution with the basic protection provided in the first 10 amendments and the Bill of Rights.

Incidentally, it is interesting to note that the package of amendments approved by that Congress numbered not 10 but 12. And what became the First Amendment was originally the Third. And the first two were dropped as being less consequential.

I am going to skip some of this historical background, Mr. Chairman, and get to a couple of the principal points.

Freedom of the press has been challenged in several different areas which have already been alluded to in some of your hearings, including the historic collision of the first and sixth amendments involving free press and fair trial.

The Supreme Court's decision in the Sheppard case nailed down with finality what long has been obvious, that the courts are not without ample remedies for limiting and counteracting prejudicial publicity. Fortunately in recent years there has been commendable initiative in the bar and the press to establish ground rules for more responsible practices in both professions. The common objective in stemming prejudicial disclosures and allegations is to safeguard more effectively defendants' rights under the sixth amendment without unduly restricting the press rights under the first amendment.

A related matter is the threat of contempt actions against reporters who have been subjected to subpenas recently in increasing numbers. Many journalistic organizations have recently filed briefs before the U.S. Supreme Court in three pending cases which test the validity of subpenas issued to reporters in connection with news gathering duties. There is widespread agreement in the field of journalism that this increased use of the subpena does represent a serious threat to the effective functioning of a free press on behalf of the public.

The remedy is yet to be decided. In our amicus curiae brief before the U.S. Supreme Court, ANPA argued that nothing short of an absolute privilege for professional newsmen to refuse to testify will create the certainty necessary to guarantee confidence in the promises of reporters to their news sources and thus guarantee the right of the public to be fully informed.

Many members of the Congress have indicated interest in the enactment of legislation to guarantee this right to professional newsmen. We suggest that the extent to which this legislation will be needed can only be determined after the U.S. Supreme Court renders its decision in the pending cases involving reporters under three different sets of circumstances.

What, then, is the condition of a free press in America today?

Reviewing in perspective its evolution under the first amendment, and assessing in particular the interpretations of that amendment at the highest judicial level, we believe one must conclude that on balance the concept of a free press has withstood the tests of time and the storms of challenge remarkably well. Despite the libel and obscenity limitations, and those of national security and contempt of court as well, and despite also the inevitable political pressures generated from time to time by official displeasure, the constitutional guarantee of press freedom has in our opinion measured up sturdily to the intentions, wishes and expectations of the Founding Fathers.

Yet in a world where change is a constant and crisis a certainty, no freedom is ever indefinitely secured. Under even the best of circumstances it is difficult to foresee a time when freedom of the press will not be under challenge, in court and out. Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty, and surely that will continue to be true where press freedom is concerned.

But more than being vigilant, the press must above all be responsible, which is to say professional, conscientious, discreet, fair and accurate in discharging its cardinal obligation, its reason for existence: to serve the American public as a medium of information and enlightenment.

That equation requires, however, that the public have a clear and deep understanding of the nature of a free press. For if the public doubts that the press is doing its job, if it fails to value the role of the press in protecting the foundations of a free society, then all of this country's institutions will be in peril.

Ten years ago our board of directors sponsored the organization of ANPA Foundation, a public foundation to encourage in the broadest manner the advancement of freedom of speech and of the press in the United States, and to promote education, study and scientific research in all fields relating to freedom of speech and of the press.

Our foundation is now engaged in a $10 million endowment campaign with one of its highest priorities accorded to a vastly expanded educational effort to develop and strengthen public understanding of freedom of the press.

Mr. Chairman, the prospectus of our foundation included statements which are completely in accord with your own statements in connection with these hearings. To quote briefly, that prospectus states:

> Most publishers and editors agree there never has been greater need for strengthening public understanding of the press. Nor is this simply to protect the interests of the press, for the public interest is plainly involved. Indeed, it is paramount. For, if the public does not value a free press, then all our institutions are in peril.
> The ANPA Foundation proposes to assume a central role in promoting public understanding of the nature of a free press and of the constitutional roots of freedom of speech and press.

The concept of this program involves many different projects which in total impact would make a major contribution to the expressed goals of this subcommittee; namely, "a greater public appreciation for the role of a free press in a democratic society."

I would like to close with a quotation from the pen of the eminent American jurist, Judge Learned Hand. He said of the first amendment that it "presupposes that right conclusions are more likely to be gathered out of a multitude of tongues than through any kind of authoritative selection."

"To many," Judge Hand wrote, "this is, and always will be, folly; but we have staked upon it our all."

Thank you very much.

(Prepared statement follows:)

TESTIMONY OF STANFORD SMITH, PRESIDENT AND GENERAL MANAGER OF AMERICAN NEWSPAPER PUBLISHERS ASSOCIATION

Mr. Chairman and members of the subcommittee, The American Newspaper Publishers Association appreciates the invitation to participate in this important study of the state of freedom of the press in America today. We congratulate you on the timeliness of this study. It is our purpose in this testimony to supply something which will be a useful basic record for the continuing work of your committee.

My name is Stanford Smith. I am President and General Manager of ANPA. I am accompanied by our General Counsel, Mr. Arthur B. Hanson. ANPA is a non-profit association with a membership composed only of daily newspapers. Our membership consists of more than 1,000 daily newspapers whose circulation represents more than 90 percent of total daily newspaper circulation in the United States. We are concerned with all matters of general significance to the profession of journalism and the daily newspaper publishing business. Our headquarters is now in New York City but we are constructing a new headquarters building and will move next Summer to Reston, Virginia, near Dulles Airport. One purpose of that move is to facilitate collaboration by our Committee on Government Relations and our staff with undertakings such as that which is now engaging your Subcommittee.

We concur completely, Mr. Chairman, in your statement that "it is necessary at this time in our nation's history to re-examine the purposes and the principles embodied in the Constitutional guarantee of freedom of the press."

In attempting to assess where we are in that respect, we believe it is important to review the point of origin and to retrace highlights of the journey to the present.

History teaches us many lessons if we will but learn. The genesis of freedom of the press under the First Amendment to the United States Constitution is an example. The important point which is sometimes ignored today is that the original demand for a guarantee of press freeedom came not from those who were then engaged in the business of publishing newspapers or other types of publications. The demand came from persons in all walks of life who knew from recent experience the threat to all individual liberties if there is no freedom of the press and no freedom of speech.

We need to emphasize that point continually. Freedom of the press is embodied in our Constitution for the benefit of all the people and not as an exclusive prerogative of those who are engaged in the business of news dissemination.

All other things being ostensibly equal, if that were possible, the infallible hallmark of tyranny would be—and is—government control of the printed word.

Through most of the world's history, tyranny was the norm, dating at least as far back as the public burning of undesirable books by the Emperor Augustus—which is to say during the earliest years of the Christian calendar.

The history of England is replete with comparable tyranny in the form of suppression, censorship and punishment. In the pre-revolutionary years of the American colonies, England had mellowed only in degree and technique. The Star Chamber, with its notoriously cruel and summary punishments, had been abolished in 1641. Governmental licensing of printing, a highly effective instrument of censorship and control, lapsed later in the century.

But the substitute techniques were hardly more benevolent—such as discriminatory and sometimes prohibitive taxes on newspapers and ready resort to prosecutions for seditious libel.

Some colonies fared worse than others. In Virginia a fifty-year ban on printing ensued after the royal governor of that colony and his council called one John Buckner before them in 1682. His offense had been in printing the laws of 1680 "without His Excellency's license." Buckner and his printer were ordered to post 100 pounds and promise not to print anything thereafter until His Majesty's pleasure might be known. A year later the colony's new governor promulgated an order that no person be allowed to use a printing press "on any occasion whatsoever."

One of Virginia's royal governors, Sir William Berkeley. bluntly stated the rationale in these words: "I thank God there are no free schools nor printing. . . For learning has brought disobedience and heresy and sects into the world and printing has divulged them and libels against the best government. God keep us from both."

To be sure, the press had scored one brilliant triumph during the otherwise desolate history of colonial times. John Peter Zenger won the earliest battle for freedom of the press in this country.

Zenger, who published a New York paper, had written that the liberties and properties of the people were "precarious" under the governor of New York and the current administration. He had complained of the removal of judges, creation of new courts without consent of the legislature and denial of the right to trial by jury. Zenger was arrested for having brought the government into disrepute.

At the now famous Zenger trial in 1735, the prosecution argued that he should be punished because he had "scandalized" the government. The court followed tradition in rejecting any notion that truth might be a defense. But Zenger's lawyer, Andrew Hamilton of Philadelphia, succeeded in having the case tried by a jury. That jury, by its verdict of not guilty, established the concept of truth as a defense to libel—and deprived judges of sole power to determine what was libelous.

While the outcome of the Zenger case is properly celebrated as a millennium, and always will be while a free press exists, its immediate effect was less than epochal. The colonial press continued to be plagued by every sort of legalistic inhibition and harassment the British governing mind could conceive.

In all, it is clear from our country's early constitutional history that resentment against this pattern of repressive taxation, prosecution and peremptory silencing as a means of controlling the press played a substantial role in the rising sentiment for independence in the American colonies. It is equally certain that this was the genesis of the First Amendment.

To this day, many consider it odd that the Constitutional Convention did not include any section regarding the press in the original draft of the U.S. Constitution. The fact is that this subject—along with several other major rights and freedoms for which the Revolutionary War had been fought—received little mention during the months of laborious debate and composition at Philadelphia in 1787.

At one drafting session, Delegate Pinckney of South Carolina suggested a clause granting safeguards to the press. He proposed that the clause be worded: "The liberty of the press shall be inviolably preserved." The suggestion evoked little comment and no action, but not for lack of accord with his view.

The apparent basis on which Pinckney's suggestion was dropped was the theory that the powers of Congress extended only to matters expressly delegated to it. By that reasoning, if freedom of the press was not mentioned, Congress would have no authority to legislate on the subject.

But others took an opposite and ultimately prevailing position—that Congress had implied as well as express powers and that it was therefore necessary specifically to preclude Congress from legislating in the area of freedom of the press.

While that view did not prevail at the Constitutional Convention, it certainly did when the Constitution made the ratification rounds of state conventions. Time and again objections arose that the freedoms and rights of average citizens had been neglected in a preoccupation with forms, structures, rules and mechanisms. In Massachusetts, John Adams said in nearly as many words that his state would vote for the proposed constitution only on condition that certain basic amendments would be added.

Ultimately, it was the assurance that the first Congress would remedy the convention's omissions that resulted in ratification of the Constitution in 1788.

Those assurances were accepted in faith, as was the entire foundation of this new nation, and those assurances were not betrayed. The first Congress in 1789 did indeed, as the primary order of business, set about buttressing the Constitution with the basic protections provided in the first ten Amendments, the Bill of Rights.

Incidentally, it's interesting to note that the package of amendments approved by that Congress numbered not ten but twelve. What became the First Amendment was proposed as the Third. The first two, having to do with apportionment and congressional pay, did not win ratification. They were regarded as administrative matters of small consequence compared with the other ten amendments representing the legal embodiment of fundamental human freedoms, rights and privileges. In particular, the states were impressed by James Madison's assertion that what is now the First Amendment was the "essential difference between the British government and the American Constitution."

The Bill of Rights became part of the Constitution late in 1791. But it has taken most of the intervening 180 years to define the latitudes and limitations of freedom of the press. It could well be that the definition process will continue indefinitely.

To begin with, the First Amendment prescribed that "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom . . . of the press." This left the states relatively free to determine their own restrictions, with a resulting unevenness that was only technically remedied by adoption of the 14th Amendment in 1868. That amendment states in part: "No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law. . ."

Since immediate attention focused on the 14th Amendment as a bolstering sequel to the 13th Amendment, which abolished slavery, the 20th century was more than a third of the way along before Supreme Court rulings imposed on the states the same strictures against press-freedom abridgment that the First Amendment had imposed on Congress.

In the early years of the Republic, the British colonial concept of seditious libel lingered on, First Amendment or no.

Mainly to silence critics of foreign policy, the Federalists enacted the Sedition Act of 1798, a broad-gauged statute that resulted in the fining of several newspapermen and the imprisoning of a few. They were pardoned and the fines refunded when Thomas Jefferson succeeded John Adams as President on March 3, 1801, the day the statute expired. The Federalist Party, incidentally, never again won a national election.

The next major threat to press freedom arose during the Civil War, when direct military censorship was imposed for the first time in the nation's history. Various northern periodicals were barred from the mails, editors were jailed occasionally on orders of the Secretary of War or Secretary of State, and federal troops seized some newspaper offices in New York City, Chicago and Missouri, suppressing issues of the papers.

American entry into World War I saw the enactment of the Espionage Acts of 1917 and 1918, giving the government broad leeway in suppressing unpopular sentiments. President Wilson imposed strict cable censorship under his powers as Commander in Chief.

But primarily—and here was a hopeful turning point—President Wilson established the Committee on Public Information, which specified types of information, esentially of a military nature, that "obviously must not be mentioned in print." Newspaper editors were advised that "matters of doubtful nature . . . should not be given publicity until submitted to and passed by the committee."

In general, newspapers cooperated and thus was set a pattern of "voluntary censorship" that was to function again in World War II.

The Espionage Acts of World War I did result, however, in several convictions that were upheld in the Supreme Court. One involved a newspaper publisher attacking the war, another the publisher of a German-language newspaper critical of capitalism and the war—but the one that was to frame a lasting judicial concept involved one Charles T. Schenck, who during the war had distributed Socialist circulars opposing military conscription. In concurring with the high court's decision to uphold the conviction, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes originated the criterion of "clear and present danger."

Holmes stressed that the First Amendment's protections were not absoluate. "The most stringent protection of free speech," he asserted, "would not protect a man falsely shouting fire in a theatre and causing a panic. . ."

Holmes went on to say: "The question in every case is whether the words used are used in such circumstances and are of such a nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that Congress has a right to prevent. It is a question of proximity and degree."

The "clear and present danger" yardstick resurfaced in the 1930s through the 1950s as a protector of constitutional rights. Far from obsolete, that yardstick seems likely to see further service.

A so-called "ad hoc balancing test," as enunciated by Chief Justice Vinson in 1950, held that the court must in each case balance the individual interest in freedom of expression against the social interest sought by the regulation which restricts expression.

In the years spanning the standards enunciated by Justices Holmes and Vinson were two Supreme Court decisions of special note.

The case of Near v. Minnesota, decided in 1931, involved a Minneapolis newspaper that had charged rampant racketeering in the city and had accused the police chief of receiving graft. Under a state gag law, the newspaper was permanently enjoined from publishing.

The high court upheld the defendant and demolished the Minnesota statute. Chief Justice Hughes said in the majority opinion that "the question is whether a statute authorizing such proceedings in restraint of publication is consistent with the conception of the liberty of the press as historically conceived and guaranteed. . . The fact that the liberty of the press may be abused by miscreant purveyors of scandal does not make any the less necessary the immunity of the press from previous restraint in dealing with official misconduct."

Ten years later, in 1941, the Supreme Court made this emphatic declaration in the case of Bridges v. California: ". . . The only conclusion supported by history is that unqualified prohibitions laid down by the framers [of the Constitution] were intended to give to liberty of the press, as to the other liberties, the broadest scope that could be countenanced in an orderly society."

The same could be said of a decision 23 years later, in 1964, in a landmark libel case against the New York Times for printing an advertisement that criticized official conduct in a civil rights controversy. In substance, the Supreme Court held that no person may be subjected to either a civil suit for damages, or a criminal prosecution, for comments about public officials unless there is proof that he made a false statement with actual malice in mind—that is, "with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not."

The Court said it had considered the case "against the background of a profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust and wide-open, and that it may well include vehement, caustic and sometimes unpleasantly sharp attacks on government and public officials."

The foregoing so-called New York Times rule was extended the same year by the Supreme Court to include voluntary public figures, such as individuals engaged in political or social movements. Also in the same year, the high court applied the Times rule to an invasion of privacy suit by involuntary public figures—in this instance a family held hostage by escaped convicts.

In the most recent landmark decision concerning freedom of the press, national security was a major consideration—thus in effect pitting the doctrine of clear and present danger against the precedent forbidding prior restraint. The latter prevailed in the Supreme Court's refusal to bar the New York Times and the Washingtom Post from resuming publication of highly classified Defense Department documents. Unresolved at the present time is other legal action concerning the conveyance and possession of the documents.

Just as freedom of the press has faced recurrent challenges under national security and libel statutes, so too have certain publishers—mainly in the book and magazine fields—run afoul of obscenity laws. The Supreme Court has flatly declared that obscenity is unprotected by the First Amendment—although the court's definitions of obscenity have generated considerable confusion and uncertainty among state and local legislators, enforcement authorities and lower courts.

Finally, among the major circumscriptions on freedom of the press is the risk of being deemed in contempt of court. The courts have broad authority to punish interference with the orderly administration of justice.

One prominent source of friction in this respect has been the long and painful effort to rconcile the First and the Sixth Amendments, the latter guaranteeing a "speedy and public trial." A corollary is that the trial also be fair. This in turn presupposes an impartial courtroom atmosphere and, particularly, unbiased jurors.

Thus it has many times been charged that "pre-trial publicity" has influenced jurors and prospective jurors to a point where a fair trial was impossible. Such publicity has led to contempt of court charges against newspaper publishers and editors.

Criticism of judges or attempting to influence them, especially before or during trials, are the other main sources of contempt charges placed against newspapers.

A historic collision of the First and Sixth Amendments evolved from the Sheppard case, as did a significant decision by the Supreme Court sorting out the means of averting future collisions.

Dr. Sam Sheppard was convicted in Ohio in 1954 for the murder of his wife. Publicity accorded the case before and during the trial was plentiful, sensational and frequently bizarre, not to say sometimes wild and reckless.

The central issue posed in the appeal heard by the Supreme Court was not, however, the legitimacy of the reportage but rather Sheppard's allegation that he had been deprived of a fair trial because of the trial judge's failure to protect him sufficiently from massive, pervasive and prejudicial publicity that attended the prosecution.

The Supreme Court agreed with Sheppard and set aside the conviction, thus making possible a retrial. Following are brief excerpts from the court's 1965 decision:

"The carnival atmosphere at trial could easily have been avoided since the courtroom and courthouse premises are subject to the control of the court."

"The court should have insulated the witnesses."

"In addition, sequestration of the jury was something the judge should have raised sua sponte with counsel."

"The fact that many of the prejudicial news items can be traced to the prosecution, as well as the defense, aggravates the judge's failure to take any action. . . More specifically, the trial court might well have proscribed extrajudicial statements by any lawyer, party, witness or court official which divulged prejudicial matters, such as the refusal of Sheppard to submit to interrogation or take any lie detector tests; any statement made by Sheppard to officials; the identity of prospective witness or their probable testimony: any belief in guilt or innocence; or like statements concerning the merits of the case."

Continuance and/or change of venue were cited as further remedies the trial judge could have ordered.

The Supreme Court's decision in the Sheppard case nailed down with finality what long had been, or should have been, obvious: that courts are not without ample remedies for limiting and counteracting prejudicial publicity.

Fortunately, in recent years there has been commendable initiative within the bar and the press to establish ground rules for more responsible practices in both professions. The common objective, in stemming prejudicial disclosures and allegations, is to safeguard more effectively defendants' rights under the Sixth Amendment without unduly restricting the press' rights under the First Amendment.

A related matter is the threat of contempt actions against reporters who have been subjected to subpoenas recently in increasing numbers. Many journalistic organizations have recently filed briefs before the U.S. Supreme Court in three pending cases which test the validity of subpoenas issued to reporters in connection with news gathering duties. There is widespread agreement in the field of journalism that this increased use of the subpoena does represent a serious threat to the effective functioning of a free press on behalf of the public.

The remedy is yet to be decided. In our amicus curiae brief before the U.S. Supreme Court, ANPA argued that nothing short of an absolute privilege for professional newsmen to refuse to testify will create the certainty needed to guarantee confidence in the promises of reporters to their news sources and thus guarantee the right of the [illegible] be fully informed.

Many members of the Congress have indicated interest in enactment of legislation to guarantee this right to professional newsmen. We suggest that the extent to which this legislation will be needed can only be determined after the U.S. Supreme Court renders its decision in the pending cases involving reporters under three different sets of circumstances.

What, then is the condition of a free press in America today?

Reviewing in perspective its evolution under the First Amendment, and assessing in particular the interpretations of that amendment at the highest judicial level, we believe one must conclude that on balance the concept of a free press has withstood the tests of time and the storms of challenge remarkably well.

No one could reasonably expect that concept to be absolute. Even in a free society, all freedoms have their limits if that society is also to be orderly and equitable.

The abiding essence of the First Amendment was perceptively expressed by Justice William O. Douglas nearly 20 years ago in an essay on censorship in his book "An Almanac of Liberty." Douglas wrote:

". . . The very idea of a censor is instantly at war with the demands of the mind and spirit of men. This does not mean that anything one likes may be published with impunity. There are laws of libel and obscenity. One takes the calculated risk that he may be punished for what he says or writes. But one who offends gets the benefit of a jury trial and is not subject to the mere whim or caprice of the censor. Our system develops in the end, I think, a stimulating diversity and a sense of responsibility not known when authors are dependent upon a bureau for what they may publish."

So, despite the libel and obscenity limitations Justice Douglas mentions, and those of national security and contempt of court as well, and despite also the inevitable political pressures generated from time to time by official displeasure, the constitutional guarantee of press freedom has in our opinion measured up sturdily to the intentions, wishes and expectations of the Founding Fathers.

Yet in a world where change is a constant and crisis a certainty, no freedom is ever indefinitely secure. Under even the best of circumstances, it is difficult to foresee a time when freedom of the press will not be under challenge—in court and out.

Eternal vigilance is the price of any liberty, and surely that will continue to be true where press freedom is concerned.

But, more than being vigilant, the press must above all be responsible—which is to say professional, conscientious, discreet, fair and accurate—in discharging its cardinal obligation, its reason for existence: to serve the American public as a medium of information and enlightenment.

That equation requires, however, that the public have a clear and deep understanding of the nature of a free press. For if the public doubts that the press is doing its job, if it fails to value the role of the press in protecting the foundations of a free society, then all of the country's institutions will be in peril.

The ANPA Foundation is now engaged in a ten million dollar endowment campaign with one of its highest priorities accorded to a vastly expanded educational effort to develop and strengthen public understanding of a free press.

Mr. Chairman, the prospectus of the ANPA Foundation includes statements which are completely in accord with your own statements in connection with these hearings. To quote briefly, the ANPA Foundation states:

"Most publishers and editors agree there never has been greater need for strengthening public understanding of the press. I would like to close with a quotation from the pen of the eminent American jurist, Judge Learned Hand. He said of the First Amendment that it "presupposes that right conclusions are more likely to be gathered out of a multitude of tongues than through any kind of authoritative selection."

"To many," Judge Hand wrote, "this is, and always will be, folly; but we have staked upon it our all."

Senator ERVIN. I want to commend you on the excellence not only of your written statement but also of your oral statement.

I think you point out in an excellent manner the fact that all other freedoms hinge upon freedom of speech and freedom of the press. Without the freedom of the speech and the freedom of the press we could have no political freedom; without these freedoms we could have no intellectual freedom; without these freedoms we could have no religious freedom. And so you are undoubtedly correct in saying that all the other freedoms stemmed from these basic freedoms of speech and the press.

I also appreciate the fact that you pointed out that these hearings are of value. And I think that is true even though they may not result in legislation. There is a great truth which is embodied in the original constitution of my State, which was drafted in December 1776. It says: "The frequent recourse to fundamental principles is essential to the preservation of the lesson of liberty."

And I think that it is absolutely essential for us to appreciate such fundamental principles embodied in the First Amendment. As you point out, the freedom of the press is not established for the financial benefit of the press, it was established for the people, for two reasons, it seems to me. One is philosophical, the men who drafted the First Amendment recognized that it was essential to have freedom of the press in order that America might be free from the worst sort of tyranny, that is, tyranny over the mind. The second reason was pragmatic in nature; the men who drafted the first amendment realized that the freedom of the press was essential to the proper functioning of the governmental institutions they established.

Therefore I think it is undoubtedly correct, as you observe, that this Nation staked its existence upon the principle that it has nothing to fear from the exercise of the freedom of the press as long as it leaves truth free to combat error.

So I want to thank you again.

And I thank Mr. Hanson for his appearance here today.

Mr. SMITH. Thank you sir.

Senator ERVIN. Call the next witness.

Mr. BASKIR. Mr. Chairman, our next witness this morning is Mr. Julian Goodman, president of the National Broadcasting Co.

Senator ERVIN. Mr. Goodman, I want to welcome you to the subcommittee, and express our appreciation to you and the National Broadcasting Co. for your appearance here, and for your willingness to give us the benefit of your views on what I think is the most important part of the Constitution, if any one part can be singled out as having a priority over other parts.

STATEMENT OF JULIAN GOODMAN, PRESIDENT, NATIONAL BROADCASTING CO., INC.

Mr. GOODMAN. Thank you, Senator.

My name is Julian Goodman and I am president of the National Broadcasting Co.; but, before I became that in 1966, I spent 20 years as a working reporter and administrator in broadcast journalism and my interest in a free press stems from personal experience as well as public and corporate concern.

I appreciate this opportunity to testify, because the issues before you are very important ones that deserve careful consideration by thoughtful men who are interested in the past and the future as well as the present.

These issues do not involve simple cases of right and wrong, or heroes and villains. The officials of government seek to advance the public interest, as they see it in their own fields. Their efforts to promote justice, enforce the laws, investigate the need for possible legislation, and foster fairness are honorable and well-intended.

However, when such government actions limit journalistic independence, they also affect the public interest in a free press. This results in conflicts among different sets of public values. As you have already noted, Mr. Chairman, this very conflict between the functions of government and of the press attests to the vitality of the first amendment.

But the existence of such a conflict also requires a judgment on the public interest priorities. On this question, we believe that there is a paramount public interest in having a free and independent press. It should take precedence over other interests that could interfere with press freedom.

That goal is not a special favor to journalists. It is essential to the design of an open society. In such a society, constant communication between the Government and the public is necessary. The press is a principal means through which the government communicates with the people. But the purpose of the press is not to serve as an instrument of government. It must also hold government policies and actions up to public attention and examination.

Without this independent press function, there is no effective offset to the Government's enormous power to mold public opinion its way. An important part of the press today is television journalism. Abridgment of press freedom—print or electronic—will impair the balance of our system, and can lead to a tyranny of government which the system is designed to prevent.

The reasons for guarding press freedom should apply with particular force to television journalism because it is the medium most used and most relied upon by the public as its primary information source.[1] In view of this fact, as you have said, Mr. Chairman, if the First Amendment principles are not applied to the broadcast press, "it may well be that the Constitution's guarantee of a free press is on its death bed."

[1] "An Extended View of Public Attitudes Toward Television and Other Mass Media 1959-1971. A report by the Roper Organization, Inc.

It is true that broadcasting operates under Federal license, while the printed press does not. But the necessity for government licensing of frequency use does not license the Government to set aside constitutional principles. And the standard of public interest which governs broadcasting should not be applied to limit the public's paramount need for and interest in a free broadcast press.

In the light of these considerations, let me summarize my comments on the major questions before you affecting the broadcast media:

1. Is the First Amendment under any special attack today? Yes; we believe it is for many reasons.

2. Does the increase in the number of subpenas issued to newsmen have any part in this assault on the first amendment? Yes; we believe it does.

3. Do newsmen need a special protection, such as that proposed in S. 1311, which would protect them from forcible disclosure of their sources? Yes; we believe they do.

4. Does the interpretation of the fairness doctrine by the FCC constitute an invasion of the rights of the broadcast media under the first amendent? Yes, we believe it does.

5. Does the use of press credentials by Government investigators compromise the credibility of a free press? We believe it does, and more than that, it can threaten the personal safety, and sometimes the lives of legitimate reporters. For example, Welles Hangen, one of our most distinguished foreign correspondents, has been missing in Cambodia for a year and a half. We have used every possible avenue to get word about him, thus far without success. But it is clear that what might most endanger him is the unfounded suspicion that he is in any respect an agent of Government, rather than the independent professional journalist he has always been.

Each of these items raises fundamental questions, but I would like to concentrate on two specifics involving increasing threats to broadcast news—subpenas on newsmen and FCC regulation of the broadcast press under the fairness doctrine. Because of the nature of the public interests at stake, the expansion of Government power in these areas is alarming even though it may fall short of direct censorship.

During the past 2½ years, more than 100 subpenas were served upon two television network companies, requiring their newsmen to appear and disclose films and other material that had not been broadcast. This raises two dangers—the tendency it has to dry up confidential sources of the very kind of information which is not otherwise readily available; and the public distrust of the press that can be created if it is forced to become an agency of public or private litigants.

The public disadvantage, in our opinion, is too high a price to pay for what often is only a convenience to the prosecution or defense. And since many courts impose few bars on issuing subpenas, the practice can be overdone, so that the reporter, in effect, becomes part of the investigative machinery of the Government or the courts.

We feel that the traditional respect accorded to newsmen's information is no longer adequate and that a Federal statute is now desirable to protect this information on a uniform national basis. We therefore support S. 1311 although we believe it can and should be made more effective. With your permission, we will submit a brief memorandum, prepared by our counsel, recommending some revisions for that purpose.

A problem much more difficult to treat relates to public criticism of the press by Government officials. I do not suggest that the press should be free of criticism, because newsmen are not more infallible than other men and because the press is no more perfect than other human institutions. Specific errors of fact or analysis should properly be called to public attention, and the correcting factual material should be publicly supplied.

Certainly Government officials do not constitute a class that should be prohibited from criticizing failures of the press. But when the criticism by Government officials is sweeping rather than factual or specific, when it broadly condemns the press as irresponsible or malicious, it can damage the public interest in several respects. It can discredit news media which have the responsibility of reporting disturbing and unpopular developments about which the public should know. It can also lead to public apathy toward the weight and significance of First Amendment principles.

There is the added danger of intimidation when broad and general condemnations are directed against a federally-licensed press medium by Federal officials. The fact that the Government and press serve different functions is no reason for antagonism between them. If a problem exists in this area, it is best dealt with through suitable self-restraint of officials sensitive to the issues involved, and through public airing of these issues. That is one of the purposes of these hearings and we believe it is a purpose of great public value.

As a news medium, we subscribe to the journalistic standard of fairness, and we seek to practice it conscientiously. The FCC rule dealing with fairness—its system of regulations called the fairness doctrine—has little in common with journalism. We are increasingly concerned at the process by which Government judgments are being made in this field.

The FCC is evidently concerned, too. It is conducting a general inquiry to reformulate its policies in this field, because as Chairman Burch of the FCC recently said, under the present situation "both licensees and the public can only fall back on prayer to divine the Commission's intent."

Even more serious than the resulting confusion is the fact that the FCC is deep into the news area, and this sort of Government oversight of the journalistic function does interfere with freedom of press expression.

The fairness doctrine started with a simple proposition that if a broadcaster editorialized on one side of a controversial issue, as many individual stations do, he should provide opportunities for the presentation of contrasting views, so that the public would not be misled. In recent years, this simple doctrine relating to editorials has been expanded to the point where officials of Government, rather than professional journalists, can determine most of the elements that involve news judgment on presenting controversial issues:

What is the issue; what represents a position on the issue; and the extent and manner for presenting other positions.

As a result, we have even arrived at a situation where the FCC draws inferences of expression on controversial issues from product advertising, and counts the minutes and seconds of commercial presentations to calculate the time devoted to direct opposing argument on the issue inferred.

The problem is aggravated by the fact that the fairness doctrine is typically invoked by complaint, and almost always, the complainant is a special interest group that seeks to use broadcasting as its propaganda instrument. To the degree the FCC assists in this process under the fairness doctrine, the information material presented by broadcasting will not be that selected by journalists but that required by the government at the behest of special interest groups.

We are hopeful that as the Commission reexamines its position in this matter, it will return to first principles in applying the doctrine so that it does not make the Government the ultimate editor of broadcast journalism.

We are asking the Commission to recognize that the basic purpose at hand is to avoid misleading the public by presenting a controversial issue as if it had only one side. A Federal court has stated the matter precisely in observing that "the essential basis for any fairness doctrine * * * is that the American public must not be left uninformed."[1] We believe this purpose is met if the broadest schedule discloses the existence of the issue so that the public has the opportunity to learn that there is a controversy and to learn its nature.

This does not justify the Commission in undertaking to judge the respective amounts of time, frequency, persuasiveness, or methods of presentation with which the various aspects of the issue are presented. Even if no other problems were involved, the Commission is simply not equipped to make these editorial judgments. But more profound questions are involved. Fairness in journalism is a quality that cannot be regulated. And in a field of expression that borders so closely on constitutional guarantes, a Federal agency should act with particular restraint.

As we will point out in our filing with the FCC, the fairness doctrine should be limited to situations where the material broadcast directly and clearly advocates a position on a controversial issue, and the broadcast schedule does not elsewhere inform the public on other viewpoints on the issue. When confronted with such a possibility, the Commission should give substantial weight to the broadcaster's judgments on all aspects involved and should find a violation only when there is no rational basis for supporting the broadcaster's judgment.

These principles, it seems to us, will protect the public from misrepresentation, without making the Government the participant or overseer of the details, mechanics, and substance of journalistic judgments.

This committee can assist in the situation by emphasizing the public policy principles involved. We ask that you examine the guaranties of the First Amendment as they apply to broadcast journalism, that you provide guidance to the FCC in its present review of the fairness doctrine, and that you keep open this hearing to receive the results of that review.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Senator ERVIN. You state that you favor the proposal to create what may be called a newsman's privilege by legislation. Do you not agree with me, however, that the necessity for implementing such a proposal will be either increased or decreased by the decision which the Supreme Court will make in the three cases pending before it, such as the Caldwell case?

Mr. GOODMAN. Yes, sir, I do agree that that could affect the need for such a bill. But it seems to me that it would be helpful to have the bill in any circumstances. I recognize the reason for the title of the bill. I think it is really a protection of the public rather than of a newsman.

Senator ERVIN. It is really the advocacy of a privilege which is fundamentally based on the fact that society has a real need to know the truth, and that the truth can be best presented by those who have an incentive for conducting the investigation and either printing or broadcasting the truth as they view it.

In my judgment the decision of the court of appeals in the Caldwell case is really one of the outstanding judicial decisions. It recognizes the public's right to receive truth, and it recognizes also that it is most likely to receive such truth through free speech or a free press. It also recognizes that the public has an interest in truth for the purpose of administering justice. And it lays down the fundamental principle, as I interpret it, which has a restricted application, that no gatherer of the news for broadcasting or printing purposes can be required to divulge the sources of his information, or even to appear before a grand jury, unless the public can show an overriding public interest in his testimony, and unless the public can also—using the word "public" talking about the prosecution—can show that it cannot obtain the needed information from any other source.

It seems to me that the court in that particular case did a very good job of balancing those two rights according to their respective priorities. It would seem to me that if the Supreme Court in effect adopts a similar view in respect to the right of the public to know and the right of the public to have information for law enforcement purposes, that the need for a substitute will be materially decreased.

I am very much interested in the fairness doctrine. And I think you have given a very fine discussion of that doctrine. I was impressed by your comment on the way the FCC uses the fairness doctrine on product advertising, because I happen to come from a State where they grow a great deal of tobacco and manufacture a great deal of tobacco. And there seems to be a great deal of difference of opinion between the two groups of physicians, those who hold political office, and those who seek to alleviate the ills of society by practicing medicine. The political doctors condemn the use of tobacco, particularly cigarettes. A great many of the medical doctors, however, contradict their suppositions and conclusions in respect to what injury, if any, smoking cigarettes does to the human constitution.

The Congress made a mistake, I think, in banning advertising on television of cigarettes. If the Congress can ban advertising of cigarettes on television they can ban anything on television.

Furthermore I think the FCC—for people who are not supposed to be influenced by political considerations as much as Members of Congress—compounded what I call a very injudicious act on the part of Congress. I fundamentally think that Congress has no constitutional power to ban the advertising of anything which is legal to sell to the general public. But the FCC came along and compounded the offense by saying that those who adopt the views of the political doctors, including the FCC have absolute possession of all the truth on this subject, and those who disagree with them have none. I don't think that that kind of an attitude can be reconciled with the most essential provisions of the first amendment. That was the same old reason that prompted the tyrant to require everybody to get a license for the purpose of being permitted to print a book.

I have some observations concerning people who complain about TV news coverage on the ground that the TV broadcaster selects the news that he is to present, and he doesn't always present the news that they think ought to be presented. That is quite a human attitude, I think. We like to hear the news presented with respect to the things we believe in, as we believe them. And we don't like to hear the news presented on subjects we don't like. That same statement about the selection of what is aired by TV broadcasters be applied to the President of the United States when he delivers the State of the Union message. He selects the subjects on which he is going to talk, and very often he eliminates other subjects from all consideration. The same thing is done by a U.S. Senator when he makes a speech on the floor of the Senate. He selects the views he is going to expound, and sometimes refrains from expressing the views that other people would like to have him expound.

So that complaint is going to be made or can be made in respect to any agency or any individual that exercises the right of freedom of speech or the freedom of the press; is it not?

Mr. GOODMAN. I think it certainly can, Senator.

Senator ERVIN. And an attempt to regulate that fact is likely to result in grievous injury to both of these freedoms; is it not?

Mr. GOODMAN. I think it will result in grievous injury. Too many people, I think, reach the conclusion that those who broadcast news on the air seem to approve the kind of news that they have to broadcast. But by the nature of the world we live in today the news sometimes is unpleasant, and newsmen are often the bearers of unpleasant tidings which people don't seem to like. And each one of them does seem to look at it from his own personal vantage point, as you mention. But I have had a lot of experience in news. And our own company has more than a thousand people involved in its daily coverage. And I can assure you that they go about it only with professionalism and fairness, and a balance, and accuracy.

Senator ERVIN. Some of the truth is very discouraging.

Don't you think it is very unfortunate for this country that there is not very much that is newsworthy in the fact that an individual or a certain segment of society is God fearing and law abiding?

Mr. Goodman. I know that there are some people who would like for us to dwell more upon the good things that happen in life rather than those things that do, according to most editors, make the news. But the experience and knowledge of many news editors goes into the makeup of every newspaper and every broadcast. And they go about it as best they can, and without trying to bring in an improper balance by looking for something that will cover the unpleasant news they have to report.

Senator Ervin. Isn't an inescapable truth with respect to what is newsworthy expressed in the old saying that "when a dog bites a man, that is not news, but when a man bites a dog, that is news"? In other words, the general public is not as interested in normal occurrances as they are in abnormal occurrances. A great majority of people in our society are nonviolent, and so there is no great news value in presenting news of these law abiding and God fearing persons.

Mr. Goodman. I think perhaps, Senator, that the viewer might tend to accentuate that which he sees and doesn't like, and tends to overlook what he likes which we do broadcast and which does reflect a good side of American life.

You may have seen the series that a fellow North Carolinian David Brinkley has been doing about good places to live in the United States. Some of them are very attractive.

Senator Ervin. Yes. And I think it is very wholesome to present them.

Now, as I construe your remarks, there is a place for the fairness doctrine in broadcasting if the application of that doctrine is restricted so that it does not interfere or curtail the right of the broadcaster to express his own views.

Mr. Goodman. That is correct, Senator.

Senator Ervin. And you accept the validity of the fairness doctrine, as I take it, insofar as it imposes an obligation upon the broadcaster to permit a reply to his editorializing.

Mr. Goodman. That is correct. The original concept of the fairness doctrine applied to editorials, and it said, when a station broadcasts an editorial, it should give time to reply to the man who is affected by that, or the institution. And that doctrine over the years has been changed. And as you yourself noted in the case of the cigarette decision by the FCC, the fairness doctrine was used to cover the decision the FCC made in the case of cigarettes. And once that decision is made, it can lead them down a regulatory road that could say anything is controversial. And that is what we find is a prospect to be avoided if possible. And that is why we suggested a return to the basic principles for which the fairness doctrine was first established to reply to editorials.

Senator Ervin. The Supreme Court in the Red Lion case recognized another application of the so-called fairness doctrine. Where a personal attack was made on an individual, the broadcast media should give him an opportunity to reply to the personal attack. In my opinion if that interpretation is restricted to what are really personal attacks, then that is a valid application. I believe that most news media will recognize it and voluntarily afford an opportunity to reply to the one who has a genuine claim that he suffered personal attacks. But the day is coming, it seems to me, that any expression or a statement of views on public questions that doesn't give the "right" emphases will be construed as a personal attack and demands will be made for an opportunity to express personal opposing views. I would think that under a proper interpretation of the fairness doctrine that the right to reply to a personal attack should be called into play only rarely.

Mr. GOODMAN. As I mentioned, Senator, we have always adhered to the journalistic standard of fairness. We simply feel that we do not require additional exterior regulatory reasons to enforce that. We feel that the judgment of broadcasters can be trusted. And as you yourself point out, while these kinds of things will be rarely required, they can be administered fairly by responsible broadcasters, which I believe we are.

Senator ERVIN. Your point, as I understand it, is that there is always danger in Government regulation that the regulators will be tempted, and will sometimes succumb to the temptation, to substitute their views as to what is newsworthy for that of the broadcaster.

Mr. GOODMAN. That is absolutely correct, Senator. One governmental regulatory step follows another, and the end result down the road could be increasing control over what is broadcast on a free journalistic basis. And I think for that to happen would be very bad for the country.

Senator ERVIN. That is certainly consistent with the undoubted truth that every journey starts with a single step.

Thank you very much for a most lucid statement of the issues involved and of the necessity for keeping the broadcasting industry free from violations of the first amendment.

Mr. GOODMAN. Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator ERVIN. To my mind the First Amendment is one of the great works of genius of the Constitution. No one at the time the first amendment was written ever envisioned such things as the radio or television. But yet the freedoms which the first amendment guarantees, the freedom of speech and the freedom of the press, clearly embrace within their protection those media of communication and all other possible media of communication which may yet be developed.

Mr. GOODMAN. Your hearings are going a long way toward reminding people of that, Senator. And I am afraid it is something that too many people have forgotten in the hectic times we live in.

Thank you.

Mr. BASKIR. Mr. Chairman, our next witness this morning is Professor Fred Friendly of the Columbia University School of Journalism.

Senator ERVIN. Professor Friendly, I want to welcome you to the subcommittee, and express deep appreciation for your willingness to appear and give us your views in an area in which you have had vast experience, and are most knowledgeable.

STATEMENT OF FRED W. FRIENDLY, EDWARD R. MURROW, PROFESSOR OF BROADCAST JOURNALISM, COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY GRADUATE SCHOOL OF JOURNALISM, AND ADVISER TO THE FORD FOUNDATION ON TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Friendly. Thank you, Senator.

I am afraid I am going to have to invoke in one place a word that you used in your opening day testimony, an old North Carolina word, "I am not so plum' sure." Some of the things I am going to talk about which I was sure about all my life, recently, I have come back to say, I am not so plum' sure.

Senator Ervin. That is the reason we have the freedom of the press, because there are many things you are not plum' sure about and society is not so plum' sure about. It is in the interest of society to have free discussions about all subjects where doubt and uncertainty exists.

Mr. Friendly. Good.

Mr. Chairman, I am Fred W. Friendly, Edward R. Murrow Professor of Broadcast Journalism at the Columbia University Graduate School of Journalism, and advisor to the Ford Foundation on telecommunications. Previous to these assignments I was, for 16 years, an executive producer at CBS News, and for 2 years, president of that organization. Before that I sat side by side with Mr. Goodman in a newsroom in NBC.

This fall, in collaboration with a Columbia law professor, I began teaching a new course, "Journalism and the First Amendment." In preparation for this I spent the past year reexamining a lifetime of convictions and assumptions concerning the first amendment and my profession. I have concluded that the first amendment, like all of the Bill of Rights, is a cornerstone but not a completed building. To paraphrase a 19th century professor of constitutional law, Woodrow Wilson, who went on to other things, "It is a root, not a perfect vine * * *. It is the sap-center of a system of government vastly larger than the stock from which it has branched. * * *"

I believe, Mr. Chairman, with all my heart and conscience, in the spirit of the First Amendment. To say that I believe the absolute letter of that law should automatically be applied to 20th century technology would be simplistic and unfair to James Madison and his fellow framers of the Bill of Rights. It would be, to borrow from Mrs. Malaprop, "to anticipate the past."

There is every evidence that the drafters of the first amendment were being purposefully ambiguous. We must resist the temptation to put our own libertarian words in their mouths. The canon, "Congress shall make no law * * * abridging the freedom of speech or of the press * * * ," presupposes a community of equals, which is the very core of the Constitution and the Declaration of Independence. Yet, when Congress passed the Communications Act of 1934, it implicitly created an electronic community where some citizens are more equal than others.

The premise of the First Amendment is that free expression will flourish as long as:

1. Government remains neutral—stays out.
2. Everyone has the same tools and/or access to those tools.

When the Government, through the FCC, disturbs that delicate balance and enfranchises several citizens to operate the equivalent of a super public address system that can, in effect, drown out that multitude of diverse and robust voices, then the ground rules may have been changed. The Federal Government, because of the limitations of the electromagnetic spectrum, had no choice in the twenties and thirties but to issue radio licenses. And in the forties and fifties to issue television licenses. But in giving some citizens this awesome responsibility and unique privilege, it, by definition, denied these rights to others. The open market place of ideas became more dynamic, more far-reaching but, nevertheless, limited.

Indeed, the gift of this license can be considered a form of "prior restraint," as the courts have stated, and if one wanted to pursue a legal point, one could argue that the Communications Act and the first amendment have been on a collision course. The Blackstonian principle against "prior restraint" so simply restated in our First Amendment, foreclosed the divine right of kings and governments to license only selected printers and publications. The Communications Act, although clearly forbidding FCC censorship of radio and television communications, necessarily bestows licenses on some but denies them to most others. The franchise holder, as the gatekeeper to the biggest soapbox in town, becomes an adjudicator of everyone else's First Amendment rights. Walter Lippmann once put it another way: "Suppose there were only three printing presses in the Nation, to whom would you give that responsibility?"

The Government, having made this major alteration in the system by which we communicate, has an obligation to make certain the system is used well and used enough. To say that is not to imply that the Senate or the House of Representatives or the FCC has any place in the "content" business. It does have an obligation to make sure, as Edward R. Murrow once put it, that "licensees don't welch on their promises"—promises not to please all the people all the time, but to use the system to communicate, not just to amuse and to sell goods.

At a time "when what the American people don't know could kill them," high officials who are critical of broadcasters for doing their best remain virtually silent about their worst, which is clearly visible almost every night in prime time. If the Vice President of the United States were one-tenth as concerned with the low level of nighttime entertainment as he is with the performance of Cronkite or Brinkley or Reynolds, his motives might not be so suspect. If some Members of Congress were as concerned with the selling of violence and superfluous medicine as they were with "The Selling of the Pentagon," the debate over slanting the news might be more understandable.

I am more distressed with attacks on the news media from the Vice President and certain members of Congress than I am with the Communications Commission. Most of the time the FCC has been a leaning tower of Jello, more concerned with citizen's band radio and marine frequencies than with the crucial communications that shape our lives. But there have been some notable exceptions. Some of my former colleagues may not like what I am about to say, but the truth is that the threat of Government action after the quiz show scandals in 1959 and 1960 is what caused "CBS Reports," NBC's "White Paper" and other documentary programs to be placed on the nighttime schedule. And now that the threat has receded, the programs have gone back to the intellectual ghetto, receiving only an occasional nighttime exposure.

When I hear some broadcasters whom I respect complain about the chilling hand of FCC intervention, I share that concern but, frankly, I perceive very little FCC meddling in newsroom activities. The chilling hand that concerns me far more is the corporate concern for maximizing profit. It is this profit drive that causes the network evening news programs to remain a half-hour in length. And if you take out the commercials, that means 22 minutes—when every newsman and producer and executive knows they should be an hour.

It is the dollar sign, not the Government's censorship stamp, that has caused the termination of all weekly scheduled documentaries and public affairs in prime time. The news organizations of the three major networks are capable of far more professional journalism than ever gets on the air, and the frustration of many practitioners is hardly a secret. Vice President Agnew, for all his denunciations of broadcast journalism, has not really influenced the cancellation or abridgment of a single program. The real censor remains the high cost of air time.

My position is that the First Amendment should apply to broadcast journalism, but I also believe that the broadcast industry must meet the Bill of Rights half way or at least a quarter of the way. There ought to be an electronic bill of rights, but to make that work there would have to be an electronic "bill of responsibility." Broadcasters would have to give their professional consciences "equal time" with their corporate balance sheets. The fairness doctrine, section 315, and the FCC's requirements for diverse programing are nothing more than substitutes for this bill of responsibility, and they are not adequate. The fairness doctrine is awkward to enforce and demeaning to the FCC and I think to the broadcast profession.

I think that the equal time provision of Section 315 of the Communications Act is counterproductive and causes less public access, less debate, not more. And the programing requirement is sampled only at license renewal time, and even then it is seldom successfully met.

Frankly, Mr. Chairman, I don't believe the fairness doctrine works very well. If the doctrine is enforced in broad and general terms, it represents no more than the credo of an honest journalist. If—and this has sometimes been the tendency—the doctrine is applied fastidiously by the FCC, the potential for abuse is enormous. In the hands of a lazy management or a timid journalist, the doctrine is a convenient excuse for doing nothing, and I have seen it used as an excuse for doing nothing. On balance, I suppose that the fairness doctrine is a necessary evil in a technology of scarcity—an ultimate restraint against the broadcaster who might abuse his public trust. But I look forward to the day when, with broadband cable capacity, we have sufficient television channels so that the doctrine, will not in capital letters, be necessary.

Nor do I believe that congressional or FCC investigators have any place in the newsroom or second-guessing the editing of documentaries. Frank Stanton of CBS was on solid ground in refusing to give up film outtakes and other unused material from "The Selling of the Pentagon." Judging from the number of policy changes made by the Defense Department as a direct result of the broadcast, Congressman Staggers and his subcommittee should be asking why there aren't more investigative documentaries.

Congress has a responsibility to make certain that the long-range promises affecting the public interest are honored. It has no place in the newsroom or in monitoring individual programs. It is unfortunate that the House of Representatives decided that issue of "The Selling of the Pentagon" on political grounds before the courts had a chance to decide it on constitutional grounds.

I think, on another subject, that the subpenaing of a reporter's notes, which you talked about with Mr. Goodman, whether he be a print or broadcast reporter, is a futile exercise which is an unproductive as it is unconstitutional. The plain fact is that experienced reporters leave very few relevant facts in their notebooks or on the cutting room floor. Prosecutors looking there for admission evidence will do better to spend their time in more fruitful pursuits. In truth, the subpoenaing of reporters' notes is attempted much more for harassment than in search of light. Incidentally, I think the Pearson Bill, S. 1311, is an excellent step in the right direction, but it is really only a beginning. And I do hope that cameramen and photographers can be included as being protected behind the shield. And you can watch them covering a hearing like this, or any other major event today, or minor event. The cameraman is an important element in broadcast journalism.

On another subject before you, the use of false press credentials by police officials who seek cover seems to me as fraudulent and dishonest as the false use of police badges by newsmen—both are inexcusable. Both should be unlawful.

But getting back to broadcast regulations, repealing the fairness doctrine or improvising other patchwork alterations in the communications structure will not reorder the priorities of the first amendment. Specifically, it is the piecemeal approach which has made us face a situation where Presidents of the United States can avoid debating their challengers by hiding behind the equal time provisions. It is the absence of an electronic Bill of Rights which caused CBS News to spend far more money and energy defending "The Selling of the Pentagon" than in producing it. It is the absence of an electronic Bill of Responsibility which necessitates broadcast editors compressing complex issues to such a point that too often they must maximize heat at the expense of light. Television is so unfair to its own journalists in the distribution of air time and its use that it can't possibly be fair to everyone.

It is the lack of an adequate communications policy that requires politicians to mortgage their consciences, hock their souls, as one politician once put it to me, to raise anywhere from $10,000 to $50,000 for a few minutes of air time, which, in most other democracies, is provided free to candidates for political office. It is the absence of a communications policy that subverts the newly established Public Broadcasting Service to second-class status by denying almost half of our major cities the use of a VHF (very high frequency) public television transmitter. Think of the irony. Congress and the foundations pour tens of millions of dollars of funds into public broadcasting while "Sesame Street," "The Advocates," "Masterpiece Theatre," and the other refreshing programs of public broadcasting cannot be seen in approximately 45 percent of American homes. For example, the Washington-Baltimore area, with a total of seven commercial VHF stations and not one public VHF license, is a constant reminder of the high price we all pay for bad planning.

The situation has reached such proportions that in Los Angeles recently—and I don't think this has been revealed—even $15 million, raised in the philanthropic and business worlds, could not ransom a commercial VHF channel for the public sector. Half the children of Los Angeles still cannot watch "Big Bird" or the other characters of "Sesame Street" on the public television in the Los Angeles area.

The absence of a long-range communications policy causes the Nation to improvise and stumble from one crisis to another. Television regulations grew out of radio law, just as the term "public interest, convenience and necessity" was borrowed from Interstate Commerce Commission language pertaining to grain elevators.

If we continue to improvise we shall never break out of the thicket which slows our progress. Even today when broadband community cable could put 50 or 60 channels into every home, could end the constricting limitations of the VHF quasi-monopoly, could change television as much as television changed radio, we are bogged down in jurisdictional controversies between cities and States, between the States and the FCC, between the FCC and the White House. Cable television, the wired city, as it is sometimes called, could virtually eliminate limited access and the other problems which now make it difficult to apply all of the principles of the first amendment to broadcasting.

It could happen, the open access, if we reorder our priorities and create the kind of long-range communications policy that can carry us into the next century.

To change this course we need a knowledgeable citizens' commission. I think, to question and report on where we have been. After 37 years, how well has the Communications Act served the Nation? Has the FCC been a threat to journalistic independence? Has it been a goad for progress some of the time? Should a new agency be created exclusively for telecommunications? Is the First Amendment compatible with a semiclosed franchised system? What should replace the fairness doctrine? Should vast conglomerates be allowed to own television stations and/or cable systems? After all, aren't our banking institutions limited in the kinds of corporations they may acquire? Should members of Congress be permitted to own stock in conglomerates which own powerful broadcast operations? How can public broadcasting be provided with a long term finance plan completely insulated from Government and foundation control?

We need a serious study of all these problems, not by Government and not by the broadcast industry, but by a panel of concerned and learned citizens. In Britain the Pilkington Commission in 1962 evaluated the long range performance of the BBC and there are constantly surveys like that being made in that and other countries.

I am not recommending an examination of day-to-day content, and certainly not an inspection of broadcast practices on any one program. I am talking about the promise and the performance for a decade. It is precisely this kind of long range evaluation which will keep opportunists from sharpshooting practices that take aim at individual journalists and documentaries.

To conclude, merely reciting the litany that broadcasting deserves all the protection of the first amendment will not make it true. Like patriotism, integrity, and marriage, it is better upheld in the demonstration than the recitation. Much more work and thought, much more self-examination on and off the air, much more access to air time for those who believe they have been wronged by television and radio, is essential. For communications to be truly free, there must be opportunities to vent the steam that builds up in what Jefferson called "the most certain and legitimate engine of government."

Mr. Chairman, in your eloquent statement at the beginning of these hearings, you had a sentence which ought to be on the first page of the book which I hope you or someone else will write about these hearings: "If the First Amendment principles are held not to apply to the broadcast media it may well be that the Constitution's guarantee of a free press is on its death bed." The outcome of this issue lies not only with those in high places who make communications policy, but also with those who make television and radio programs.

The First Amendment will apply when the broadcast schedule is worthy of it. Did the Founding Fathers mean what they seemed to be saying? Had they ever dreamed of broadcasting, would they have included it under the protections of the first amendment? Perhaps the best answer to that is another question. Do broadcasters mean what they seem to say about their responsibility to the public in their applications for license renewal?

Senator Ervin. Your statement is very illuminating and very intriguing. As far as these hearings to date are concerned, you have expressed some quite original viewpoints.

I would infer that it is your opinion that First Amendment freedoms carry with them first amendment obligations which rest very heavily upon the broadcast media. This is so because of the very nature of the broadcast media; it enjoys some exclusive privileges which are not enjoyed by the news media generally. Is that a fair summation of your general thesis?

Mr. Friendly. I think you have said in 30 seconds what it took me 13 pages to do. I think if there were enough time the ability to be fair comes much easier. If the better newspapers of this country had to do it all in one page it would be very hard to be fair. The recent advent of the op-ed page of The New York Times and other newspapers means that when Senator Ervin or Fred Friendly has something said about him that he doesn't like, he has a chance to stand up and answer back. Sometimes in broadcasting you don't have a chance to argue back. And very often, controversial issues don't get aired because there's always the threat that you may have to provide all that time that doesn't exist. In the early days of broadcasting when air time was inexpensive, there was much more of this.

Senator Ervin. I believe you would agree with me that one of the tendencies of our generation is that we tend to emphasize rights rather than responsibilities.

Mr. Friendly. I think there are no rights without responsibilities.

Senator Ervin. Your criticism of the broadcast media is based largely on your beliefs that it has an obligation to inform the public as to what is going on in our country and the world, and that it restricts the coverage of the news too much in favor of commercials and programs which are designed to amuse rather than to inform.

Mr. Friendly. I am all for entertainment, and the performing arts, obviously and implicitly. But I think the news organizations—it is because I think so much of the news organizations that I hate to see them relegated to 22 minutes every night.

For example, yesterday in a class at Columbia we ran one of the McCarthy broadcasts that Ed Murrow did that I worked on. It was very interesting. In our broadcast, although we tried to present the case for and against the Senator, I think a great many people thought it was more anti-Senator Joseph McCarthy than it was pro. Mr. Murrow said at the end of that broadcast that if Senator McCarthy feels that he has been harmed by this broadcast, or we have not been fair, he can have a half-hour. And we gave him a half-hour as soon as he was ready to do it, which was 10:30 on a Tuesday night. Not only is there no program like "See It Now" on the air on a regular basis, but there is no place to vent that. I think the open robust debate we need automatically requires lots of space, lots of time. I don't want to make broadcasting into a 19-inch wailing wall; I just want to make sure there is enough time so that there is always the problem of doing the other side. But when you add to that problem the fact that there isn't enough space, enough air time, you dramatize that more than it can stand. And there is no reason to do it, because there is enough air time, there is enough air time for the broadcasters to make a very fair profit and still leave enough time for venting. I think there ought to be two or three half-hours a week when people who feel that their ox has been gored have a chance to come on and say, Mr. Broadcaster, you did wrong by me, and here is why.

Senator Ervin. There would undoubtedly be a great deal of difficulty in administering the system in such a way as to give everybody who felt that their ox had been gored the opportunity to reply. There would have to be a way in which to determine who had made a meritorious complaint.

Mr. Friendly. Yes. But I think we can do that, I think broadcasters and editors can do that. Obviously, you can't give everybody the opportunity the same night. But I do think—I proposed this in a speech that I made once at Tufts University—that there be a kind of ombudsman procedure, and when somebody, whether it is Vice President Agnew or a little man or a great man, feels that something about him has been unfair, that he gets to face the man who attacked him right there in the studio. And he says, Mr. Friendly—were I the producer of that program—at another time you did a program about me, and you said this and this, and I want to argue that with you. And it would have two values. I think it would allow venting, which you need in an engine like this. But also I think it would make journalists a lot more careful, when they know that they are going to have to face the man they are talking about in a studio, it has a great therapeutic value. And I think to do that you need air time. That is what we don't have enough of.

Senator ERVIN. I recently reread the script of Edward R. Murrow's telecast in respect to Senator McCarthy. And in the light of what I later learned from sitting on the committee which recommended the censure of Senator McCarthy, I am compelled to say that that telecast was one of the greatest blows for freedom of thought and freedom of speech and freedom of the press and for the first amendment that has ever been made in the history of our Nation. To my mind it is just about as important, if not more important, than the verdict of the jury in the Zenger case.

Mr. FRIENDLY. Mr. Murrow would be very proud to hear you say that.

I think he would add if he were here that he always believed that Senator McCarthy's answers to him—he had a half-hour to answer Murrow, in which he did attack him, using the tactics in the way for which he is now famous—Murrow also felt that that broadcast was more of an indictment to Senator McCarthy than Murrow's broadcast, that giving to him a half-hour of air time and the way he used it was so counter-productive to what Senator McCarthy was trying to do.

And that of course, reinforces my view that enough air time will help to do that.

But it is very generous of you to say that, Senator.

Senator ERVIN. I became well acquainted with the effects of Senator McCarthy's tactics on the Nation. In spite of a lot of recent controversy about the right of speech and all, I think it is really impossible for us to criticize today what was going on in the days of Senator McCarthy.

Mr. FRIENDLY. It was a nightmare.

Senator ERVIN. I came to Washington from the cloistered ivory tower of an appellate court. I was put on that committee simply because I had had a little judicial experience, and nobody else was fool enough to accept service on the committee. I just couldn't believe what had been going on—that the public allowed itself to be intimidated to the extent that it was. No politician wants any mud thrown on him. And, politicians at that time were always in danger of getting mud thrown on them if they showed their independence of that individual.

Turning to another point in your presentation.

You stated your opinion that since the broadcast frequencies in the VHF field are now so restricted, you hope that through the use of cable television a point will be reached someday where there will be enough broadcast outlets so that the broadcasting industry can virtually be relieved from any stringent government regulation, except that of assigning channels.

Mr. Friendly. I think in 10 years or less, if the policy is made properly, it will be possible for almost everyone to have access to the air, what we now call the air.

Senator Ervin. You draw a distinction between the printing press and the broadcast media, particularly those enjoying the benefit of UVH and VHF channels. You base this on the fact that anybody can go into the printing business with enough capital, whereas the broadcast industry must be restricted under present conditions because of the lack of sufficient channels.

Mr. Friendly. Yes. And yet, Senator, that is where I use your word plum' sure again. I grew up believing that. And I still believe that about the broadcast side. And yet if you push me very hard about your statement that anybody with enough money can start a newspaper, that really isn't true. You need $50 million to start a paper in a major city, and you might not make it. And I think someday we are going to have to look at that situation. I think it is true that there are a lot of underground newspapers that become overground newspapers. The newspaper in New York now called the Village Voice which just a few years ago started on a shoestring now has quite a readership. But I do think that there are too few newspapers. And I do think the plain truth is that the chance to start new newspapers in major cities is less and less a possibility, and I grieve over that.

Senator Ervin. I will certainly agree with you that from a practical standpoint the idea that any person can go into a newspaper business is more theoretical than practical. But there is a legal distinction. The law allows anybody to go into the newspaper business provided they can meet the practicalities of the business, whereas the law necessarily restricts to a comparatively small number—I am talking about the law, not the facts—those who go into the broadcasting business. Despite that fact, however, we probably have more competition in radio and television than in printing.

Mr. Friendly. But you know, Senator, I read the testimony of some of the earlier witnesses, and that really is a suspect figure. There are on paper more television and radio stations than major newspapers. But a great many of those radio and television stations do very little news. And what they do they do very badly. So I don't think that is a very fair comparison. And I think that it's one of those numbers games that people like to play to make a point. There are too few television stations doing a good job, and there are also too few newspapers. But you are quite right, the government had nothing to do with giving the newspapers their monopoly. The government had everything to do with giving the broadcasters their monopoly. And that does make a difference.

Senator Ervin. You state that it would be unwise, in your judgment, for Congress to attempt to cure any of the ills in the broadcasting field by piecemeal legislation, and that the only ultimate regulation that you believe would work satisfactorily would be what you call a Bill of Rights and Responsibilities?

Mr. Friendly. I think that is part of a major communications plan for the country for the rest of this century.

Senator Ervin. And that is something that requires much profound study?

Mr. Friendly. A lot of work. And you are beginning it here. But we have a great deal of back homework to do. We haven't tended this vine for a long time.

Senator Ervin. Senator Thurmond.

Senator Thurmond. I notice you refer to the Vice President in your statement several times. Are you critical of the Vice President or critical of the FCC for allowing the Vice President to do what he has done, or just what is your situation?

Mr. Friendly. I am certainly not critical of the FCC for allowing the Vice President to do what he has done, because I don't think they have got anything to do with him. I would like to divide the two points if I might. I am critical of the Vice President because I think that in denouncing journalism generally and broadcast journalism generally, he has planted the seeds of doubt in this country about something that is as important in its way as is government. He has every right to do that. I quarrel with his facts and his interpretations.

Senator Thurmond. The networks certainly expressed themselves freely. Why would you object to the Vice President expressing himself freely?

Mr. Friendly. I don't think the networks expressed themselves freely on subjects quite as explosive as that. I think the Vice President has every right to do that, Senator, every right in the world. And I think that other people, you and I among them, have every right to be critical of him. But I am not talking about his right, Senator.

Senator Thurmond. I have been amazed at some of the news media, including the networks, that have been very critical of the Vice President, and yet they have been guilty of the very thing of which they accuse him.

Mr. Friendly. How do you mean that, Senator? I am not sure I understand you.

Senator Thurmond. In other words, the Vice President has expressed himself very freely on matters, including criticism of the networks and the news media, and yet they criticize him for doing that.

Mr. Friendly. That is pretty healthy.

Senator Thurmond. Why do they jump on him when they are doing the same thing themselves?

Mr. Friendly. Because I think this is what this country is all about, Senator, strong and robust debate. I think the Vice President makes his point—and the people will decide about the Vice President every 4 years—he makes his point, and the broadcaster, whether he be Walter Cronkite or Julian Goodman who was here just today, or David Brinkley or somebody from South Carolina, has a right to answer him. That is what America is all about. The Vice President is either right or wrong. And people have a right to talk about that.

Senator Thurmond. They have a right to talk. And the Vice President has done that. And yet he has been censored and criticized and castigated for doing that. And the networks have done the same thing.

Mr. Friendly. Let us just say that the networks and the Vice President deserve each other. And the citizenry will decide who is right.

Senator Thurmond. As a matter of fact, the people generally have been favorable to the position taken by the Vice President, haven't they?

Mr. Friendly. Well, I am not sure——

Senator Thurmond. I believe the polls have shown that, and the response the Vice President has received. I just wondered why the double standard. What I am trying to get at is: Why the double standard?

Mr. Friendly. May I say respectfully, Senator, that I don't see any evidence that the public supports the Vice President any more than it does the broadcaster. But your word is as good as mine, probably better.

As far as the double standard—I see no double standard. I think the Vice President of the United States made his most severe indictment on television from Des Moines on all three networks. 29½ minutes of air time. He had the right; he did it. And people have been talking about it ever since. It has been a very good subject for dialogue. It enables people like you and I to talk about it. And in the end of the day the American people will decide where the credibility is. with the Vice President of the United States who wants less journalism or with the broadcasters who want more. But I think it is a very healthy debate. And I hope there is no double standard.

Senator Thurmond. The public generally have approved of what the Vice President has done. And personally I approve of what he has done. And I think the people have a right to hear what he has to say. And yet the networks and the news media and the newspapers. that is. the so-called liberal ones, have jumped all over him for it. Why the double standard?

Mr. Friendly. Senator, I read the newspapers, and I read them in your State. I read the conservative ones as well as the liberal ones and the radical ones. And I hear as many conservative voices criticizing the Vice President as I do the liberal ones. But I don't think there should be a double standard. And if I were running a news department, I would say to the Vice President of the United States, Mr. Vice President, come sit down. Here is the president of this network and that network, and here is broadcaster X and Y, and Senator Ervin, and Senator Thurmond; let's talk about it. It is very interesting that there has been no dialogue between the Vice President and a prominent broadcaster on television or off. Why not? I am sure they would be glad to invite the Vice President to be on their air to discuss it.

Senator Thurmond. The networks are on the air everyday, and they can brainwash and brainwash, and they have been doing it for years. And I am very proud that the Vice President had the courage and the fortitude to stand up and answer some of these things. And the American people, I think, feel the same way.

Mr. Friendly. Well, Senator, you will permit me to say that I am just as proud that the broadcasters have had the opportunity to answer the Vice President. And I think that both of us will live to see the day when history will judge where the Vice President was and was not.

Senator Thurmond. And I hope the public generally will have an opportunity to go on the networks more and answer things that are brought out by the networks, because I have seen this thing go on for years and years, and the public has.

Mr. Friendly. But you do agree that letting the public have access, and politicians too, on the air to make their criticism would be a healthy place to do it?

Senator Thurmond. I think certainly there is a right to criticize. And they have the right to criticize. But the way some of the networks have been doing it has been very unjust and very unfair. And then when the Vice President jumped on them about it, then they yelled just like a stuck pig.

Mr. Friendly. It seems to me the Vice President is doing pretty well.

Senator Thurmond. I think he is. I think if you took another poll today the poll would be even higher than previous polls in favor of the position of the Vice President.

Mr. Friendly. Well, Senator, that poll is going to be taken one of these days; I guess in 1972, if he is on the ticket. And I am not sure that is going to be true. But the American people have a pretty good chance to make that poll known. I think the Vice President has to take his lumps like everybody else. He can criticize the broadcasters, but then you cannot interfere with letting the broadcasters criticize the Vice President.

Senator Thurmond. I am delighted to see freedom of speech in every way, shape, and form. And I hope the public will be given and afforded a greater opportunity than ever before to answer some of the unfair statements by the networks.

Mr. Friendly. That is where you and I agree, Senator. Thank you.

Senator Thurmond. Thank you very much.

Senator Ervin. I have said for a long time that we favor freedom of speech and freedom of the press and freedom of broadcasting when we agree with what is said and that we tend to dislike it when we disagree with the material presented. As a Democrat I don't like to hear the Republicans make campaign speeches criticizing the Democrats, just as I don't think the Republicans like to hear the Democrats make campaign speeches criticizing them. I think that if some of the news media didn't like the criticism of Vice President Agnew, and Vice President Agnew didn't like the criticism of some of the news media, that it is proof of the human element involved on both sides of the controversy. I take great satisfaction in the fact that I think Vice President Agnew has the right to criticize the news media, and the news media has the right to criticize things for which Vice President Agnew stands as well. I agree with your observation that that is what our country is all about, and that is what keeps this country a free society.

Mr. Friendly. And that is why you have to use the air time.

Senator Ervin. I am very fond of the Vice President personally, and I also believe in his right of free speech. I would be pleased if he would come down and be a witness before this committee.

Mr. Friendly. I think that would be great. I would like to come back on that day, Senator.

Senator Ervin. I have been trying to get somebody from the administration to come down and testify, either from the Department of Justice or the head of the FCC, Mr. Burch. Thus far I have been unsuccessful. I hereby now extend to the Vice President an invitation to come down and testify either for himself or for the administration.

Mr. Friendly. Senator Ervin, the Senator on your left, if you would excuse the expression—I mean that only geographically——

Senator Thurmond. I am generally on the right.

Mr. Friendly. You are on my right. But as long as Senator Ervin would like to have the Vice President of the United States come and testify here, and as long as he seems reluctant to come, and as long as you think it so important for him to be in this drama, why don't you get him to come, why don't you be the talent scout that says to the Vice President, come on down to these hearings, we want to ask you some questions?

Senator Thurmond. I would be very glad to have him come if he cares to come. I guess he has his reasons for doing things the same as you do.

Mr. Friendly. He is in Greece today, and I am here.

Senator Thurmond. That is a good place to be, to be in Greece. I think this country ought to stand by the Government of Greece more than we do today.

Mr. Friendly. I hope that is not a question, sir.

Senator Ervin. As far as I know, the Vice President has not manifested any reluctance to come down here. I have invited other members of the administration to present their viewpoints about this whole question, but they haven't accepted. I would be awfully glad if the Vice President would volunteer to testify for himself and the administration. As I said before, I am very fond of the Vice President.

Mr. Friendly. Well, sir, I share most of those views.

And if you get the Vice President to come, Senator Thurmond, you are going to have 80 cameras here, this room will be packed, and you can be on television for 7 hours. It will be the best and most important broadcast since 1954.

Senator Thurmond. I would be very glad to have him come if he cares to come.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Ervin. Thank you very much.

Mr. Friendly. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and Senator Thurmond.

Mr. Baskir. Our final witness today is Mr. David Hamer, president of the National Press Photographers Association.

Mr. Chairman, I might say that Senator Hruska had hoped to be here to welcome Mr. Hamer, however he was detained in Nebraska because of a funeral.

Senator Ervin. Mr. Hamer, I am delighted to welcome you to the subcommittee. I appreciate very much, as does the subcommittee, your appearing here for the purpose of expressing your views and those of the organization which you represent. We would also like to welcome Mr. Heileman, who is with you.

STATEMENT OF DAVID HAMER, PRESIDENT, NATIONAL PRESS PHOTOGRAPHERS ASSOCIATION, INC.; ACCOMPANIED BY DON HEILEMANN, CHAIRMAN, FREEDOM OF INFORMATION COMMITTEE

Mr. HAMER. Thank you.

Mr. Chairman, distinguished members of the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights. My name is Dave Hamer. I am a newsfilm cameraman for KMTV news in Omaha, Nebr., and I appear today as the president of the National Press Photographers Association.

Appearing with me is Don Heilemann, also a newsfilm cameraman, employed by WTOP–TV here in Washington. He is chairman of our Freedom of Information Committee.

We wish to thank you for inviting us to testify.

The National Press Photographers Association membership is composed of some 3,500 working news photographers, employed by newspapers, magazines, press services, and television stations all over America. We are a voluntary, nonprofit, professional organization dedicated to the advancement of news photography.

The National Press Photographers Association is most interested in Senate bill 1311 and we hope you will give it your favorable consideration. We believe that in these complicated times it is important that the role of the newsman, be he word man, picture man, editor, or whatever, be clearly recognized. We believe the major reason for our existence is our value in serving every citizen through the dissemination of information. We believe further that the public's right to know is a paramount right.

With your permission we wish to make three suggestions which would give added strength to Senate bill 1311.

1. First, as Mr. Friendly mentioned, we believe the news photographer, both still and motion picture, should be specifically mentioned and included among those occupations listed on lines 1 and 2, and lines 11 through 16 of page 2 of S. 1311.

2. We urge the subcommittee to give favorable consideration to a section that would provide explicitly that unpublished news pictures, unaired newsfilm and unused sound recordings, commonly called outtakes, not be subject to subpena by any investigative or law enforcement authority except as provided in subsection (c) of section 4.

3. If the free press of Amerca is to be permitted to publish and broadcast information to which the public is entitled, without restrictions or interference, then representatives of the news media should be free to gather such information, including pictures, without threat or fear of bodily injury.

On this latter point, as you are aware, law enforcement personnel have been found impersonating news photographers at public gatherings and they have been observed taking pictures of people involved in public disturbances. Obviously, to permit such impersonation does pose a grave threat and fear of bodily harm to legitimate news gatherers. Public protestors, knowing that law enforcement personnel are impersonating news photographers, and not being able to distinguish between the two, we believe, will naturally attack indiscriminately all whom they observe with cameras, in order to prevent having their pictures taken for police purposes. If they know the law forbids impersonation of news gatherers by anyone, they will be less inclined to personally attack and inflict bodily harm on those whom they know to be gathering the news legitimately.

We sincerely hope the subcommittee will add these important points to S. 1311.

Further, we give our strongest support to the provision in S. 1311 regarding nondisclosure of sources. It is generally agreed that a strong and free press is the keystone of our democracy; that the public's right to information is fundamental to the freedom of all Americans. However, it is ironic that newsmen have at times risked imprisonment in order to protect the sources of information vital to the very welfare of the communities and citizenry they serve.

We believe the relationship between a newsman and his source must be one of sanctity and must be treated in the same regard as the relationship between a doctor and patient, attorney and client, or clergy man and parishioner.

We feel this legislation, and our proposed additions to it, will insure that paramount right of the American citizen to an uninterrupted flow of news. A well informed citizenry is vital to our democratic system. We believe any watering down of the protection provided by the first amendment, no matter how well meaning, can only weaken that system.

The news media cannot be an effective watchdog over public affairs for the American people if it must disclose all information gathered in confidence and the sources thereof.

The legislation you are considering today will further solidify the well established protection of the first amendment to the Constitution. It will do this by making it explicitly clear that the right to disseminate the news will be meaningless if the right to gather the news is not protected. And it will make it explicitly clear that the public's right to know is a constitutional right which is not to be tampered with.

In summation, we believe news photographers must be granted the same protections as other members of the working news media as enumerated in S. 1311—that all working journalists must be permitted to maintain confidential sources—that unused photographs, newsfilm and sound recordings, must not be the subject of subpoena by anyone—and that the impersonation of news gatherers must be forbidden.

Certainly nothing less than unqualified, absolute protection of the newsman's privilege to gather and disseminate the news without fear or favor is sufficient to preserve the free flow of information the public is entitled to under the first amendment.

That, gentlemen, is what we believe it's all about.

Senator Ervin. There is a Chinese proverb to the effect that one picture is worth a thousand words. And I think that is undoubtedly true. Perhaps that is the reason that law enforcement officials adopt the guise of news photographers when they conduct surveillances of a rally or gathering or demonstration. That also explains why those who are being photographed, fearing that their photographs would be used in the future by the Government to injure them, are so often tempted to assault anybody who appears in the guise of a news photographer. This subcommittee heard evidence, in investigating the surveillance of civilians by the Army, that one of the favorite disguises adopted by military intelligence agents in observing persons who were making various protests about Government policies was to appear to be newspaper photographers or photographers for a news media. Now, I believe that the great majority of people who have studied the First Amendment do not agree with the late Justice Black that First Amendment freedoms are absolute. They believe that in compelling circumstances the Government can place limits upon most First Amendment freedoms except the freedom of thought. However in determining what is an overriding public interest there is sometimes a conflict between public interests. I think this conflict appears in the field of news gathering.

The public has a great interest in knowing the truth, and I know of no way for the truth to be more accurately presented than by pictures. Words can be slanted, and while pictures can also be slanted, it is rather difficult.

At the same time the Government and the public have an interest in knowing the truth where the truth is necessary to enforce the law. I can conceive of circumstances where a news photographer might actually take the picture of a man committing a murder.

Mr. HAMER. Yes, sir, indeed.

Senator ERVIN. And even though the photographer never prints that picture I can conceive that the offer of that picture in evidence might be essential to bring the murderer to justice. And it might be the only way that the murderer could be identified.

I have got an open mind on this subject, because I see much to be said on both of these conflicting public interests—the search for truth, but for two different purposes. I wonder whether we should have a rigid statute creating a privilege similar to that of a lawyer and client relation and that of a physician and patient relation, or whether we had better leave it to the courts to work out the first amendment so as to decide in a specific case which one of these interests ought to prevail over the other.

The need for a statute such as you recommend would be either greatly increased or greatly diminished by the future decision of the Supreme Court in Caldwell and two other cases that are being considered by the Court in its present session. I think the court of appeals in the Caldwell case worked out a very good adjustment for that particular factual situation. They held that Caldwell, a reporter from the New York Times, could not be compelled to go before a grand jury because it did not appear that there was any overriding public necessity for the grand jury to obtain his testimony, and there was no evidence that they could not obtain what they were seeking from other sources.

But the subcommittee—and I think the Congress as well—certainly should give serious consideration to the proposal made by Senator Pearson and his cosponsors, and also to your proposal that this privilege be extended to news photographers in addition to those who gather the news by other means.

Mr. Hamer. Yes, sir.

If I may be permitted to make a point on the lawman and his photography, certainly we are in a complete agreement that there must be peace in the community, that law enforcement is a very necessary thing to any community. And certainly we recognize the value of photographs taken by law enforcement personnel to identify people in public disturbances, for example, for future prosecution. But we do not believe that newsmen, news photographers, should be cast in this role of gathering this particular information.

Similarly, we have no objection to law enforcement personnel working in these situations taking photographs as long as they are not identified as newsmen. We believe that news photography puts the newsman in the middle, so to speak. He is the representative of the public at a given scene. And his first responsibility is to that public through the photographs that he takes. Certainly any published or broadcast photographs which are in the public domain, as it were, are available under all circumstances for law enforcement purposes, and we have no objection to that.

Senator Ervin. When I practiced law I found a value for photographs in evidence. I won one case because my client, who had got in an automobile accident, was an amateur photographer, and he always carried a camera along with him. He was involved in a head-on collision with another car and immediately photographed both cars after the impact. The photograph showed that both of the cars were over on the extreme side of the road. When the other man brought a suit claiming he was entirely on the opposite side of the road, the photograph proved the truth of the situation and won the case. I certainly am a great believer in the validity of the Chinese proverb which I quoted.

Mr. Hamer. So are we, sir.

Senator Ervin. Senator Thurmond.

Senator Thurmond. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I have no questions. We are glad to have you with us, Mr. Hamer.

Mr. Hamer. Thank you, Senator.

Senator Ervin. Thank you very much. Your testimony has been very helpful.

The subcommittee will stand in recess until 10 o'clock tomorrow.

(Whereupon, at 12 noon, the subcommittee was adjourned until Wednesday, October 13, 1971, at 10 a.m.)

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1971

U. S. SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS OF THE
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to recess, at 10:10 a.m. in room 1202, New Senate Office Building, Senator Sam J. Ervin, Jr. (chairman of the subcommittee) presiding.

Present: Senator Ervin, Hruska, and Thurmond.

Also present: Lawrence M. Baskir, chief counsel; and Bill Pursley, counsel.

Senator ERVIN. The subcommittee will come to order.

Today the subcommittee will hear testimony from authorities in constitutional law and constitutional history and from an editor and a president of two Midwestern newspapers. The appearance of these witnesses emphasizes the subcommittee's interest both in reexamining first amendment principles and in considering the practical problems associated with freedom of the press in America.

In my judgment, there can be no more important endeavor than a study of the original understanding of the First Amendment's guarantee of freedom of the press. While there have been vast and unexpected developments in every area of American life, including communications, since 1791, the principles of free thought, free speech, and free press remain the foundation of our democratic system. A renewed commitment to these principles is the surest way to secure their continued vitality.

If these hearings do no more than encourage Americans to reconsider these First Amendment principles and their relationship to a free society, they will have served a noble purpose.

Senator Hruska, do you have any statement?

Senator HRUSKA. I have no statement, Mr. Chairman, but I have a unanimous consent request. I received in the mail jointly with my colleague, Senator Curtis, a letter and a resolution from the Nebraska Broadcasters Association. The resolution bears on the general subject about which we are making inquiry. I ask that it be inserted in the record at an appropriate point.

Senator ERVIN. That will be done.

(The letter and resolution referred to follow.)

NEBRASKA BROADCASTERS ASSOCIATION
Omaha, Nebr., October 8, 1971.

Hon. ROMAN L. HRUSKA,
U.S. Senate, Old Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR ROMAN: I am enclosing for your information, files and such action as you deem appropriate the resolution passed by the Nebraska Broadcasters Association at its convention in Lincoln September 28th. As you will note, it proposes amendment of the Communications Act of 1934 for the purpose of maintaining our free system of broadcasting.

It has been suggested that it would be appropriate for us to have this entered in the record of the Constitutional Rights Subcommittee currently holding hearings under the chairmanship of Senator Ervin. Obviously too it should go to Senators Magnuson and Pastore under the proper auspices. There may be others in the Senate who should receive it.

As you will note, I am writing an identical letter to Senator Curtis with the same enclosures, thinking that your respective staffs might coordinate these approches for us. The resolution will have a great deal more impact if you will steer it through proper channels.

Sincerely,

FRANK P. FOGARTY, Executive Secretary.

NEBRASKA BROADCASTERS ASSOCIATION RESOLUTION

Considering:

(1) That, Amendment I of the Constitution of the United States states in part . . . "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press. . . ."

And, that the Communications Act of 1934 states . . .

> "Section 326: Nothing in this Act shall be understood or construed to give the Commission the power of censorship over the radio communications or signals transmitted by any radio station, and no regulation or condition shall be, promulgated or fixed by the Commission which shall interfere with the right of free speech by means of radio communication". . . .

(2) That, the recent court interpretations of the Constitution and Communications Act have actually negated the intent so clearly expressed in these documents,

(3) That, Fairness Doctrine interpretations by the FCC, the FTC, and the courts, have attacked the very foundation of freedom of speech and free enterprise,

(4) That, the proposed license renewal processes by the weight of their implication will limit the freedom of the broadcaster to operate in the public interest, and give to the few control over broadcasting facilities out of all proportion to their importance to the democratic principles of the American way of life,

(5) That, the political strength of America throughout its history has been the result of a privately owned free press and that the economic strength of America was developed through advertising in mass media.

(6) That, the United States does not have a national system of broadcasting such as most of the countries of the world—it is essentially a local system . . . locally owned, locally managed, and locally financed, supplying local news, local weather reports, illuminating local problems, supporting local projects, providing contact between elected officials and the electorate, and providing a medium for local advertisers,

The Nebraska Broadcasters Association, meeting in Convention, September 28, 1971, earnestly recommends: That the Congress of the United States immediately amend Section 326 of the Communications Act of 1934 in such manner that there will be no question of the maintenance of a free and independent broadcasting system in these United States. Free from coercive control by government agencies and commissions; free from misinterpretation by the courts; free from harrassment by small pressure groups.

Senator ERVIN. Counsel will call the first witness.

Mr. BASKIR. Mr. Chairman, our first witness this morning is Professor Leonard W. Levy, who is William W. Clary Professor of History and chairman of the Graduate Faculty in History at Claremont Graduate School.

He held the Earl Warren chair in constitutional history at Brandeis University from 1957 to 1970.

He is the winner of the Pulitzer Prize in history in 1969, and the author of a number of books on constitutional history.

Senator ERVIN. We are delighted to welcome you to the Subcommittee and we wish to express our deep appreciation for your willingness to appear and give us the benefit of your views on the first amendment.

STATEMENT OF LEONARD W. LEVY, PROFESSOR OF HISTORY AND CHAIRMAN OF THE GRADUATE FACULTY IN HISTORY, CLAREMONT GRADUATE SCHOOL, CALIFORNIA

Professor LEVY. Like the devil quoting Scriptures, a skilled advocate adept at manipulating evidence can make history prove any proposition; or he may, like the late Mr. Justice Black have such fixed convictions that he will simply ignore distasteful evidence and compellingly insist that the proposition, if appealing to our freedom-loving instincts, must be true. But a scholar who is faithful to his craft takes the past on its own terms. He does not seek to wrest from it proofs in support of his personal preferences concerning public policy or constitutional law; a scholar may not engage in law-office history which is merely a function of one-sided advocacy. He must base his conclusions on the preponderance of unimpeachable evidence, no matter what it shows.

Senator ERVIN. If I may interrupt at this point, I would like to note that you are the author of the book, Freedom of Speech and Press in Early American History, Legacy of Suppression, which I have read with much interest, and have found one of the most intriguing and illuminating books on the subject that has ever been written.

Professor LEVY. Thank you very much, sir.

My studies of the original meaning of the free-press clause of the first amendment prove, to my regret, that the clause, at the time of its adoption, was not intended to supersede the common law. The clause did not repudiate the Blackstonian concept that freedom of the press meant merely freedom from prior restraint; it did not mean no subsequent punishment for the publication of anything deemed illegal. The clause at the time of its adoption was not intended to scrap the Government's principal weapon for muzzling the press and political dissent, namely the doctrine of seditious libel, that the Government could be criminally assaulted simply by harshly critical words that tended to lower it in the public's esteem. Just three and a half months ago, Justices Douglas and Black, concurring in the so-called Pentagon Papers case (New York Times v. United States), declared, as they often had in the past, and as had Justices Holmes and Brandeis before them, "that the first amendment was adopted against the widespread use of the common law of seditious libel to punish the dissemination of material . . . embarrassing to the powers that be." That proposition, however much we should like it to be true, is demonstrably false. I've presented a summation of that proof in my formal written statement for the record. In effect I have shown that the original intentions of the framers of the free press clause were not nearly as libertarian as we have assumed and that their insights on the subject of freedom of political expression were not the most edifying.

I'm not disturbed by this fact, however much I might miss the comforting assurance that the past's original intentions coincide with my personal preferences. We don't want the Constitution to be frozen in its meaning by some narrow and antiquarian historicism. What passed for wisdom in the 18th century may have passed out of date with the growth of freedom in America. The framers of the Constitution and of the Bill of Rights had a genius for imprecision. They were conscious of the need for and value of generalized terms that could grow in meaning as conditions and beliefs changed. They believed that the supreme law was made for the people, not the people for the law. They meant to outline an instrument that would serve future generations. Deliberately they avoided a detailed code that would rapidly become obsolete. Instead they formulated principles, like the principle of a free press, that are expansive and comprehensive in character. The principles and not their framers' immediate understanding and application of them were meant to endure. The First Amendment's injunction that there shall be no law abridging the freedom of speech or press was boldly stated if narrowly understood at the time. But it is the bold statement, not the narrow understanding, that was written into our fundamental law, and there is abundant evidence to show that the framers would have agreed that when construing the Bill of Rights, it is better to err on the side of latitude than on that of restraint. The framers gave constitutional recognition to the principle of freedom of the press in unqualified and undefined terms. That should be enough for us.

That they were narrow Blackstonians on the scope of free political discourse proves only that they were men of their times. They did not even foresee or understand the development of political parties, without which their Constitution could not have survived or even function. They did not understand that there could be a ligitimate, organized, loyal opposition to the administration in power. They associated parties with subversion, treason, civil war, and foreign conspiracies as the history of Tudor and Stuart England, which they knew so well, taught them. They thought that parties were inimical to freedom, and many of them believed that the new Government which they had established was so fragile that it might not survive dissension. The Federal system of Government was novel, the centralization of powers in the National Government was awesome, and there never before in history had been a republic so great in size nor so handicapped by such diversity of governments, local customs, races, languages, religions, national stocks, and economic as well as geographic differences. In the 1790's men divided politically in their allegiance and believed that their opponents were in league with a foreign power to destroy the new Republic. Until the end of the War of 1812, there was a siege mentality in the United States. Conditions were not ripe for the development of both a broad understanding of the scope of free political discourse and for a principled protection of the right of one's political enemies to express themselves freely.

The framers of the First Amendment inherited the belief that freedom of the press mean the right to print whatever one pleased without obtaining in advance the approval of the Government, but they also believed that one was criminally responsible for the abuse of that right. When the First Amendment was adopted in 1791 the avant-garde among American libertarians, men like Jefferson and Madison, could conceive of no greater freedom for the press than the principles advocated in 1735 on behalf of John Peter Zenger. They did not doubt that Government could be criminally assaulted by words alone, and they believed that the uttermost limit of freedom would be secured if a defendant, on being tried for abusing his liberty of the press, could plead truth as a defense to the charge of criminal libel, and if the criminality of his words might be determined by a jury of his peers rather than by a judge. In 1789 Jefferson thought that the publication of false information, especially about foreign policy, should be punished. Madison agreed that exempting the press from criminal liability in every case involving the publication of "true facts" was "an innovation" worthy of consideration.

Apart from the issue of misusing secret Government documents, the most libertarian law in the country that would have governed the case of a Daniel Ellsberg in those days was the 1790 clause on freedom of the press in the Constitution of Pennsylvania:

> That the printing presses shall be free to every person who undertakes to examine the proceedings of the legislature, or any branch of government, and no law shall ever be made to restrain the right thereof. The free communication of thoughts and opinions is one of the invaluable rights of man; and every citizen may freely speak, write, and print on any subject, BEING RESPONSIBLE FOR THE ABUSE OF LIBERTY. In PROSECUTIONS for the publication of papers investigating the official conduct of officers or men in public capacity, or where the matter published is PROPER for public information, the truth thereof may be given in evidence; and all INDICTMENTS for libels the jury shall have a right to determine the law and the facts, under the direction of the court.

That provision, which left the common law of seditious libel intact, was written by James Wilson, next to Madison the most influential member of the Federal Constitutional Convention. At the Pennsylvania State ratifying convention, Wilson declared, without challenge by any of the most ardent advocates of a Bill of Rights, "what is meant by liberty of the press is that there should be no antecedent restraint upon it; but that every author is responsible when he attacks the security or welfare of the Government. . ."

When the free press clause was added to the Constitution as part of the first amendment it was in part a reflection of the States' rights principle. That is, a purpose of the amendment was to reserve to the States an exclusive legislative authority in the field of speech and press. The clause was intended to appease those who feared the powers of the new National Government. The phrase, "freedom of the press," as the evidence uniformly shows, meant merely no prior restraints; it did not mean that seditious libels would be protected from prosecution. But the clause begins, "Congress shall make no law" abridging the freedom of the press, meaning literally that there could be no law regulating the press, whether a licensing law, a tax, or a seditious libel act. The framers intended that the National Government should be totally powerless to enact any legislation respecting the press. Thus no matter what was understood by the phrase, "the freedom of the press," the National Government, even in the absence of the First Amendment, could not make the press a legitimate subject of legislation. The amendment itself was actually superflous; it was an additional guarantee that the National Government would be limited to its delegated and necessary powers. Accordingly the infamous Sedition Act, whose purpose was to create a one-party press and a single party system, was unconstitutional. The same act, ironically, embodied every reform the libertarians had demanded since Zenger's case: A requirement that criminal intent be shown; the power of the jury to decide whether the accused's statement was libelous as a matter of law as well as of fact; and truth as a defense—the latter an innovation not accepted in England until 1843.

The American libertarians immediately recognized in the Sedition Act a Pyrrhic victory. The Sedition Act provoked them to develop a new theory of freedom of the press. In speeches by Congressmen opposing the Sedition Act in arguments by defense counsel in Sedition Act prosecutions, and in tracts and books written by lawyers and political theorists like Madison and St. George Tucker, an elaborate theory was advanced that freedom of the press was unlimited, absolute, and beyond the power of any government, national or State, to impair. The Zenger principles were abandoned. More importantly the straitjacketing ideas of Blackstone and of the common law were abandoned. The new view denounced the no-iron restraints definition as much too narrow. Said Madison, "this idea of the freedom of the press can never be admitted to be the American idea of it," because a law inflicting penalties would have the same effect as a law authorizing a prior restraint. "It would seem a mockery," Madison declared on behalf of the State of Virginia, "to say that no laws shall be passed preventing publications from being made, but that laws might be passed for punishing them in case they should be made."

The reasoning was that the press could not be free if a man could be jailed for what he published, provided merely that the Government took no notice of him until after he published it.

The new libertarianism discarded previous distinctions between "liberty" and "licentiousness," between "truth" and "falsehoods," and between "good motives" and "criminal intent." Those distinctions were discarded because they did not provide meaningful standards that might guide a court or jury in judging an alleged verbal crime. Even the old faith in juries was abandoned on ground that a jury cannot be trusted to give an impartial verdict in a political trial. The renunciation of traditional concepts reached a climax in an assault on the very idea that there could be such a crime as seditious libel.

In brief, the new libertarian theory of the press advocated that only "injurious conduct" as manifested by "overt acts" rather than mere words, might be criminally prosecuted. Advocates of this view did reorganize that the law of civil libel should continue to protect private reputations against malicious falsehoods. They were so absolutist in their argument, however, that they did not even recognize that under certain circumstances words may immediately and directly incite criminal acts.

This absolutist interpretation of freedom of the press was based on the now familiar but then novel and democratic theory that free Government depends for its existence and security on unrestrained freedom of political discussion. According to this theory the scope of permissable freedom depends on the nature of Government and its relationship to the people. Since Government in America is the people's servant, exists by their consent and for their benefit, and is constitutionally limited, responsible, and elective, it cannot tell the people what they cannot say except at their peril. The concept of seditiousness was explained as deriving from a relationship based on inferiority, when people were subjects rather than sovereigns and their criticism implied contempt of their master. "In the United States," Madison declared, "the case is altogether different." Because Government in America depended upon popular elections and its policies on public opinion, the new libertarians agreed that the widest possible latitutde must be maintained, whatever the risks, in order to keep the electorate free, informed, and capable of making intelligent choices. The citizen's freedom of political expression had the same unlimited scope as his representative's who has immunity for what he says. Absolute freedom might be dangerously abused, but the people would decide men and measures wisely if exposed to every opinion.

I have given you a very brief epitome of the new theory of freedom of the press which emerged between 1798 and 1800. That theory developed as an expediency of self defense on the part of a besieged political minority, the Jeffersonians, struggling to maintain their existence and freedom to function unfettered. They proposed a theory justifying the fullest rights of individual expression, of the press, and of opposition parties. That the Jeffersonians in power were not much more tolerant than the Federalists does not diminish the enduring nobility and rightness of their new libertarian theory. They set the highest standards of freedom for themselves and posterity to be measured against.

They did not win in the legal arena. The legal standard that first emerged in the Zenger case, then in the Sedition Act, and finally in the Croswell case of 1804, is the one that prevailed: freedom of the press is circumscribed by the sanctions of the criminal law as long as a jury decides the criminality of an alleged libel and truth is allowed as a defense if published with good motives.

If then the question is asked, what did the free press clause mean to the generation that framed and ratified it, rather than what did it mean in 1789 when framed or in 1791 when ratified, the answer is first, that there was universal agreement that Government may impose no prior restraints or censorship; second, that there was universal agreement that the National Government is wholly without power to legislate on the subject of the press, except perhaps to protect it as by enacting copyright laws; third, that the Jeffersonians expanded the scope and meaning of freedom of the press to the point of absolute freedom; and finally, that Zengerian principles, regarded by Jefferson and Madison as novel even as late as 1789, became the yardstick to measure freedom of the press within a decade or so of the adoption of the first amendment.

Senator ERVIN. Is it not true that the Government in England in ancient time was afraid of ideas, and undertook measures it deemed necessary to suppress any ideas it considered either dangerous or obnoxious to the Government?

Professor LEVY. That is correct, Senator. As early as the 13th century Parliament was legislating against "dangerous" opinions that might subvert the realm. Initially only "false" opinions were punishable but by the 17th century even true facts whose revelation to the people might damage the Government were outlawed. Almost the first that we hear about the Court of Star Chamber is in connection with the repression of ideas that were feared. Nothing could be published in England, before 1695, without its first being submitted to a Government censor for approval or censorship. Without official imprimature nothing could be lawfully exposed to the public. The motive for such policies was the one you mentioned, fear on the Government's part that the people might be critical of it. Similarly the common law courts, agencies of the Government, developed the law of criminal libel, expecially of seditious and blasphemous libel, to curb the expression of views unfriendly to church or state. Moreover the offense of breach of parliamentary privilege was available in the event that some person might say something which any Member of Parliament might take offense to, anything that was critical that could be regarded as offensive was published as a breach of parliamentary privilege. The individual could be recalled before the House, be required to humble himself, to apologize, and usually thrown in jail for the duration of that session of Parliament. And this became a device which was used by Parliament to intimidate printers after several men in a given session of Parliament were thrown in jail the rest would straighten up and do nothing but what they were told.

The executive department, the Crown's Ministry, did the same kind of thing by using the censorship technique that I mentioned earlier and by prosecuting people for the crime of seditious libel. In terms of substance there was no substantial difference in what was said that could be published as breach of parliamentary privilege or what was said that could be published as seditious libel against common law.

Senator ERVIN. They say an honest confession is good for the soul. I am compelled to confess that much of what I know in this area was learned from reading what you have written.

Professor LEVY. Thank you, sir. But there is also a great book which preceded mine by Zechariah Chafee, Free Speech in the United States, which is quite superb—it is wrong on a number of points, as I suggested but it is still very valuable. And the principles which it espouses are those which I deeply believe.

May I add also with respect to the question you asked me a moment ago that while censorship in the form of prior restraints or licensing, developed as quickly as possible after the introduction of the printing presses—indeed even before that there was something called seditious slander, and there were false rumors against the Crown, which could be regarded as treason—while the censorship system, as I say, developed shortly after the development of the printing presses, in the beginning of the 17th century there was the introduction of another legal doctrine which also had a very supressive effect, namely, the doctrine that the more true a libel was the greater the offence it was to the Government. There is an irony here. But the theory was that if an officer of the Government, whether in Parliament or a member of the Crown's Ministry, did indeed take that bribe or was corrupt in some way and sold out, this was a greater scandal than could be imagined had the allegations been false. If it were true, it would alter the people's esteem for their Government, its reputation would be scandalized, and so it would loose credit. Therefore the greater the truth the greater the libel.

It was because of the existence of that doctrine—which, incidentally emerged in the Star Chamber originally around 1606—it was because of the existence of that doctrine that the principle that truth should be a defense was regarded initially by the protection of freedom of the press. It was only after the experience with Fox's Libel Act in England in 1792, and experience with our own Sedition Act in 1798, that the champions of liberty realized that truth as a defense actually provided a very small measure of freedom, because principles can't be proved to be true or false.

And they also realized that allowing a jury to decide the matter rather than merely a judge was no protection either. In the beginning all the jury had to decide was whether the individual did as a matter of fact publish that particular tract, pamphlet, or book, or whether he did in fact make that oral statement. The judge then reserved for himself the decision whether that statement was therefore a libel as a matter of law. Well, what happened was that with Fox's Libel Act, which allowed juries to decide such matters, and with our own Sedition Act, which allowed the jury to decide, and which permitted truth as a defense, it was then discovered in dozens of prosecutions that juries were quite influenced by whatever the popular hysteria might be that raged at a given moment. And it was feared in the United States in the late 1790's that the Jeffersonians were Jacobins, that they were in league with the minions of Napoleon or Robespierre, and that the French armies were about to descend on us, and that the Jeffersonians would cut our throats and rape our women and so on. In this kind of hysteria it was inevitable that a jury become merely a reflection of public opinion, nothing more in effect than a reflection of public hysteria. Juries could not be trusted. Any opinion against the Government was regarded as a false and malicious opinion. The truth as a defense came to mean absolutely nothing. And the power of a jury came to mean nothing as a means of protecting the scope of freedom.

That is why this new libertarian theory emerged as I pointed out.

Senator ERVIN. Well, I think what you said about Zechariah Chafee shows the truth of Ulysses's statement, "I am a part of all that I have met." I think I absorbed some of my views from this statement from Zechariah Chafee, having had the privilege of sitting at his feet at Harvard Law School many years ago.

Professor Levy. I envy you, sir.

Senator Ervin. The theory which undertook to justify licensing and also seditious libel, was that it was essential for Government to enjoy a good reputation among the people, and that any person who said or wrote, or printed anything which tended to cause the people to have less than a good opinion of the Government, or a bad opinion of the Government, had criminally assaulted the Government by his words.

Professor Levy. Yes.

Senator Ervin. Now, as I infer from your book, a fight for some degree of freedom of speech was waged by Parliament, not in behalf of the people, but in behalf of the Parliament itself, so that it could assert itself against the Crown.

Professor Levy. Yes, that is quite true.

The same thing happened here in the colonies when members of the so-called "popular" party, who were against the royal Governor and the Crown's representative, would critize the Crown or the acts of the Governor, and the legislature in a case like that-the local colonial assembly would defend the rights of that individual. When, however, he turned against the assembly himself, God help him. Then he was subject to the crime of breach of Parliamentary privilege. But it is true that the assemblies on the one hand were themselves suppressive agents, but on the other hand, in the struggle against royal authority, and on behalf of augmenting the power of the assemblies against the Crown, the assemblies were also very effective instruments for advancing the cause of freedom of the press. It worked both ways. It depended in effect, I regret to say, on the principle of whose ox is a gored, theirs or ours.

Senator Ervin. Isn't it correct to say that this struggle between Parliament and the Crown for freedom of speech by members of the Parliament is the historical origin of the speech or debate clause of our Constitution which gives Senators and Representatives immunity from answering for what they say in their official capacity.

Professor Levy. Yes, that is absolutely correct. I couldn't improve on the excellence with which you make the point.

Senator Ervin. After prior restraint and licensing was abolished or ceased to exist, about 1694, the Government prosecuted what was considered to be utterances obnoxious to it by frequently resorting to seditious libel.

Professor Levy. Yes.

Senator Ervin. And as you have pointed out so well in your statement, seditious libel, in substance, was a crime committed whenever a person said anything critical of government, those who administered Government, or the procedures and practices which Government followed.

Professor Levy. Yes, anyone who critized the Government, the form of Government, the officers of the Government, the policies of the Government, the procedures of the Government, its symbols—like the flag, the coat of arms—any hostile critical, or reproachful utterances, or publications of such character, was regarded as a crime, denominated seditious libel. Technically one was supposed to have made the utterances with what was called malice. But, of course, they also presumed the existence of malice from the fact of the criticism itself. One was supposed to have made the utterances with bad motives or criminal intent. But, again, that is presumed. In effect, to the powers that be, as Justice Black and Douglas put it, any statement which was critical of the Government or offensive to those in power was regarded as a crime, seditious libel, yes. I am not sure that the situation has too drastically changed today either.

Senator Ervin. Well, Government still does not like for anybody to say or print anything which tends to show that Government is not all wise. This is true regardless of which political party happens to be in control of the Government.

Professor Levy. I am afraid that is true. We don't any longer have very many sedition Act trials, thank goodness, not since the enforcement of the Smith Act, which died shortly after the Yates decision in 1957. But the Government has other weapons at its command nowadays to exercise an intimidating effect upon the press without resorting to the old common law of seditious libel or statutes which have been readopted.

Senator Ervin. Again you point out so well in your book, as bad as the law about seditious libel was, it might be said that the procedural law was even worse, in that it permitted prosecutions upon information rather than indictments. And, the truth was not a defense. Furthermore, the only function of the jury was to find the bare fact of publication. The question of whether it constituted a seditious libel was a question of law for the judge who was usually beholden for his office and his compensation to the Government.

Professor Levy. Yes, that is accurate, sir. Technically seditious libel in English common law was regarded as a misdeameanor and therefore it could be prosecuted merely on information, that is to say, without indictment by a grand jury, so that appointed officers of the Crown could go before the appropriate judicial magistrate—who was appointed by the Crown, and they both had the same interests in the outcome of the case—and secure the accusation, and pack the jury to try the individual. The jury had only one function, as you pointed out, to decide whether in fact that individual made that particular utterance. And he usually did of course. And the court usually reserved to itself whether as a matter of law that utterance constituted a crime. Consequently individuals quite literally by the hundreds were convicted of this crime of seditious libel.

Senator Ervin. And, as you pointed out in your statement this morning and also in your book, the libertarians of that day were fighting to rid themselves of the threat to freedom posed by prior restraints and for the purpose of having truth made a defense, instead of an aggravation of seditious libel.

Professor Levy. That was their principal objective until 1798, because there, as I pointed out, it is the greatest irony that this suppressive Sedition Act embodied the very libertarian principles which the reformers had been advocating since the Zenger case. We look upon the Sedition Act as suppressive, and indeed it was, in its enforcement. It was an effort to create a one party press in this country. And it was a device deliberately calculated by the Federalist Party to control public opinion in such a way as to win the election of 1800, and hopefully, to establish a one-party system. But the fact is that the need to prove criminal intent was required by the statute, and the right to truth as a defense was established by the statute. And the jury was given the power to decide the whole of the matter, the law as well as the fact. They could return, that is, a general verdict, to put it more accurately. And this was the very thing that libertarians in America and in England had been struggling for ever since the Zenger case.

You must remember about the Zenger case that it was not a decision by an appellate court, that it was merely an argument by Andrew Hamilton and James Alexander, counsels, on behalf of Zenger, before a jury. And the jury was swayed by the forensics of these great lawyers to return a verdict of not guilty. But there were no principles of law established. And after the Zenger case there was a great deal of suppression even in New York where the principles advocated by the counsel first emerged.

So it is a very striking and indeed quite a libertarian achievement that the Sedition Act incorporates the principles of the Zenger case.

Senator ERVIN. Would it be consistent with ultimate truth to say that the verdict of the jury in the Zenger case showed that the jurors were wiser in the long run than the law which they were supposed to be enforcing?

Professor LEVY. I agree with the statement, sir. But I think it is a statement which reflects our own personal biases. Yet I myself have taken a position in my own presentation that the Jeffersonian position was the one that was right, that it was the morally superior one, and that it was the wiser position. It makes for the best public policy particularly in a political democracy. Yes, I agree with that.

Senator ERVIN. The law enforcement officials of that day undoubtedly thought that the verdict in the Zenger case was rendered by a rather obnoxious and rebellious jury did they not?

Professor LEVY. Yes; they did. But there is another aspect of the Zenger case which we have to remember. John Peter Zenger's newspaper was established by the Anti-Administration Party. Governor Cosby, who represented the Crown, was extremely unpopular. And people like James Alexander, Morgan Lewis and William Livingston—there was a whole group at that time who were opposed to the royal government—had the support of the legislature. So that there was nothing in Zenger's statements which were offensive to the legislature. Zenger didn't even write the piece, he merely published it; the author is James Alexander, one of his lawyers. Zenger's newspaper merely expressed the views of the popular party, which was the party in power in the legislature against the royal government. The judge was a representative of the royal government. We are sympathetic because of the provincial legislature, which was seeking to become in effect a little, miniature parliament, seeking to control its own speaker, its own membership, and get control of the appropriations, and so on, which is the very thing that the royal government was opposed to at that time.

So that the jury then, to conclude the point, was taking a position which we may regard in the long run as substantially wiser than the position of the royal government, but it was also a position which was widespread in colonial New York, and was reflected by the popular party which controlled the legislature.

Senator Ervin. Now we think today of Blackstone's statement in his Commentaries on the law of England about freedom of the press as being alien to our ideas.

Professor Levy. Alien to our ideas?

Senator Ervin. Alien to the ideas of those who value the freedom of the press entertained now, present-day ideas.

Professor Levy. There is one very important dimension to Blackstone's position which I think all of us would and should support; namely, that freedom of the press does consist in the principle that there shall be no prior restraints, no antecedent restraints upon publications. This is something which we should not abandon.

Senator Ervin. I certainly agree with you.

Professor Levy. The only trouble with Blackstone is that he didn't go far enough. What he said was good up to the point that he went. Where he went wrong was in saving that freedom of the press consists merely in no prior censorship, and that one is criminally responsible for anything he may say that abuses his liberty. Anything that the government didn't like was regarded as licentious rather than an exercise of liberty.

Senator Ervin. Certainly, if there is censorship and prior restraint there is no freedom of the press.

Professor Levy. Absolutely correct.

Senator Ervin. And does not subsequent punishment, such as was inflicted for seditious libel, also have a most powerful restraining influence on the willingness of the people to exercise freedom of the press?

Professor Levy. It makes all the difference in the world.

Senator Ervin. Therefore, to have a free press you have to have freedom from prior restraint as well as freedom from subsequent punishment?

Professor Levy. Yes.

Senator Ervin. And we have advanced to the point, I think, in our decisions that in certain cases, there can be legally imposed limits upon freedom of the press, but those cases must be very drastic in nature.

Professor Levy. Reckless and wanton disregard of truth, and so on.

Senator Ervin. And as far as government is concerned, I believe that the Court's decision, particularly in the Yates case, laid down the principle that an individual or a group can actually advocate the overthrow of government by unlawful means as long as they do not advocate action to bring that result about.

Professor Levy. Yes, sir; that is correct. That is a decision of the Court in effect saying that as long as the advocacy remains within the realm of abstract doctrine it is protected by the first amendment. Fortunately Professor Emerson is present this morning, and both he and my daughter, Wendy, who is now studying constitutional law, are far greater experts on the Yates case than I am. But to the extent I do know about it, what you said is accurate.

Senator Ervin. Is it a fair summation to say that your research shows clearly that freedom is won just a little bit at a time.

Professor LEVY. That freedom is won just a little bit at a time?

Senator ERVIN. By the people just a little bit at a time.

Professor LEVY. Yes; it is won just a little bit at a time. But the converse is also true, that we can begin to lose it a little bit at a time.

It can erode away in a kind of stealthy manner, so that we may not be conscious of the fact that it is disappearing, and that important principles are being violated. We look upon these as minor encrouchments, and think they might perhaps be justified by the hydraulic pressures of the passing moment. But there is simply too much at stake.

I would like to stress that aspect of it as well as the more positive aspects that you have mentioned. Freedom has not only been won, historically speaking, a little at a time, but it can also be lost a little at a time, and in a very serious manner.

Senator ERVIN. Would it be fair to say that freedom is hard to win, or to preserve, but mighty easy to lose?

Professor LEVY. Yes, that is correct.

Senator ERVIN. And sometimes it is lost as a result of the activities of very sincere persons who think, for example, that the exercise of freedom of speech by those who disagree with them is inimicable to the best interests of society?

Professor LEVY. Yes, sir. Justice Brandeis once made that point when he said that we perhaps have the most to fear—he didn't put it this way, but his point was that—we have the most to fear, perhaps, not from the extremists on either side, but rather than zealots, well meaning men, the best intentioned of men, who have the security of the Nation at heart, but who have very little understanding of the constitutional principles which really underlay the security of the country.

Senator ERVIN. And doesn't history show that freedoms such as freedom of speech and of the press are most imperiled in times of national stress?

Professor LEVY. Yes, sir, that is correct.

Senator ERVIN. Now, would it be fair to say that your study of the history of the First Amendment, and of the subsequent rulings on the First Amendment, shows that the framers built better than they knew, in that they used words which were susceptible of interpretations that preceded their immediate objective.

Professor LEVY. That is correct, sir. And as I think I say in the conclusion of my book Legacy of Suppression, the fact that they were like Blackstonians does not prevent us from being Brandeisians, because of the fact that they did bequeath to us that very bold statement in the most unqualified terms on behalf of the principle of freedom of the press. And it is a fact that because they were men who were trained in the common law, they repudiated the idea of very precise codes. They did believe in expansive comprehensive principles.

I conclude, then, by stressing once again that what counts is their bold statement of the principle which they bequeathed to us rather than their immediately narrow understanding of that principle. The Constitution, particularly in the First Amendment, must change and grow as American freedom hopefully broadens, and in fact it has grown very much. And the framers would have approved—they did believe that if you are going to make a mistake, make it on the side of liberty rather than against liberty. But I don't think they would have taken the position that an expansion of liberty was a mistake.

Senator ERVIN. In other words, the language they used is susceptible to application to present concepts which are far broader than the concept they had in mind at the time?

Professor LEVY. That is a good succinct way of summarizing what it took me quite awhile to say, yes.

Senator ERVIN. Counsel.

Mr. BASKIR. Professor, would it also be fair to say, looking back at this history, that generally freedom of speech and the press has been won by minorities who at the time were probably expressing ideas obnoxious to those who held governmental power, and perhaps very often the ideas were considered to be obnoxious by the great mass of the people.

Professor LEVY. I would say that that is about 99 percent correct. The reason I reserve the one percent is that I have in mind the fact, as I mentioned in the illustration I gave of the Zenger case, that there are occasions when the different branches of Government may sharply differ, so that an important principle may emerge when one branch, the legislature, may be opposing the executive, in which case the opinion which is being proposed and which is regarded as a new breakthrough is a popular opinion, it is not necessarily always the opinion or position of an unpopular minority. It almost invariably is, but there are these rare exceptions in our history.

Mr. BASKIR. The reason I ask that is because we are going to have something near a litmus test of the state of freedom of the press, which will provide an opportunity to see how those who are in the minority and expressing views obnoxious to us are being treated, rather than those expressing views of the great middle ground. That perhaps is the measurement.

Professor LEVY. It has to be the measurement. There is no use whatever in protecting the freedom of speech and the press of the great majority of the people. That would be as effective—they don't need it, they constitute the majority—that is as effective as saying that a man can say whatever he pleases so long as he goes out to some empty beaches or stands on top of some empty mountain and shouts to the sky. The real guts and meaning of freedom of speech and the press comes into play when somebody whom the majority regard as obnoxious, detestible and hateful, exercised that right before an audience which finds his views repugnant. Unless his right is protected, our right is threatened. The majority stand to lose if we don't protect the rights of those people whom we hate. Holmes had a phrase for the very thing we are talking about: We must protect "freedom for the thought that we hate" in order to protect our own freedom.

I think Adlai Stevenson once said that the price of listening to the sweet reason and music of our own voices is to listen to the dreary, dull opinions of those whom we despise.

Senator ERVIN. I believe Justice Brandeis said in a concurring opinion in the case in California——

Professor LEVY. Whitney v. California?

Senator ERVIN. Whitney v. California. Thank you. The name escaped me—that free men protect society by punishing people for crimes they commit rather than abridging the freedom of speech and freedom of the press. Don't you think that is the only sound course that the United States can afford to pursue?

Professor LEVY. Yes, sir, it has to be. What we have to realize is that however much we may deplore and even despise some of these outrageous opinions that are advanced by radicals, kooks, extremists, call them what you want, the hard fact remains that throughout the course of history opinions advanced by people so regarded in their time have often become the dominant majority view.

In the opinion to which you referred by Justice Brandeis he pointed out that there was a time when men believed that the earth was flat, and to say that it was round was an absolutely outrageous notion. Men once believed that there were witches, and to say otherwise was regarded as heresy. Indeed in England, where the church was established, and therefore the head of the church was the head of the state, an utterance that there were no such things as witches would also be regarded as seditious, an offense against the Government.

The point is that there were all kinds of seemingly absurd and fanciful and outrageous or extreme opinions which have been advanced throughout the course of history which with the passage of time became truth, became validated as literally true, or true in the pragmatic sense, that is they became accepted by the consensus, by a majority opinion.

And that is why we have to protect the rights of the unpopular minorities. It might very well be that they are saying something that we ought to listen to, some part of what they say could very well be true and helpful. And we have to expose the majority to all these conflicting and diverse viewpoints so that they can then make an intelligent choice. And we have to keep open the channels for the free flow of information so that these diverse viewpoints can circulate amongst the people. If we censor or suppress in any form any given opinion, however hateful, we cut ourselves off from the possibility that the view there being advocated may have something in it that is worthwhile that we ought to consider, and which may one day become truth. If we cut ourselves off from any opinion, the choice which we make with respect to this rather than that course of public policy may be poorly founded. We may not be making the wisest decisions.

An example would be—there are so many—but in our own time, to go back to 1964 or 1965, I myself then was somewhat hawkish in my position and regarded peaceniks as expressing the most outrageous views. It turned out that they, I think, were right, and I was wrong. And thank God that they had their opportunity to express themselves and persuade the rest of us—I hope they have persuaded the rest of us.

Senator ERVIN. When a nation grants freedom of speech and freedom of the press to all men, regardless of whether the views they express are pleasing to government or pleasing to a majority of the citizens, it enables itself ultimately to correct policies which may be detrimental to the best interests of the country, and in that way makes a violent revolution unnecessary.

Professor LEVY. Of course. One of the important arguments on behalf of unlimited political discourse is that the right of anyone to express his opinion constitutes a safety valve. If a minority feels that it is beleaguered, that it is suppressed, it will go underground, it will secretly organize. It may be forced to resort to illegal means in order to achieve its end. As long as the channels of communications are open and available and free to everybody, then the protest can be peaceable, it can be conducted within the system. And the rest of us also then have the advantage of listening and weighing and judging accordingly.

But your point is right, freedom of speech or freedom of the press are safety valves which maintain peaceable methods of change within the system.

Senator ERVIN. To paraphrase Thomas Jefferson, our Nation has nothing to fear in the long run from freedom of speech as long as it leaves truth free to combat error.

Professor LEVY. Yes, sir, that is right.

Senator ERVIN. Isn't that really the foundation stone upon which freedom of speech and freedom of the press rests?

Professor LEVY. The only reason I am hesitating, sir, despite the fact that I completely agree with what you said, is that you said the foundation, and I would say that there are several foundations, of which that is one. That is a very vital principle, yes.

Senator ERVIN. Thank you very much for a most illuminating and intriguing statement.

Professor LEVY. Thank you, sir.

STATEMENT OF PROF. LEONARD W. LEVY, PROFESSOR OF HISTORY AND CHAIRMAN OF THE GRADUATE FACULTY IN HISTORY, CLAREMONT GRADUATE SCHOOL, CALIFORNIA

THE FIRST AMENDMENT'S FREE PRESS CLAUSE: THE ORIGINAL UNDERSTANDING

I

Freedom of the press, in the words of the Continental Congress of 1774, is essential to "the advancement of truth, science, morality and arts in general" and to the maintenance of "honorable and just modes" of conducting public affairs.[1] Central to the concept of a free press is freedom of political opinion, and at the core of that freedom lies the right to criticize the government. The acquittal of John Peter Zenger in 1735, in a prosecution for seditous libel, is celebrated, deservedly or not, because it "marked a milestone in the fight for the right to criticize the government." [2]

That right is indispensable to personal liberty and is inseparable from self-government. When any avenues of political expression are closed, government by consent of the governed may be foreclosed. If any information or opinion is denied expression, the formation of public policy has not been founded on a consideration of all points of view; as a result, the will of the majority cannot really be known. Accordingly, libertarian theory, such as that advanced by Zenger's counsel, presents a fairly systematic argument that defines and defends both freedom of the press and the right to criticize the government.

A broad libertarian theory emerged toward the close of the eighteenth century, first in England and then in America. It advocated the utmost freedom of political opinion by repudiating the concept that the government can be criminally assaulted—that is, seditiously libeled—simply by the expression of critical views that have a tendency (alleged to be bad) to diminish the public's esteem for the government. The new theory also advocated the same freedom for veryone, even those whose opinions were thought to be detestable, mocking, or pernicious; this included the village atheist and the local extremist, whether radical or reactionary. But prior to the close of the eighteenth century American thought on the meaning and scope of freedom of the press was quite narrow.

II

No cause was more honored by rhetorical declamation and more dishonored in practice than the cause of freedom of expression during the Revolutionary period, from the 1760's through the War for Independence. The irony of the period might best be portrayed by a cartoon depicting the tarring and feathering of a Tory speaker or printer under a banner run up by the patriots inscribed, "In Liberty's Cause." Yankee Doodle's Liberty Boys vociferously claimed for themselves the right to freedom of expression which they denied their opponents, revealing an extraordinarily narrow understanding of the liberty of the press. But there was nothing in their heritage or experience which fitted them for a broader understanding. It is not surprising, even if ironical, that when the New York Sons of Liberty rode out to smash Tory presses they were led by Alexander McDougall, who in 1770 had been jailed for criticizing the provincial assembly. Nor is it surprising that the Continental Congress, in its Quebec Declaration in 1774, advertised as one of the virtues of freedom of the press that it made possible the "diffusion of liberal sentiments on the administration of government. . . ."[3] Illiberal—that is, loyalist—sentiments were simply suppressed during the Revolution. It was not, regrettably, an object of the Revolution "to get rid of the English common law on liberty of speech and of the press."[4]

Indeed, the Revolution wrought no change whatever in the common law, nor did it effect any breakthroughs in the field of libertarian thought on freedom of political opinion. Republican forms of government had been established; the first written constitutions had been framed; the first bills of rights, having the force of fundamental law, had been adopted; even the first constitutional guarantees of freedom of speech and press had been specified. But law and theory remained the same. They were eptiomized best in a statement by Sir William Blackstone: "The liberty of the press is indeed essential to the nature of a free state; but this consists in laying no previous restraints upon publications, and not in freedom from censure for criminal matter when published. Every freeman has an undoubted right to lay what sentiments he pleases before the public; to forbid this is to destroy the freedom of the press; but if he publishes what is improper, mischievous, or illegal, he must take the consequences of his own temerity."[5]

To be sure, the principle of a free press, like flag, home, and mother, had no enemies in America after the Revolution. Only seditious libels, licentious opinions, and malicious falsehoods were condemned. The question, therefore, is not whether freedom of the press was favored, but what it meant and whether its advocates would extend it to a political opponent whose criticism cut to the bone on issues that really mattered. Jefferson once remarked that he did not care whether his neighbor said that there are twenty gods or no God, because "It neither picks my pocket nor breaks my leg."[6] But in drafting a constitution for Virginia in 1776 he considered proposing that freedom of religion "shall not be held to justify any seditious preaching or conversation against the authority of the civil government."[7] And in the same year he helped frame a statute on treasonous crimes, punishing anyone who "by any word" or deed defended the cause of Great Britain.[8] Apparently political opinions could break his leg or pick his pocket. What, then, did Jefferson mean by freedom of the press? He and his contemporaries supported an unrestricted public discussion of issues, but "unrestricted" meant merely the absence of censorship in advance of publication; although no one needed a government license to express himself, everyone was accountable under the criminal law for abuse of the right to speak or publish freely. Significantly, neither Jefferson himself nor anyone else in the United States, prior to 1798, extended his "overt acts" test to freedom of political opinion.

Jefferson had devised that test when seeking a way to insure the free exercise of religion. In one of his most enduring and noble achievements, the Act for Establishing Religious Freedom, which became law in Virginia in 1786, he declared that "to suffer the civil magistrate to intrude his powers into the field of opinion, and to restrain the profession or propagation of principles, on supposition of their ill tendency, is a dangerous fallacy, which at once destroys all religious liberty, because he being of course judge of that tendency, will make his opinions the rule of judgment, and approve or condemn the sentiments of others only as they shall square with or differ from his own; that it is time enough for the rightful purposes of civil government for its officers to interfere when principles break out into overt acts against peace and good order. . . ."[9] The overt-acts test applied in Jefferson's words, only to "opinions in matters of religion," although its principle should have been as relevant in cases of political opinion, and had been specifically extended to such cases by many English theorists.

Before 1798, the avant garde among American libertarians staked everything on the principles of the Zenger case, which they thought beyond improvement. They believed that no greater liberty could be conceived than the right to publish without restriction, if only the defendant could plead truth as a defense in a criminal prosecution for libel, and if the criminality of his words might be determined by a jury of his peers rather than by a judge. The substantive law of criminal libels was unquestioned. But libertarians who accepted Zengerian principles painted themselves into a corner. If a jury returned a verdict of "guilty" despite a defense of truth, due process had been accorded and protests were groundless, because the substance of the law that made the trial possible had not been challenged.

American acquiescence in the common-law definition of a free press was so widespread that even the frail Zengerian principles seemed daring, novel, and had few adherents. It was not until 1790 that the first state, Pennsylvania, took the then radical step of adopting the Zengerian principles,[10] which still left the common law of seditious libel intact. The Pennsylvania provision was drafted by James Wilson who, in the state convention that ratified the Constitution, declared without challenge by any of the ardent proponents of a bill of rights that "what is meant by the liberty of the press is that there should be no antecedent restraint upon it; but that every author is responsible when he attacks the security or welfare of the government. . . ." The mode of proceeding, Wilson added, should be by prosecution.[11] The state constitutional provision of 1790 reflected this proposition, as did state trials before and after 1790.[12]

[8] "That the mere utterance of a political opinion is being penalized in these cases becomes even clearer in a statute such as that in Virginia, which declared the utterance of the opinion, or action upon it, to be equally offensive, providing a fine not exceeding £ 20,000 and imprisonment not exceeding five years 'if any person residing or being within this commonwealth shall . . . by any word, open deed, or act, advisedly and willingly maintain and defend the authority, jurisdiction, or power, of the king or parliament of Great Britain, heretofore claimed and exercised within this colony, or shall attribute any such authority, jurisdiction, or power, to the king or parliament of Great Britain.'" Delaware and Kentucky followed Pennsylvania's lead in 1792,[13] but elsewhere the status quo prevailed. In 1789 William Cushing and John Adams worried about whether the guarantee of a free press in Massachusetts ought to mean that truth was a good defense to a charge of criminal libel, but they agreed that false publications against the government were punishable.[14] In 1791, when a Massachusetts editor was prosecuted for a criminal libel against a state official, the Supreme Judicial Court divided on the question of truth as a defense, but agreed, like the Pennsylvania judges,[15] that the state constitutional guarantee of a free press was merely declaratory of the common law in simply prohibiting a licensing system.[16]

The opinions of Jefferson, the acknowledged libertarian leader in America, and of Madison, the father of the Bill of Rights, are especially significant. In 1783, when proposing a new constitution for Virginia, Jefferson exempted the press from prior restraints but carefully provided for prosecution—a state trial—in cases of false publication.[17] In 1788, when urging Madison to support a bill of rights to the new federal Constitution, Jefferson made the same recommendation.[18] Madison construed it in its most favorable light, observing: "The exemption of the press from liability in every case for true facts is . . . an innovation and as such ought to be well considered." [19] But, on consideration, he did not add the truth-as-a-defense principle to the amendment on the press which he offered when proposing a bill of rights to Congress.[20] Yet Madison's phrasing appeared too broad for Jefferson, who stated that he would be pleased if the press provision were altered to exclude freedom to publish "false facts . . . affecting the peace of the confederacy with foreign nations" [21] —a clause whose suppressive possibilites can be imagined in the context of a foreign-policy controversy like the one on Jay's Treaty.

VI, 304: "Printing Pre shall be subject to no other restraint than liableness to legal prosecution f false facts printed and published." Boyd dates this document between May 1 and June 17, 1783.

Madison fortunately ignored Jefferson's proposal, but there is no warrant for the belief that he dissented from the universal American acceptance of the Blackstonian definition of a free press. In 1788, at the Virginia ratifying convention, Madison remained silent when George Nicholas, one of his closest supporters, declared that the liberty of the press was secure because there was no power to license the press;[22] Madison was silent, too, when John Marshall rose to say that Congress would never made a law punishing men of different political opinions "unless it be such a case as must satisfy the people at large." [23] In October of 1788, when replying to Jefferson's argument[24] that powers of the national government should be restricted by a bill of rights, Madison declared that "absolute restrictions in cases that are doubtful, or where emergencies may overrule them, ought to be avoided." [25] When Madison proposed an amendment in Congress guaranteeing freedom of the press, he did not employ the emphatic language of the Virginia ratifying convention's recommendation that freedom of the press should not be subject to abridgment "by any authority of the United States." [26] As Madison introduced the amendment, it omitted the important clause, "by any authority of the United States," [27] which would have covered the executive and judiciary as well as Congress; the omitted clause, in other words, would have prohibited the federal courts from exercising any common-law jurisdiction over criminal libels. As ratified, the First-Amendment declared only that Congress should make no law abridging the freedom of speech or press.

What did the amendment mean at the time of its adoption? First of all (if the amendment is analyzed by focusing on the phrase, "the freedom of the press"), it was merely an assurance that Congress was powerless to authorize restraints in advance of publication. On this point the evidence for the period from 1787 to 1791 is uniform and nonpartisan. For example, Hugh Williamson of North Carolina, a Federalist signatory of the Constitution, used freedom of the press in Blackstonian or common-law terms,[28] as did Melancthon Smith of New York, an anti-Federalist. Demanding a free-press guarantee in the new federal Constitution, despite the fact that New York's constitution lacked that guarantee, Smith argued that freedom of the press was "fully defined and secured" in New York by "the common and statute law of England," making a state constitutional provision unnecessary.[29] No other definition of freedom of the press by anyone anywhere in America before 1798 has been discovered. There was no dissent from the proposition that the punishment of a seditious libeler did not abridge the proper or lawful freedom of the press.[30]

Nevertheless, the injunction of the First Amendment was not intended to imply that a sedition act might be enacted without abridging "the freedom of the press." A sedition act would not be an abridgment, but that was not the point of the amendment. To understand its framers' intentions, the amendment should not be read with the focus on the meaning of "the freedom of the press." It should not, in other words, be read merely to mean that Congress could impose no prior restraints. It should be read, rather, with the stress on the opening clause, "Congress shall make no law. . . ." The injunction, that is, was intended to prohibit any Congressional regulation of the press, whether by means of a licensing act, a tax act, or a sedition act. The framers meant Congress to be totally without power to enact legislation respecting the press. They intended a federal system in which the national government could exercise only such powers as were specifically enumerated, or were necessary and proper to carry out those enumerated. Thus James Wilson declared that, because the national government had "no power whatsoever" concerning the press, "no law . . . can possibly be enacted" against it; thus Alexander Hamilton, referring to the demand for a free-press guarantee, asked, ". . . why declare that things shall not be done which there is no power to do?"[31] The illustrations may be multiplied fiftyfold. In other words, no matter what was meant or understood by freedom of speech and press, the national government, even in the absence of the First Amendment, could not make speech or press a legitimate subject of restrictive legislation. The amendment itself was superfluous. To quiet public apprehension it offered an added security that Congress would be limited to the exercise of its delegated powers. The phrasing was intended to prohibit the possibility that those powers might be used to abridge speech and press. From this view of the matter, the Sedition Act of 1798 was unconstitutional.

That act was also unnecessary as a matter of law, however necessary it was as a matter of Federalist Party policy. It was unnecessary because the federal courts exercised jurisdiction over nonstaturory or common-law crimes against the United States. At the Pennsylvania ratifying convention, James Wilson had declared that, whereas Congress could enact no law against the press, a libel against the United States might be prosecuted in the state where the offense was committed—under Article III, Section two, of the Constitution, which refers to the judicial power of the United States. A variety of common-law crimes against the United States were in fact tried in the federal courts during the first decade of the court's existence.[32] There were even a couple of common-law indictments in the federal courts for the crime of seditious libel.[33] All the early Supreme Court judges, including several, who had been influential in the Philadelphia Convention, or in the state ratifying conventions, or in the Congress that passed the Judiciary Act of 1789, assumed the existence of a federal common law of crimes.[34] Ironically, it was a case originating as a federal prosecution of Connecticut editors for seditious libels against President Jefferson that finally resulted in a ruling by a divided Supreme Court, in 1812, that there was no federal common law of crimes.[35]

[28] "There was a time in England when neither book, pamphlet, nor paper could be published without a license from government. That restraint was finally removed in the year 1694; and, by such removal, the press became perfectly free, for it is not under the restraint of any license. Certainly the new government can have no power to impose restraints." Hugh Williamson, "Remarks in the New Plan of Government," in Essays on the Constitution of the United States, ed. [30] The brief and vague statement by Oswald in 1788 may be regarded by some as an exception to this proposition. Oswald, having been indicted for a criminal libel on a private party, published an address to the public in which he stated: "The doctrine of libel being a doctrine incompatible with law and liberty, and at once destructive of the privileges of a free country, in the communication of our thoughts, has not hitherto gained any footing in Pennsylvania. . . ." Quoted in Respublica v. Oswald, 1 Dallas 319, at p. 320 (1788).

There was unquestionably a federal common law of crimes at the time of the Sedition Act. Why, then, was the Act passed if it was not legally needed? Because even in England, where the criminal courts exercised an unquestioned jurisdiction over seditous libels, it was politically advisable in the 1790's to declare public policy in unmistakable terms by the enactment of sedition statutes.[36] Legislation helped ensure effective enforcement of the law, stirred public opinion against the law's intended victims, and in every way served Federalist Party objectives. The Federalists, hoping to control public opinion and elections, emulated the British model. A federal statute was expedient also because the Republicans insisted that libels against the United States might be tried only by the state courts, which were not so trustworthy in some states as the Federal courts.

This suggests another original purpose of the First Amendment. We have noted that a constitutional guarantee of a free press did not per se preclude a sedition act, but the prohibition on Congress did, although it left the federal courts free to try cases of seditious libel. It now appears that the prohibition on Congress was motivated far less by a desire to give immunity to political expression than by a solicitude for states' rights and the federal principle. The primary purpose of the First Amendment was to reserve to the states an exclusive authority, as far as legislation was concerned, in the field of speech and press.

This is clear enough from the countless states' rights arguments advanced by the anti-Federalists during the ratification controversy; it is explicitly clear from the Republican arguments during the Sedition Act controversy. In the House debates on the bill, Albert Gallatin, Edward Livingston, John Nicholas, and Nathaniel Macon all agreed (to quote Macon on the subject of liberty of the press) that "The States have complete power on the subject. . . ."[37] Jefferson's Kentucky Resolutions of 1798 expressed the same proposition,[38] and so did Madison's "Address of the General Assembly to the People of the Commonwealth of Virginia" in 1799.[39]

It is possible that the opponents of the Sedition Act did not want or believe in state prosecutions, but argued for an exclusive state power over political libels because such an argument was tactically useful as a means of denying national jurisdiction, judical, or legislative. If so, how shall we explain the Republican prosecution in New York in 1803 against Croswell, a Federalist editor, for a seditious libel against President Jefferson?[40] How shall we explain the Blackstonian opinions of the Republican judges in that case?[41] How shall we explain Jefferson's letter to the governor of Pennsylvania in the same year? The President, enclosing a newspaper piece that attacked him unmercifully, urged a "few prosecutions" because they "would have a wholesome effect in restoring the integrity of the presses."[42] How shall we explain Jefferson's letter to Abigail Adams in 1804 in which he said: "While we deny that Congress have a right to control the freedom of the press, we have ever asserted the rights of the states, and their exclusive right to do so."[43] And if exclusive state power was advanced not as a principle but as a tactic for denying federal jurisdiction, how shall we explain what Jefferson's opponents called his "reign of terror":[44] the common-law indictments in 1806 in the United States Circuit Court in Connecticut against six men charged with seditous libel of the President?[45] How shall we explain his letter of 1807 in which he said of the "prosecutions in the Court of the U.S." that they could "not lessen the useful freedom of the press," if truth were admitted as a defense?[46]

Then, in 1798, there was a sudden breakthrough in American libertarian thought on freedom of political expression. The change was abrupt, radical, and transforming, like that caused by an underwater volcano erupting its lava upwards from the ocean floor to form a new island. The Sedition Act, which was a thrust in the direction of a single-party press and a monolithic party-system, triggered the libertarian surge among the Republicans. The result was the emergence of a new peak of libertarian thought, jutting out of a stagnant Blackstonian sea.

The Federalists in 1798 believed that true freedom of the press would benefit if truth—their truth—were the measure of freedom. Their infamous Sedition Act was, in the words of Gilbert and Sullivan, the true embodiment of everything excellent. It was, that is, the very epitome of libertarian thought since the time of Zenger's case—indicating that American libertarianism went from Zengerian principles to the Sedition Act in a single degeneration. Everything that the libertarians had ever demanded was incorporated in the Sedition Act: a requirement that criminal intent be shown; the power of the jury to decide whether the accused's statement was libelous as a matter of law as well as of fact; and truth as a defense which was an innovation not accepted in England until 1843.[47] By every standard the Sedition Act was a great victory for libertarian principles of freedom of the press—except that libertarian standards abruptly changed, because the Republicans immediately recognized a Pyrrhic victory.

The Sedition Act provoked them to develop a new libertarian theory. It began to merge when Congressmen Gallatin, John Nicholas, Nathaniel Macon, and Edward Livingston argued against the enactment of the Sedition bill.[48] It was further developed by defense counsel, most notably George Blake, in Sedition Act prosecutions.[49] It reached its most reflective and systematic expression in tracts and books that are now unfortunately rare and little known, even by historians. The main body of original Republican thought on the scope, meaning, and rationale of the First Amendment is to be found in George Hay's tract, An Essay on the Liberty of the Press;[50] in Madison's Report on the Virginia Resolutions for the Virginia House of Delegates;[51] in the book, A

It is reproduced in The Debates in the Several State Conventions, ed. Elliot, IV, 546–580, under the title, "Madison's Report on the Virginia Resolutions. . . . Report of the Committee to whom were referred the Communications of various States, relative to the Resolutions of the last General Assembly of this State, concerning the Alien and Sedition Laws." The Report is also available in The Writings of James Madison, ed. Hunt, VI, 341–406. The edition cited here is The Virginia Report of 1799–1800, Touching the Alien and Sedition Laws; together with the Virginia Resolutions of December 21, 1798, The Debates and Proceedings thereon, in the House of Delegates in Virginia (Richmond, Va.: J. W. Randolph, 1850); see pp. 189-237. This is a book of great value for its inclusion of the Virginia debates on the Sedition Act, at pp. 22–161. While those debates added little to the debates of the House of Representatives, the remarks of Republican speakers constitute another example of the new libertarianism.

Treatise Concerning Political Enquiry, and the Liberty of the Press, by Tunis Wortman of New York;[52] in John Thomson's book, An Enquiry, Concerning the Liberty, and Licentiousness of the Press;[53] and in St. George Tucker's appendix to his edition of Blackstone's Commentaries,[54] a most significant place for the repudiation of Blackstone on the liberty of the press. Of these works, Wortman's philosophical book is pre-eminent; it is an American masterpiece, the only equivalent on this side of the Atlantic to Milton and Mill.

The new libertarians abandoned the strait-jacketing doctrines of Blackstone and the common law, including the recent concept of a federal common law of crimes. They scornfully denounced the no-prior-restraints definition. Said Madison: ". . . this idea of the freedom of the press can never be admitted to be the American idea of it," because a law inflicting penalties would have the same effect as a law authorizing a prior restraint. "It would seem a mockery to say that no laws shall be passed preventing publications from being made, but that laws might be passed for punishing them in case they should be made."[55] As Hay put it, the "British definition" meant that a man might be jailed or even put to death for what he published, provided that no notice was taken of him before he published.[56]

The old yardstick for measuring the scope of freedom was also rejected by the new libertarians. "Liberty" of the press, for example, had always been differentiated from its "licentiousness," which was the object of the criminal law's sanctions. "Truth" and "facts" had always divided the realm of lawfulness from "falsehoods," and a similar distinction had been made between "good motives" and "criminal intent." All such distinctions were now discarded, on the ground that they did not distinguish and therefore were not meaningful standards that might guide a jury or a court in judging an alleged verbal crime. The term "licentiousness," wrote Thomason, "is destitute of any meaning"; it was used, according to him, by those who wished "nobody to enjoy the Liberty of the Press but such as were of their own opinion."[57] The term "malice," in Wortman's view, was invariably confused with mistaken zeal or prejudice.[58] It was merely an inference drawn from the supposed evil tendency of the publication itself, and just a further means of punishing the excitement of unfavorable sentiments against the government even when the people's contempt of the government was richly deserved. The punishment of "malice," or intent to defame the government, concluded Madison, necessarily struck at the right of free discussion, because critics intended to excite unfavorable sentiments.[59] Finding criminality in the tendency of words was merely an attempt to erect public "tranquility . . . upon the ruins of Civil Liberty," wrote Wortman.[60]

The wholesale abandonment of the common law's limitations on the press was accompanied by a withering onslaught against the constrictions and subjectivity of Zengerian principles. The Sedition Act, Hay charged, "appears to be directed against falsehood and malice only; in fact . . . there are many truths, important to society, which are not susceptible of that full, direct, and positive evidence, which alone can be exhibited before a court and a jury."[61] If, argued Gallatin, the Administration prosecuted a citizen for his opinion that the Sedition Act itself was unconstitutional, would not a jury, composed of the friends of that Administration, find the opinion "ungrounded, or, in other words, false and scandalous, and its publication malicious? And by what kind of argument or evidence, in the present temper of parties, could the accused convince them that his opinions were true?"[62] The truth of opinions, the new libertarians concluded, could not be proved. Allowing "truth" as a defense and thinking it to be a protection for freedom, Thomason declared, made as much sense as letting a jury decide which was "the most palatable food, agreeable drink, or beautiful color."[63] A jury, he asserted, could not give an impartial verdict in political trials. Madison agreed, commenting that the "baleful tendency" of prosecutions for seditious libel was "little diminished by the privilege of giving in evidence the truth of the matter contained in political writings."[64]

The renunciation of traditional concepts reached its climax in the assault on the idea that there was such a thing as a crime of seditious libel. That crime, Wortman concluded, could "never be reconciled to the genius and constitution of a Representative Commonwealth."[65] He and the others constructed a new libertarianism, genuinely radical because it broke sharply with the past and advocated an absolute freedom of political expression. One of the major tenets of this new libertarianism was that a free government cannot be criminally attacked by the opinions of its citizens. Hay, for example, insisted that freedom of the press, like chastity, was either "absolute"[66] or did not exist. Abhorring the very concept of verbal political crimes, he declared that a citizen should have a right to "say everything which his passions suggest; he may employ all his time, and all his talents, if he is wicked enough to do so, in speaking against the government matters that are false, scandalous and malicious,"[67] and yet he should be "safe within the sanctuary of the press" even if he "condemns the principle of republican institutions . . . censures the measures of our government, and every department and officer thereof, and ascribes the measures of the former, however salutary, and the conduct of the latter, however upright, to the basest motives; even if he ascribes to them measures and acts, which never had existence; thus violating at once, every principle of decency and truth."[68]

In brief, the new libertarians advocated that only "injurious conduct," as manifested by "overt acts" or deeds, rather than words, should be criminally redressable.[69] They did not refine this proposition except to recognize that the law of libel should continue to protect private reputations against malicious falsehoods. They did not even recognize that under certain circumstances words may immediately and directly incite criminal acts.

This absolutist interpretation of the First Amendment was based on the now familiar, but then novel and democratic, theory that free government depends for its very existence and security on freedom of political discourse. The scope of the amendment, according to this theory, is determined by the nature of the government and its relationship to the people. Because the government is the people's servant, exists by their consent and for their benefit, and is constitutionally limited, responsible, and elective, it cannot, said Thomson, tell the citizen: "You shall not think this, or that upon certain subjects; or if you do, it is at your peril."[70] The concept of seditiousness can exist only in a relationship based on inferiority, when people are subjects rather than sovereigns and their criticism implies contempt of their master. "In the United States," Madison declared, "the case is altogether different."[71] Coercion or abridgment of unlimited political opinion, Wortman explained, would violate the very "principles of the social state"—by which he meant a government of the people.[72]

72. A Treatise Concerning Political Enquiry, p. 29.

Because such a government depended upon popular elections, all the new libertarians agreed that the widest possible latitude must be maintained to keep the electorate free, informed, and capable of making intelligent choices. The citizen's freedom of political expression had the same scope as the legislator's, and had the same reasons behind it.[73] That freedom might be dangerously abused, but the people, if exposed to every opinion, would decide men and measures wisely.

This brief summary of the new libertarianism barely does justice to its complexity and sophistication, but should at least suggest its boldness, originality, and democratic character. The new libertarianism developed, to be sure, as an expediency of self-defense on the part of a besieged political minority that was struggling to maintain its existence and its right to function unfettered. But the new libertarians established, virtually all at once and in nearly perfect form, a theory justifying the rights of individual expression and of opposition parties. That the Jeffersonians in power did not always adhere to their new principles does not diminish the enduring nobility and rightness of those principles. It proves only that the Jeffersonians set the highest standards of freedom for themselves and posterity. Their legacy was the idea that there is an indispensable condition for the development of free men in a free society; the state must be bitted and bridled by a bill of rights that is to be construed in the most generous terms and whose protections are not to be the playthings of momentary majorities. That legacy deepened and enriched American libertarian theory, but it did not surmount the resistance of the law. Ultimate victory in the courts and statutes belonged to Alexander Hamilton's restatement of Zengerian principles.[74]

IV

Hamilton, a supporter of the Sedition Act and of prosecutions for criminal libel, believed that the law of libel should be governed by the principles of the Zenger case, in order to protect the legitimate freedom of the press. In 1804 he was permitted by his Jeffersonian opponents in New York, who were then in power, to make political capital and legal history by advocating these old principles. The state indicted Harry Croswell, an obscure Federalist editor, for the common-law crime of seditious libel against President Jefferson. Croswell's crime was his publishing of the accusation that Jefferson had paid to have Washington denounced as a traitor and Adams as an incendiary. Chief Justice Morgan Lewis, a Jeffersonian, refused Croswell the opportunity of introducing evidence to prove the truth of his statements. In instructing the jury, Lewis told the jurors that their only duty was to determine whether the defendant had in fact published the statements as charged; that they must leave to the court, as a matter of law, the determination of the statements' libelous character. Lewis, in other words, charged the jury that the law of New York was the law as laid down by Chief Justice DeLancey in the Zenger case.

On the appeal of Croswell's conviction, before the higher court of the state, Alexander Hamilton played the role of Andrew Hamilton, eloquently championing the cause of freedom of the press. That freedom, he said (in words that were even more restrictive than those of his precursor or of the Sedition Act), "consists in the right to publish, with impunity, truth, with good motives, for justifiable ends, though reflecting on government, magistracy, or individuals." The Sedition Act itself did not require proof of "good motives, for justifiable ends," but Alexander Hamilton's position, of course, seemed a shining standard of libertarianism when compared with the reactionary views of Chief Justice Lewis—or of the prosecutor, Attorney General Ambrose Spencer, another Jeffersonian. Spencer argued from Blackstone (not Tucker's version), and declared that a libel, even if true, was punishable because of its dangerous tendency. The former prosecutor became a member of the Supreme Court of Judicature by the time it decided the case. Had Spencer not been ineligible to participate in the decision, the repressive opinion re-expressed by Chief Justice Lewis would have commanded a majority. Instead, the court divided evenly, two against two. The opinion of Judge James Kent expressed Hamilton's position.

In the following year, 1805, the state legislature enacted a bill allowing the jury to decide the criminality of an alleged libel and permitting truth as a defense, if published "with good motives and for justifiable ends." It is this standard that prevailed in the United States until very recently.

The Framers of the First Amendment had a genius for studied imprecision. They were conscious of the need to phrase the Constitution in generalized terms and without a lexicographical guide, for they meant to outline an instrument that would serve future generations. Like Martin Chuzzlewit's grandnephew, who had no more than "the first idea and sketchy notion of a face," the Constitution was purposely made to embody first ideas and sketchy notions. Detailed codes, which become obsolete with a change in the particular circumstances for which they were adopted, are avoided by men trained in the common law. They tend rather to formulate principles that are expansive and comprehensive in character. The principles and not their framers' understanding and application of them are meant to endure. The Constitution designed by an eighteenth-century rural society, serves as well today as ever because an antiquarian historicism that would freeze its original meaning has not guided its interpretation and was not intended to.

The First Amendment's injunction, that there shall be no law abridging the freedom of speech or press, was boldly stated if narrowly understood. The bold statement, not the narrow understanding, was written into the fundamental law. "It is far better," as Tunis Worman wrote, "to err on the side of Latitude than on that of Restraint."[75] On this point the Framers would probably have agreed with Wortman. He and Blake, Hay, Madison, Gallatin, Tucker, and Thomson originated a libertarian philosophy that ought to define the content of the free speech-and-press clause. They were addressing the future, not the past. Their insistence that they were simply clarifying the past's original understanding reflected an Anglo-American habit of going forward while facing backwards: rights that should exist are established on the fictitious pretense that they have ever existed, and arguments are concocted to give to the fiction the appearance of both reality and legality. But there is no evidence to warrant the belief, nor is there valid cause or need to believe, that the Framers possessed the ultimate wisdom and best insights on the meaning of freedom of expression. It is enough that they gave constitutional recognition to the principle of freedom of speech and press in unqualified and undefined terms.

Senator ERVIN. Counsel will call the next witness.

Mr. BASKIR. Mr. Chairman, our next witness this morning is Professor Thomas Emerson, Lines Professor of Law of the Yale Law School. He is the author of many works on the First Amendment, including "The General Theory of the First Amendment," and also "The System of Freedom of Expression."

Senator ERVIN. Dr. Emerson, I am delighted to welcome you to the subcommittee. And I want to express the appreciation of the subcommittee for your willingness to appear and give us the benefit of your views on a subject on which you are most knowledgeable.

STATEMENT OF THOMAS I. EMERSON, PROFESSOR OF LAW, YALE UNIVERSITY LAW SCHOOL

Mr. EMERSON. Thank you. My testimony in a way supplements what Dean Levy has said, in that it is an attempt to formulate in terms of legal principle, and to apply to modern conditions, the absolutist theory that Madison and Jefferson had of the First Amendment.

One of the most remarkable features of the First Amendment is that, in the 180 years of its history, the courts have never developed a coherent theory of just what constitutional protection it affords. The Supreme Court did not, of course, have much occasion to interpret or apply the First Amendment until the suppression of free speech which grew out of World War I began to be challenged in the courts. The first major decision of the Supreme Court, Schenck v. United States (249 U.S. 47), did not come until 1919. Since that time, however, the Supreme Court has decided hundreds of first amendment cases and the lower courts many thousands.

[75] Wortman, Treatise Concerning Political Enquiry, p. 205.

In the course of these decisions various legal doctrines have from time to time prevailed, or been advanced in concurring and dissenting opinions. These formulations include the bad tendency test, the clear and present danger test, ad hoc balancing of interests, an incitement test, a test of grave and irreparable danger to national security, and the so-called absolute position. But the shifting majorities and minorities have never been able to settle on any single theory by which to determine how far the first amendment protects freedom of expression. The extent of disagreement is dramatically reflected in the last Supreme Court decision, the New York Times and Washington Post cases, where nine separate opinions were rendered. A lawyer arguing a first amendment case before the Supreme Court today literally does not know where to begin or where the Court will come out.

This unfortunate state of affairs seriously jeopardizes the system of freedom of expression in this country. If the courts cannot make up their minds there is no way for the citizen to know what his rights are. This is particularly damaging to freedom of the press. In the absence of a clearcut theory of First Amendment protection the press must either take daily risks or curtail its expression. Moreover, a system of freedom of expression can only exist if the community as a whole understands that system and supports it. But little understanding or support is possible when there is no agreement upon the basic constitutional doctrines which should govern.

It is true that no one simple formula can be devised which could apply to all the varied situations in which First Amendment issues are presented. Nevertheless, I think it is possible to construct a comprehensive theory which takes into account the underlying purposes of the First Amendment and formulates the basic legal doctrines necessary to achieve those goals. I have attempted such a formulation in my book, The System of Freedom of Expression, and will try briefly to summarize my conclusions for the committee.

I. A GENERAL THEORY

The central idea of a system of freedom of expression is that a fundamental distinction must be drawn between conduct which consists of expression and conduct which consists of action. Expression must be freely allowed and encouraged. Action can be controlled, subject to other constitutional requirements, but not by controlling expression. A system of freedom of expression cannot exist effectively on any other foundation, and a decision to maintain such a system necessarily implies acceptance of this proposition.

The line between expression and action is often entirely clear. At other times, however, the line may be obscure and the distinction more difficult to formulate. All expression has some physical element. Moreover, a communication may take place in a contest of action, as in the familiar example of the false cry of "fire" in a crowded theater. Or, a communication may be closely linked to action, as in the gang leader's command to his triggerman. In these cases it is necessary to decide, however fine the distinction may appear to be, whether the conduct is to be classified as one or the other. This judgment must be guided by consideration of whether the conduct partakes of the essential qualities of expression or action, that is, whether expression or action is the dominant element. And the concept of expression must be related to the fundamental purposes of the system of freedom of expression and the dynamics of its operation.

Freedom of expression can flourish and the goals of the system can be realized, only if expression receives full protection under the first amendment. This principle of full protection means that the first amendment must be interpreted as embodying the following rules of law.

1. The Government may not prohibit, curtail, or restrict expression in any way for the purpose of achieving other social objectives or advancing its own interests. In such a context the expression must be given full protection regardless of its tendency, its likelihood to create a clear and present danger, or any balancing of interests. Government controls must be confined to regulation of action. Where the Government regulation is directed toward conduct consisting of action and conduct consisting of expression it must be drawn in such a way as to restrict only the action, leaving the expression uncurtailed.

2. It follows, a fortiori, that no controls can be exercised over expression by a system of prior restraint.

3. The Government may regulate the internal operations of the system of freedom of expression in order to resolve conflicts between participants in the system, such as by requiring a permit for a parade or allocating use of facilities in short supply. Such regulation must relate only to the time, place, and manner of the expression, not to its content, and must conform to the principle of fair accommodation between participants.

4. Where exercise of the right of expression involves the use of physical facilities also utilized for other purposes, such as an assembly on the streets or in a park, the Government may allocate the use of the facilities between the competing interests. Such regulations must likewise conform to the principle of fair accommodation and, so far as it relates to expression, control only time, place and manner, not content.

5. The status of an individual in a limited-purpose organization, such as a Government agency or a labor union, imposes upon him certain obligations different from those of the ordinary citizen to the general community. Hence the freedom of expression of such person, vis-a-vis the organization, may be subjected to the minimum regulation necessary to secure the specific purposes the organization is designed to achieve.

6. The Government may exercise its power to eliminate obstructions to, or to affirmatively promote, the effective functioning of the system of freedom of expression. Regulation of this type is valid under the First Amendment provided it advances, rather than retards, the operation of the system in terms of its basic nature and functions.

Other legal doctrines are necessary to solve particular problems. These pertain to the place where First Amendment rights may be exercised, the relationship of the system of freedom of expression to the system of privacy, and similar matters. Such issues likewise must be resolved on a functional basis, taking into account the objectives and operation of the system.

The foregoing principles are applicable to the basic "system of freedom of expression" which exists in this country. They do not necessarily apply, or apply in the same way, to certain sectors of social conduct in which the rules for protecting freedom of expression must be framed in a different contest. Such areas include commercial activities, the activities of children, certain aspects of the military, and some aspects of communication with foregin countries. This does not mean that the First Amendment has no application in these sectors. It simply recognizes that the functions of expression and the principles needed to protect expression in such areas are different from those in the main system, and that different legal rules may therefore be required.

II. APPLICATION OF THE THEORY TO THE PUBLICATION OF CLASSIFIED INFORMATION

We may test the general theory by applying it to the problems involved in the publication of the Pentagon Papers. To what extent, if any, may the Government attempt to prevent or punish the publication of classified information without violating the First Amendment?

The issues must be considered in a realistic context. We must take into account both how the classification process works and the role of the press in reporting on national affairs. It is well known that there are millions of Government documents classified and that over-classification is endemic to the process. Moreover, the technique of classification is an easy way for the Government to cover up its mistakes or take dubious action behind a cloak of secrecy, and is frequently used for these purposes. In addition, large quantities of classified information are constantly being disclosed and published. Some of this is released by high Government officials to promote administration policies; some is leaked by Government officials who disagree with administration policies in order to apply pressure for their viewpoint; some is revealed to a favorite reporter or disclosed in an off-the-record briefing session in order to put a reporter under obligation to the official; some appears in memoirs. The fact is that the government and its officials allow a continuous flow of classified information to become public in order to advance their own interests. Disclosure is part of the government process.

The other half of the picture is equally significant. The function of the press is not limited to the mere reporting of official handouts. Its great role is to probe behind the scenes and inform the public of what is going on back of closed official doors. The press must be skeptical, critical, and above all informative. There is no other way by which the American people can obtain the information necessary to understand public issues and control its public servants. This is particularly important in an era of mounting Government secrecy and massive credibility gaps. In performing this vital function the press has the duty to dig out all the information it can, classified or unclassified. Disclosure is part of the democratic process.

Under these circumstances, the imposition of sanctions for the publication of classified materials would simply operate to give the Government a one-way opportunity to use the classification system to conceal its mistakes and to promote its own interests, while throttling the press as a major countervailing source of information. The only way in which our system of freedom of expression can operate effectively is to treat all so-called classified material which escapes from Government possession as part of the pool of information available to the whole community in the conduct of its public affairs.

Against this background we can proceed to a more detailed analysis of the constitutional issues. The first step is to determine what conduct connected with the publication of classified material involves "action" and what involves "expression." It would seem that stealing classified information from Government files or obtaining it through fraud or deception of the government would constitute "action."[1]

In securing physical possession in this way the "action" element of the conduct appears predominant. Similarly, obtaining or divulging classified information as part of an espionage operation would also appear to be "action," not "expression." Surreptitious conveyance of information to the agent of a foreign country, in the context of an espionage apparatus, is not part of the system of communicating ideas protected by the First Amendment. But publication of the material, after the "action" had terminated, would plainly constitute "expression." This would certainly hold as to publication by the press or by any third party who obtained information from the person who originally took possession. I think it would also apply to publication of the material by the very person who obtained illegal possession. At that point the "action" is completed and the "expression" commences.

Under this analysis the Government could apply sanctions to the theft of classified information, or other illegal procurement, as well as to espionage. But subsequent publication of the material, after it had escaped the Government's possession and thereby became part of the general pool of information, could not be prevented or punished. As "expression," the conduct would be fully protected.

Two other aspects of First Amendment theory are also relevant. First, what about the conduct of an employee in a Government agency who, having authorized possession of classified material, conveys this information to a third party in violation of a lawful regulation? One might consider this conduct as engaging in "expression." Even so, obligations necessary to the effective achievement of the agency function could be imposed upon members of that organization, Hence, assuming the regulation was in fact necessary, the Government could apply sanctions to the Government employee. Second, the legal doctrines applicable to classified information relating to military operations in an actual theater of war might be different. A reporter in a battle zone is not governed by the same principles as pertain to the civilian world. Hence, without attempting to formulate the rules applicable to military operations, it is sufficient to say that ordinary first amendment principles would not necessarily control.

[1] I am not attempting to deal here with the question whether the "right to know" features of the first amendment might in some circumstances justify the obtaining of classified information by these methods.

The question may be raised at this point whether it would not be possible to prevent or punish the publication of only that part of classified materials which might do serious damage to our national security. The issue is a crucial one in First Amendment theory. The basis of the full protection theory and, I believe, of an effective system of free expression is that partial suppression of expression is wrong in principle and destructive of the system in practice. In the case of classified materials, with which we are here concerned, I think it can be demonstrated that anything short of full protection would lead to a degree of press repression that would far outweigh any gains to national security.

One way for the Government to proceed would be, as in the New York Times and Washington Post cases, by attempting to enjoin or otherwise prevent in advance the publication of classified material. This mode of procedure calls into play the most repressive of all methods of control—advance censorship or prior restraint. I have elsewhere attempted to summarize the impact of prior restraint upon freedom of expression:

> A system of prior restraint is in many ways more inhibiting than a system of subsequent punishment: It is likely to bring under Government scrutiny a far wider range of expression; it shuts off communications before it takes place; suppression by a stroke of the pen is more likely to be applied than suppression through a criminal process; the system allows less opportunity for public appraisal and criticism; the dynamics of the system drive toward excesses, as the history of all censorship shows.[2]

If a free press is to survive, all forms of prior restraint without qualification or exception, must be rejected.[3]

Indeed, it is not possible as a practical matter to introduce qualifications or exceptions to the rule against prior restraint without undermining the rule altogether. In the Times-Post case, for example, the Government argued that a prior restraint should be permissible where the publication of classified material might "gravely and irreparably" damage national security. Should the courts accept such a doctrine all the government would need do in any case would be to allege "grave and irreparable damage" and ask the court for a restraining order. In order to consider the Government's contention the court would be constrained to issue such an order, hold a hearing (probably in secret), and ultimately decide whether or not the newspaper could publish the material. The very process of determining whether the exception to the prior restraint rule should apply would itself constitute a prior restraint. This is exactly what happened in the Times-Post case. In short, no rule other than the rule of full protection is feasible when the government attempts to cut off expression before it has occurred.

The other method of control—sanctions applied after publication has taken place—presents similar difficulties. None of the legal tests proposed, other than full protection, affords any real safeguard to the press. The "grave and irreparable damage" test is wide open and impossible to reduce to specific terms. The same is true of the clear and present danger test, the balancing test, or any other that can be devised. There is no way to define precisely in advance where the cutoff point is to be. The best those legal doctrines can do is to determine after trial that the point has been passed.

As a result, the press can never know beforehand what is criminal and what is not. Not can it ever be sure when the Government may claim the publication is criminal and start a prosecution. Hence the press is put under intolerable pressure. Its function is to criticize and expose. In doing this it often causes embarrassment, arouses hostility, or provokes vengeance. It is not possible to perform such a function if the Government is able to institute a criminal proceeding whenever in its judgment the publication might create a danger to "national security." In the end the press would be put under a form of control very similar to prior restraint. In order to be certain there would be no retaliation it would have to make sure that the Government did not oppose publication.

We conclude, therefore, that there is no way to preserve a free and vigorous press except by a rule which extends to publication of classified material that has entered the public domain the full protection of the First Amendment. It has been argued that such a doctrine will jeopardize our national security. The history of this country, however, affords no support for such fear. On the contrary, an independent press, encouraged to perform its traditional role, is a far better instrument than repression for preserving our national security.

I have confined myself here to application of the full [illegible] theory of the First Amendment to the single instance of [illegible]tion of classified material. I believe that a similar analysis [illegible] other areas would lead to similar conclusions. The major [illegible] amendment cases should be to determine what is expression [illegible] tinct from action, and to give expression complete protection [illegible] doctrines which attempt to afford expression only partial [illegible] are inconsistent with the purposes of the first amendment [illegible] practice defeat its objectives. It is true that the First [illegible] thus applied may entail some risks. But there is no [illegible] all risks. And the attempt to do so leads only to a [illegible] the other hand I know of no society that has [illegible] because of overprotection of freedom of expression.

Senator Ervin. I infer from the closing paragraph [illegible] ment that if a society is going to be free it [illegible] some risks.

Mr. Emerson. Yes, Senator, I think that is clearly so. There is no such thing as total security. And the effort to achieve total security can only result in a system of restraint which is equivalent to a totalitarian system and which will ultimately break apart.

Senator Ervin. There can be no doubt of the fact, can there, that a nation which extends freedom of speech or freedom of the press to its people must take the risk that on occasions such freedoms will be abused in their exercise?

Mr. Emerson. Yes, I think that is part of what was contemplated by the theory from the very beginning. As James Madison said many years ago, there will always be abuses or excesses, but the important thing is to be sure that by trimming off the abuses one doesn't destroy the tree.

Senator Ervin. Isn't it an inescapable truth that a government can not prevent all abuses of freedoms without destroying the freedoms themselves?

Mr. Emerson. That is correct, Senator. There is no way by which one can have a perfect or an ideal system, or complete politeness or complete moderation, if there is freedom to express oneself. Freedom of expression necessarily involves a clash of ideas, and it necessarily involves a conflict. In fact, the whole purpose of freedom of expression is to have a kind of a conflict, but within bounds. If the conflict in terms of what one says is restricted, the conflict can then take place only in terms of violence.

Senator Ervin. Is it correct to say that the freedoms which the First Amendment undertakes to protect against abridgement, either explicitly or implicitly, include freedom of thought, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of assembly, freedom of petition, or freedom of dissent?

Mr. Emerson. I am sorry, I didn't understand you.

Senator Ervin. Cannot it be said that the freedoms which the first amendment undertakes to protect against abridgement by government may be defined or summarized as freedom of thought, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of assembly, freedom of petition, and freedom of dissent and freedom of religion.

Mr. Emerson. Yes, Senator. I think that the First Amendment covers all those areas. And that embodies in essence the purposes which have to be served; I agree with you.

Senator Ervin. Are not these freedoms designed to make Americans politically, intellectually, and spiritually free; isn't that the overall objective?

Mr. Emerson. Yes; that is the purpose. And I think the accomplishment of that purpose has never been more necessary than it is today. It seems to me that as we face a more complicated society, and as our problems get more intricate, and as our institutions get larger and more rigid, we are only going to be able to solve our problems if people understand what those problems are and are able to communicate about them, receive new ideas, and give their ideas. The whole tendency of modern government is to close in and keep information to itself. There is a certain power in withholding information from the public. But that is a very shortsighted position, because ultimately it is only if the public understands what is involved, and can express its ideas about it, that these problems are going to be solved. So that I think there has never been a time when the basic ideas of the first amendment are more applicable than at the present time.

Senator Ervin. Some people, such as the late Justice Black, and Justice Douglas, have maintained the position that the first amendment freedoms are absolute. I believe that is valid with respect to freedom of thought which doesn't culminate in utterances or any action. But is it your opinion that the other first amendment freedoms outside of the freedom of thought are absolute or may they be described as limited?

Mr. Emerson. No; my position is that all aspects of freedom of expression which go beyond freedom of thought or freedom of belief, but include freedom to express opinions, freedom to attempt to persuade others, all of those should receive full and unqualified protection. I don't like the term "absolute," because it doesn't seem to quite express the idea. But there should be no qualifications. The dividing line that I would establish is between what can be called expression on the one hand and other forms of conduct, action, on the other. The basic notion behind the system as I view it is that if you are to have any freedom, if you are to have freedom of thought or freedom of belief, or freedom to express yourself, you must permit that in an unlimited form. Once you start to try to limit it, as a practical matter, or as the dynamics of the situation work out, you become repressive. If you want to make an analogy with the history that Dr. Levy has just told us about, I think there is one. He pointed out that the liberals at the time of the adoption of the Constitution took the position that freedom of expression would be possible provided there were adequate legal rules with respect to intent, and provided that the defense of truth was allowed, and provided that the jury made the basic decision as to whether a statement was libelous or not. And then they found in the administration of the Sedition Act that that didn't work. I think the same is true in modern times with respect to the efforts that have been made to formulate principles by which to qualify the first amendment. At the time it was adopted the clear and present danger test was an advance, at least an advance in terms of the theories that might have been applied, and therefore was accepted by the liberals. But I think as time has gone on we have discovered that the application of the clear and present danger as a test, or the application of balancing as a test, does not in practice give the necessary protection, and that it is only by moving to a more objective position, namely, that anything that can be described as an expression is protected, and only action can be punished; only by moving to that position can you really have an effective protection.

Senator Ervin. I want to say that I think that you express the limitation of governmental power in this respect far better than those who use the terms "absolute" and "limited" in referring to rights under the First Amendment. In other words, your position is that insofar as activity consists only of the expression of ideas, there is an absolute right to make that expression, and that the governmental power to place any kind of limitation on an activity of this nature arises only when that activity passes beyond the realm of expression and enters the realm of action.

Mr. EMERSON. That is correct, Senator, yes.

Senator ERVIN. And as you point out, sometimes it is difficult to point out correctly the line of demarcation which separates expression on the one hand and action on the other.

Mr. EMERSON. That is right. The problem is to define that area in terms of the basic theory of freedom of expression, which is that expression is so fundamental to freedom, or to a democratic system, that it must be permitted, that one can by allowing expression solve a great many problems, that one can sort of try things out by arguing back and forth and expressing different points of view, and that society solves its problems and makes advances by undertaking and encouraging within it that kind of conflict, that kind of disagreement. And as long as that conduct remains within the area of speech or expression, it must be fully protected. Only if it goes beyond that into the area of action can the Government step in.

Senator ERVIN. I take it that the distinction you make between expression and action is illustrated by the Court's decisions which say in effect that a person can advocate the violation of criminal law, or even the overthrow of the Government by unlawful means, as long as they confine their activities to the expression of those ideas and do not urge action to accomplish it.

Mr. EMERSON. That is right. As long as it is confined to communicating an idea, it should be protected. If it is part of the action—if a speaker gets up, and after a long harangue says, "All right, now let's march on city hall," then the speech has become part of the action in marching on city hall, and that is no longer an expression, that is part of an action. But up to the point that it reaches action it must be protected.

Senator ERVIN. And the power of Government can only be invoked when a stage of action that threatens some other social interest beyond the public interest and freedom of expression is reached?

Mr. EMERSON. That is correct, yes.

Senator ERVIN. I am glad you discussed the Pentagon Papers. You take the position, as I understand it, that the press has a public duty to perform. When the Government suppresses some information in order to prevent the truth from being known, and discloses other information at its discretion to serve some of its other ends, the press has a duty to try to get the facts concerning the suppressed information and inform the public by presenting information it obtained which would show whether the information which the Government disclosed for its own purposes is accurate and dependable.

Mr. EMERSON. That is correct. The basic function of the press should not be to simply take the handouts that government gives it. And the press has fortunately never limited itself in this country t that role. Its function is to dig beneath the surface and find out what is going on and convey that information to the American people. Now, in order to do that it necessarily at times will be publishing information which the Government has classified as confi dential or secret or top secret, because the classification system is s overdone, and so much classification information is given out, tha part of the pool of information that the American people mus know if they are to act in their role of citizens is always available and should be reported. And to try to say that the press either can be prevented from publishing classified material which gets into its hands or can be published afterward is to shut off all communication except what the government decides to give out. And that would be an ingrown system which would be far worse for our national security than to allow the publication of some material which might embarrass us in one way or another.

Senator ERVIN. With regard to that aspect of the issue, Senator Roth of Delaware has introduced a bill, which I co-sponsored, to appoint a commission to study this whole question of government classification of information. It is our hope that the commission would make recommendations to Congress which would enable Congress to establish definite rules in respect to the kinds of information to be classified, and how that information is declassified, including appropriate time limitations. Do you think that a commission of that kind could serve a useful purpose at this time?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes, I think it could. It seems to me quite clear that the classification system needs overhauling. There is a lot to be done by a study of how it works and what rules can be established. I don't think that is a complete answer. I think it must still be true that you can never keep the government from overclassifying. The tendency of any bureaucracy is to withhold information to itself, and not allow it to become available. The classification scheme is one way of doing that. And it is one that is very frequently used. I think there is no way by which you can prevent government agencies from using the classification system that way.

Therefore, I think that whatever happens, the rule still must be that if the classified material gets outside the Government, if the Government loses control, if the material gets into the public domain, it simply can be published. And to try to prevent the publication of classified material at that point is to seriously curtail the function of the free press.

Senator ERVIN. You take the position, as I interpret your statement, that prior restraint is absolutely incompatible with freedom of speech and freedom of the press?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes; I do.

Senator ERVIN. And that there is no more effective way to destroy those freedoms than for the Government to exercise prior censorship and prior restraint?

Mr. EMERSON. That is right, Senator.

Senator ERVIN. Therefore, you draw the conclusion that any information accumulated by the Government, which becomes available to the press, is information which the press has the liberty of publishing, regardless of how they obtained it.

Mr. EMERSON. That is right. The Government can protect itself by keeping the information to itself. But once it loses that control, there is no way to get it back. And there is no way to punish the press for printing it without destroying the function that the press is supposed to perform.

Senator ERVIN. History indicates that the press has, in times past, exercised a commendable voluntary restraint in publishing information which was likely to "endanger the national security," if I may use that kind of loose expression.

Mr. EMERSON. Yes; they certainly have. I think at times they have overdone it. But as I said in my written testimony, I know of no case in which what the press has published has seriously endangered our national security. And that includes during the last two wars.

Senator ERVIN. You also take the position that stealing information from the Government is action rather than expression.

Mr. EMERSON. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. And therefore can be punished by the Government quite legitimately.

Mr. EMERSON. That is right. The theft of the information seems to me to be in the category of action, and punishable.

Senator ERVIN. Not making this question applicable to any specific case, can the Government punish the press for receiving information that it knows was stolen from the Government.

Mr. EMERSON. I think the knowledge of the fact that it was stolen does not change the basic rule that once it gets out into the public domain, it can't be called back, and one can't attempt to rectify the situation by preventing publication or punishing publication. I would say that the Government must limit its sanctions to controlling classified material in the first place, and to try to retrieve the situation after the material has gotten out by punishing those who are publishing it is simply destructive of a free press.

Incidentally, it probably will not work. Even if the government had secured an injunction in the New York Times case, I do not believe that it would have prevented the publication of that material in one form or another. So that it is a futile—in the end it is a somewhat futile—gesture, if the press is willing to take the chance. The only way that the Government can keep that material secret is by really intensive police measures, which brings us almost to a totalitarian kind of press control.

Senator ERVIN. I appreciate your remarks on that point. I am frank to state that that was one problem which troubled me a great deal. I had been unable to arrive at any positive conclusion, one way or another, in respect to it. Your position is that the value of the freedom of the press is so great to public interest that if the press could be criminally punished for receiving information which had been stolen from the Government the power of the press to inform the public would be seriously restricted.

Mr. EMERSON. That is correct; yes.

Senator ERVIN. In other words, your position is—and I'm not sure you would express it this way—that you have two public interests which come into conflict, the public interest in punishing the receipt of stolen goods or stolen information, and the public interest in the publication of information regardless of how it is acquired; that the interest of society in the publication of the truth is so far greater than the other interest with which it conflicts that it should prevail; and that its prevailing is essential to the complete benefit of freedom of the press.

Mr. EMERSON. That is correct. And that as a practical matter there is no way to attempt to sift out material between what is really dangerous and what is not really dangerous, and so forth; there is no way of doing that which wouldn't destroy the freedom of the press. So one has to have a rule of full protection.

Senator ERVIN. Your conclusion is that thus far the courts have never been able to devise a rule to fit all cases. Consequently each case must be decided more or less on its own basis despite the fact that the courts have attempted to lay down general principles on various aspects of this subject?

Mr. EMERSON. I don't think it is possible to adopt a single formulation for all cases; no. And I attempted to spell out a series of basic formulations which start off from the position of attempting to define what is expression and what is action, and protecting the expression, start off with that fundamental premise, and then deal with certain other kinds of problems. And there are problems, for instance, of permits for parades that raise different questions, because there the issue is a shortage of facilities. You can't have two parades on the same street at the same time. And if you have a parade you have to shut off traffic. There is a use of physical facilities involved, one use of which is for expression, and another use of which is for traffic. And the Government has to reconcile that conflict. But that is not too difficult a problem. It can accommodate both interests by having the parade at a certain time, and so on, or giving a permit to the first one who applies. There are fairly objective rules for that. So you have to have rules for situations of that sort too. But those I think can be developed into a comprehensive theory that will be understandable to people so that people will know what their rights are.

Senator ERVIN. The regulations that are designed to take care of those situations are subject to the limitation that the manner in which they are applied must not interfere with the expression of ideas.

Mr. EMERSON. That is correct. Those are regulations as to time, place, and manner, and not as to content.

Senator ERVIN. I owe you an apology for interpreting your position inaccurately. You think there is a fundamental principle that there can be no Government regulation or prohibition or punishment for the expression of ideas, and that the Government can only act where those ideas go beyond mere expression and into the realm of action?

Mr. EMERSON. That is exactly it.

Senator ERVIN. And that all of the tests which have been laid down in the various cases have been tests which the courts have employed to try to fit that general principle to specific instances?

Mr. EMERSON. Well, the tests the courts have employed, with the exception of Justice Black and Justice Douglas, and to some extent Justice Brennan, they have attempted to determine when the Government may cut off expression even though it is expression. That is to say, they have said, expression is permissible, but if it creates a clear and present danger to a governmental interest it can be cut off at that point. Or they have said, expression is permissible, but if the interest in freedom of speech is outweighed by another Government interest, then the expression can be cut off. They have been looking for formulations as to at what point you cut it off, even though it might be considered expression. I think those formulations should be abandoned, that it is impossible to put them on a basis which is sufficiently objective so that anyone knows what his rights are, and that these principles cut off free speech at a point where it ought not to be. And in the place of those formulations as to at what point you cut expression off, the courts should focus on the question whether the conduct is what is intended to be protected, that is, expression, and having found that, give it full protection, not partial protection.

Senator ERVIN. Thank you for clarifying that aspect. In other words, your position is that as long as you are merely expressing ideas, the Government has no power to interfere.

Mr. EMERSON. That is right.

Senator ERVIN. In enforcing the right of freedom of the press, the principle that the Government can only regulate action, as distinguished from an expression of ideas, is the principle that should control in each case. At the same time, you recognize the difficulty of applying that principle in every given factual situation. As a result, not only does the free society have to take certain risks, but a free press has to take certain risks under certain circumstances?

Mr. EMERSON. That is true, yes.

Senator ERVIN. I thank you for a most illuminating presentation of your viewpoint. I would like to say that I think you have rendered a great service to our society. In my opinion your recent book contains as enlightening a discussion of this somewhat baffling problem as anything I have found.

Mr. EMERSON. Thank you, sir.

Senator ERVIN. Senator Hruska.

Senator HRUSKA. I have no questions. I am sorry I was not here for your testimony, Professor. I assure you, I shall read the record very carefully, because we know of your interest and your accomplishments in this field. I shall study your statement and your replies to Senator Ervin's questions.

Senator ERVIN. Senator Thurmond.

Senator THURMOND. Professor Emerson, it is a great pleasure to have you with us. And I have enjoyed what you had to say very much.

The big question, as I understand, in your opinion is determining what is expression and what is action. Once that is determined, most of the questions would be solved without too much trouble. If it is expression it is allowed, and if it is action, it may or may not be allowed; is that more or less it, broadly?

Senator THURMOND. Now, if it is expression—for instance, if it was a matter that the Defense Department would feel if exposed would be very detrimental to the welfare of our country, and they might go into court and ask for a restraining order on that basis, then is it your position that they would have to prove to the court that there is a case, otherwise the expression would be allowed. They couldn't just say that it is of grave interest to our national defense if it were allowed, they would have to prove that to a court, is that correct? Or would you go further than that and say it would be allowed even though they convince a court that it would be detrimental to our national interest?

Mr. EMERSON. I would say that even if the Government was able to persuade the court that it would be detrimental to national interest the court should not restrain the publication, that once you start using that test, that one cannot say anything that is detrimental to the national interests, it destroys the whole system of freedom of speech and freedom of the press. So that would not be the issue, Senator. I would say in that situation of publication of classified materials, the court should look at the question of whether there was any action involved, and if the materials have been stolen from government files, then I think that would be considered as action and punishable. But when the material became a part of the general pool of information, and a newspaper published it, I don't think it could be restrained, no matter what the Government said about injury to national interests.

Senator THURMOND. As I understand your position, then, if someone obtained information, even though it was classified, and was stolen information, and even though it might be against the national interest, and it reaches the public domain, it could be published, and the first amendment would protect that.

Mr. EMERSON. That is correct.

Senator THURMOND. But the fellow who stole it of course he committed an action there when he stole it. And therefore if it is a violation of law, then he might be prosecuted under that theory, under the theory of the action that he took rather than the full expression of the first amendment?

Mr. EMERSON. Correct. Of course, I am not talking about any particular case. And I suppose there might be cases where, although action, the action would not be punishable. But as a general proposition, that would be the basis on which I think that that particular question should be settled, yes.

Senator THURMOND. If a matter should be detrimental to the national interest, even though it could be published under the theory of free expression, there is a big responsibility on the free press in a case like that, then, as to whether they would publish something if it was well known that it would be against the national interest, would there not?

Mr. EMERSON. That is correct. And it would be a judgment that the press would have to make. I think that the theory of our Government is that we would trust our citizens to make judgments that would advance the interests of the country, even though they might disagree with the Government's view of what was in the national interest.

Senator THURMOND. A great deal of material is held by Government agencies, specially the Defense Department and the State Department, that they have never released. And I had a fight on this in 1961 and 1962 in muzzling of the military. I tried to get from the Government at that time—Kennedy was President, Mr. McNamara was Secretary of Defense, and Mr. Rusk was Secretary of State—I tried to get from them the policies of our Government. And it was impossible to get its policies. The President sent down a letter claiming immunity, that the executive branch was immune from providing that information. And the Secretary of Defense came in and presented that letter, and therefore he wouldn't testify and would not present that information to the committee. And the Secretary of State did the same thing. Do you feel that the information concerning our policies is of such a nature that it should have been withheld that way?

Mr. EMERSON. That raises a different question, I think, Senator. The question we have been talking about previously was the right of the press to publish information which came into its hands. Now, there is another question which you raise, and that is the right of a member of the legislature to know the basis of the policy adopted by the executive branch, or the right of the general public to know the basis on which the executive branch is operating. That is a very difficult and complicated area. It does seem to me that the Executive does have the privilege to retain certain information and not make it public, information which would damage a person individually, information in the Government investigating files, and various kinds of information which are mentioned in the Freedom of Information Act. And therefore I don't think one can take the position that there is an absolute right of a member of the legislature or a member of the public to obtain any information in the hands of the Exeutive. That position seems to me would be untenable.

Senator THURMOND. Wouldn't the Congress have a right, though, to know the policies of our Government, since they have to legislate.

Mr. EMERSON. Certainly, without a doubt. And I think the Executive withholds far more material from Congress than it should. I am simply saying that this situation is not the one I was talking about in which I would apply an absolute rule or full protection rule to the acquiring of information. I was talking about the publication.

Senator THURMOND. It is a different theory, I understand.

Mr. EMERSON. Yes.

Senator THURMOND. The right of the legislative branch to know the policies of our Government, or else how can they legislate properly unless they do?

Mr. EMERSON. That is correct. And on that I would say that by and large the legislature and the public should be able to obtain all information from the Executive. I would start out with that proposition. And then I think you have to make some sort of exceptions in certain kinds, in limited kinds of situations, where it would damage a person individually, or where negotiations may be going on in a diplomatic area that would at the moment be interfered with, or some exceptions of that sort. I would start out with the proposition that everybody has a right to know everything, as a starting point, and then try to formulate some exceptions to that. This is an area where I think it is necessary to formulate some qualification.

Senator THURMOND. Now, the matter of pornographic material has been discussed a great deal, and just what Congress can do about that. And the pornographic publishers have claimed that they have a right to publish anything, and so forth. I would like to ask you this question. Do you classify the publication of pornographic material as action or expression, and to what extent can pornographic material be regulated without violating the First Amendment?

Mr. Emerson. My position is that the publication of pornographic material is expression. I don't see how one can say that it is not a communication of ideas or that it does not qualify in every other way as being expression. I would say, therefore, that under the first amendment there cannot be any restrictions on the publication of pornographic material. The only point at which it seems to me that there could be limitations under the First Amendment would be if under certain circumstances the publication of pornographic material could have the effect of action in the sense that it was forced upon someone. I don't think anyone should be forced to read or look at pornographic material. And consequently, in a situation where it can be said that it was not the voluntary act of the person in reading the pornographic material, but the material was forced upon him against his will, in that limited situation, which doesn't come up very often, then I would consider that within the category of action which could be regulated.

There might also be a qualification as to children. I don't know much about the psychology of this, but certainly the system of freedom of expression implies a certain maturity, it implies a certain sophistication. It implies an ability to accept ideas and reject ideas, and to make up your own mind. Thus it involves a maturity which at some point I suppose a young child who is growing up doesn't have. And consequently I would not necessarily apply the same rules to children as to adults, because I think the system of freedom of expression is adult, is a very difficult system to operate, and is meant for adults, not for children. I don't mean by that to say that children have no rights under the First Amendment. I am not saying that at all. I am saying that a full fledged system of free expression in which you can look at anything, see anything, and say anything, is not necessarily one that is meant for a society that isn't mature.

Senator Thurmond. Many, many Senators, and House Members too, have received communications objecting to the publication of filthy material, obscene material, which indicates that the public is strongly opposed to that kind of material being made available to the young people and others. You don't feel that Congress would have the power to take some action to prevent material of a filthy or obscene nature from being made available to the young people and others?

Mr. Emerson. No, Senator. The mere fact that the public felt that pornographic material should be suppressed I think would not permit Congress to suppress it if that violated the Constitution. And I think it would. In fact, the Constitution and the Bill of Rights are intended to a very substantial extent to be for the protection of a minority against the majority. So that the mere fact that there would be a majority vote in favor of a certain action would not permit the Government to take that action if it would violate the Constitution.

Now, I recognize the significance of the public feeling about pornography. But I think that problem is best met by trying to convince the public that it is the right of any individual to read pornography if he wants to, but that it should not be forced upon him. The public view is not that the pornography will harm them, the public view is that pornography will harm other people. I don't think that is a sound position. I think we could convince them that if anyone wants to read pornography in his home, for instance, the Government has no business interfering with that. And the controls, therefore, should be confined to situations where pornography is forced upon one's perception against one's will.

Senator Thurmond. Do you feel that Congress could pass a law to prevent the sale of it to minors?

Mr. Emerson. If that could be done without also preventing the sale of materials to adults, then I think it could be argued that Congress could. As I say, I consider the rule as to children to be different, and it could be argued—and I am not really passing an opinion one way or another about children, because I have never gone into this adequately—but it could be argued that you could limit it as to children. But the problem there, Senator, is that it is almost impossible to curtail or punish the distribution of pornographic material only with respect to children. The restriction would inevitably spread over and prevent general distribution, or else it is ineffective. So that as a practical matter I am not sure that is the solution.

Senator Thurmond. If a man should be prosecuted for selling materials in a community in violation of the law, and a jury of that community acts on the matter, as they have in many cases, you don't feel that such a law as that should be sustained?

Mr. Emerson. No. The basic principle here is a constitutional one, Senator, it is not a question for the jury to decide. It is not a question for the majority to decide. It is a question of the application of the constitutional principle that expression should be free. And pornography may be some people's kind of expression and not other people's kind of expression. The whole history of the first amendment, I think, has shown that you can't cut off one kind of expression and not another. The suppression of pornography as it works out is actually very much of a class matter. High class pornography is art, and is protected. And low class pornography is pornography and is not protected. But the Government shouldn't be making judgments of that kind, even though a jury might feel it was wrong.

Senator Thurmond. Of course lawyers and judges in this country differ a great deal on this question.

Thank you very much.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Ervin. As a matter of fact, the courts originally held that the First Amendment didn't protect obscenity at all, didn't they?

Mr. Emerson. Yes, the original holding was that obscenity simply was exempt—they didn't put it in those words, but they said it was not expression and not protected. But I think the court has moved from that position.

Senator Ervin. Its present position is an illustration, it seems to me, of the thesis that Dr. Levy expressed, that the words of the First Amendment are susceptible to interpretation which goes beyond what the original objectives of those who phrased it were. And beginning with the Roth case, I think in 1958, we have had a series of new decisions dealing with the question of pornography. And I am glad Senator Thurmond asked some questions about it, because that is another area of this field that troubles me. The courts have held in respect to matters that are considered seditious that while the Government can't punish or prohibit expression, that it can punish the advocacy of action to make ideas effective. It seems to me that there might be some room for the application of that principle to pornography. If pornography, for example, is presented in such a fashion that, as an example, amounts to urging a man to go out and commit rape, or to go out and commit fornication and adultery, which are crimes, would it be possible for the Government to reach that on the theory that it has ceased to be expression and has become action.

Mr. Emerson. I don't think so, Senator. In the first place, I think the evidence indicates perhaps the opposite, that pornography tends to make it less likely that a person would go out and commit action. But even if it were so, I don't see how one can avoid the conclusion that pornography is expression.

Now, the Supreme Court has never been able to define what pornography is. And none of its attempts——

Senator Ervin. One of the judges said he couldn't define hard pornography, but he knew what it was when he saw it.

Mr. Emerson. Well, that is the best definition that has been advanced so far. But that isn't much of a definition, because if the material is a hundred years old, then it is historical, and it is permissible. If it is in good taste, it is permissible as a work of art. If it is scientific, it is permissible for that reason. So really only one kind of appeal to erotic interests is punished as pornographic. And that is a discrimination against those people who like that kind of expression. The only sensible rule for the Supreme Court to take is my rule, that pornography is expression, and permissible, except insofar as it is forced down somebody's throat. And at that point it becomes action, and could be regulated.

Senator Ervin. Is this correct? Your position is that even if such material has any effect on the individual who reads it or observes it, that the material merely engendered lascivious ideas in his mind but does not spur him to action?

Mr. Emerson. The effect cannot be the test—that is right, Senator—because all ideas have an effect, otherwise there would be no point in trying to persuade someone of something. That is the whole point about expression, that it does attempt to persuade one to take action, and it has the great advantage that one can sort of try out in advance this course of action or that course of action without committing himself. And one can have a conflict between this course of action and that course of action in a public forum without having to engage in violence to settle the issue. But one cannot draw a line on the basis that expression has no effect on people. It certainly does, and was intended to. And any theory must accept that fact and operate on that basis.

Senator Ervin. Any ideas whether they are good or whether they are bad have some effect, do they not?

Mr. Emerson. The fact that an idea is good or bad is for this purpose irrelevant. As Dr. Levy said, many ideas that have been considered very bad have turned out to be good. And even if an idea is bad, it is a good thing to have people arguing against it. And even if there is nothing to be said for it whatever discussion of it arouses in the community an understanding of what should be the proper solution. So that even bad ideas make their contribution. That is the basic theory on which the amendment is framed.

Senator Ervin. There is just one other matter that I haven't alluded to but about which I think you made a very cogent statement and that is that there should be no more prior restraint allowed against partial publication than there is against complete publication. This is based on the fact that all publication is designed to enable the public ultimately to know the truth, and that a partial publication conceals or withholds a part of the truth, making it more difficult for the public to reach the true conclusion, is that correct?

Mr. Emerson. Yes, that is correct, that one doesn't know the truth unless one has all the facts at one's disposal; one cannot make as good a judgment on the basis of partial facts, yes.

Senator Ervin. For that reason a partial prior restraint is ultimately as injurious to the public interest as a total prior restraint?

Mr. Emerson. Yes, that is right, Senator. And also a partial prior restraint becomes a full prior restraint while you are trying to figure out whether the Government can impose a partial restraint. That is, if you have a rule that prior restraint can be imposed, if there is a likelihood of a grave injury to national security, then the very process of finding out whether or not the publication is going to do that means that it is held up while it goes through court. And the Government then makes the decision as to whether it can be published. So that a partial prior restraint becomes in effect a full prior restraint.

Senator Ervin. When I first learned of the decision, as they call it—there are nine separate opinions, in the Times case and the Post case—I welcomed it. But when I read all of the opinions I was left with some very substantial misgivings, because some of those opinions intimated to me that perhaps some of the judges did favor prior restraint. This indicates to me the possibility of future court decisions sustaining a prior restraint on publication. I would be glad to have any comments you might care to make on that.

Mr. Emerson. I would agree with you, Senator. I think there are only three of the Justices whose opinions indicated that they would reject any kind of restraint as illegal, or would consider it only in narrow and precise circumstances. The other Justices indicated that the rule was that some prior restraint could be used, that under some circumstances a newspaper could be enjoined. Now, as I say, that seems to me wrong on two grounds. One, on the matter of principle, that under no circumstances should publication be enjoined. And the second is that you cannot apply that rule, as I just said, without actually instituting a system of prior restraint, because the very effort to apply a partial prior restraint means that for a certain period of time, the period of time during which the Court is acting on the question, there is a prior restraint. So that the only rule that is consistent with the First Amendment idea, that prior restraint was totally abolished by the First Amendment, is a rule of no prior restraint under any circumstances.

Senator Ervin. Thank you very much. We are very grateful to you for helping us understand those issues.

Senator Hruska will introduce the next witness.

Senator Hruska. Mr. Chairman, the next witness is Harold Andersen, president of the World Publishing Co. which publishes the Omaha World-Herald. The World-Herald is Nebraska's only statewide daily paper with a circulation of more than 250,000.

Prior to his elevation to that post 5 years ago, Mr. Andersen had spent 6 years in general management positions with the newspaper.

Of more importance to our considerations today, however, is the fact that Mr. Andersen is a veteran newsman with 13 years of experience in a variety of news capacities.

My own acquaintance with him goes back to 1946 when he was doing a most enviable job of covering city and county government in Omaha.

Omaha is the county seat of Douglas County. And at that time I was both the source of his information and the source of some of his news service, because I was the chairman of the Douglas County commission.

He later served as head of the World-Herald's state capitol bureau in Lincoln.

Mr. Andersen is a director of the American Newspaper Publishers Association and a trustee of its foundation.

We welcome you here, Mr. Andersen.

Senator Ervin. We are delighted to have you. Thank you for your willingness to come and give the committee the benefit of your observations in a field in which you have had such experience.

STATEMENT OF HAROLD ANDERSEN, PRESIDENT, OMAHA WORLD-HERALD, OMAHA, NEBRASKA

Mr. Andersen. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And thank you, Senator Hruska, for that gracious introduction.

Our acquaintance does indeed go back a good many years. And it has been one of great respect and admiration on my part over those years.

I was pleased to see Senator Hruska move from his important job on the Douglas County board to an even more important position in the House and then the U.S. Senate.

Senator Ervin. He has rendered magnificent services for his country in the U.S. Senate.

Mr. Andersen. I commend this committee for addressing itself to this extremely important subject and I appreciate the opportunity to testify.

I will try not to repeat a good many of the things which have been said by previous witnesses from the news media. I will instead try to point out where I might differ and where I would place stronger emphasis.

I would, for example, place stronger emphasis on the responsibilities of the news media. Senator Hruska very properly pointed out, in his statement during the first week of these hearings, that among the most crucial issues of the day are the rights and responsibilities of the press.

Freedom of the press is not a newspaper's right, really, but the people's right to know, to be accurately informed. We are guardians of that right—and this is a very heavy responsibility indeed.

On the whole, the Nation's newspapers do an admirable job of fulfilling the obligations which go with our First Amendment protections. But to do a better job should be our constant objective. These hearings, I think, should encourage us in our efforts to do that better job.

At the start of these hearings, both Senator Ervin and Senator Hruska indicated their feeling that the First Amendment should not be used as a shield against valid criticism of the news media. I wholeheartedly concur in that viewpoint.

Good newspapers—that is, the great majority of the Nation's newspaper—are consistent self critics. We regularly examine our own performance and work to improve it.

When we are so committed to the principle of critical self appraisal, why should we bridle at critical appraisal from the outside? We should welcome such criticism and respond to it in a positive way.

I believe that, happily, relatively few of the Nation's news media are unduly sensitive to criticism. (Perhaps I should add that while few in number, some of these thin-skinned newsmen are quite loud of voice.) Most of us know that if we are to dish it out, we should also be prepared to take it.

Speaking of criticism, let me say I reject the conspiracy theory—you know—the allegation that the Nixon administration is trying to intimidate the news media by a calculated campaign of criticism and thinly-veiled threats. Hogwash.

Let me illustrate.

Assistant Secretary of Defense Daniel Henkin is a highly-placed member of the Nixon administration. Mr. Henkin and his associates had, in my opinion, a very legitimate complaint against the distortions and slanting in the CBS program, "The Selling of the Pentagon." But when it came to the issue of whether CBS should be subpenaed by a congressional committee to produce certain materials connected with the program, Mr. Henkin sided with CBS. Just as the Pentagon is not for sale, he said, "not for sale either is the right of a free press to criticize the Pentagon."

Now there is a real conspirator for you! If Mr. Henkin is supposed to be part of an administration plot to muzzle hostile newsmen, someone at the White House, had better fill him in on the game plan.

Speaking still of criticism, let me say I feel that some of Vice President Agnew's criticisms of the media have been justified. I fail to understand the almost hysterical reaction to those criticisms in some quarters.

So far as I know, Mr. Agnew hasn't dismantled a single TV network or cost a single TV commentator his job. And at last report the New York Times was still publishing daily.

As for intimidation, any news medium that is intimidated by criticism—from the Vice President of the United States or anyone else—was a pretty timid news medium to begin with and doesn't merit much sympathy, in my opinion.

Speaking of "The Selling of the Pentagon," as I was earlier, our newspaper commented in an editorial entitled, "The Smearing of the Pentagon," but we joined other newspapers in editorially opposing the effort to subpena CBS officials. In this case, you might say, some of us were defending CBS's right to be wrong.

I agree with an earlier witness, Walter Cronkite, who, while confessing imperfections, said: "How could we be improved by outside monitors without destroying the independence which is so essential to a free press?"

Now as to the specific issue of whether first amendment guarantees apply to radio and TV:

An earlier witness told this committee that he has no doubt whatsoever that those wise Founding Fathers intended to describe all means of communicating ideas when they assured "freedom of the press."

I must confess that my ability to divine other people's intentions does not go back beyond the grave. It certainly doesn't reach back 180 years. But I have serious reservations about the proposition that a heavily regulated, licensed industry like broadcasting has automatically and inevitably the same First Amendment protections afforded the Nation's newspapers.

Certainly our courts have taken a contrary view in a number of significant cases. It is possible, of course, that future court decisions will throw a different light on this matter. But court decisions to date in a number of cases have cast serious doubt on the ultimate application of first amendment guarantees to the electronic media.

So much for the constitutional issue. As a matter of public policy, I think a case might well be made for some kind of legislative emancipation for at least the news and public affairs operations of the broadcast media. Call it an electronic bill of rights or whatever, some kind of legislative relief may well be in order.

As to the Pearson bill pending before this committee:

The intent is certainly laudable, and we are grateful to Senator Pearson for helping bring this problem into congressional focus. But the subpena issue is pending in three cases before the Supreme Court. I join other witnesses who have suggested action be deferred until the Supreme Court has ruled.

In passing, I might say I see no reason for the special consideration which S. 1311 would give to the proceedings of Federal grand juries.

As to publication of the Pentagon papers and prior restraint:

I think a potentially very dangerous precedent was established when the United States Government took the step of attempting to establish prior restraint. Ours was among the newspapers which questioned the judgment of the New York Times and other newspapers which published the Pentagon papers. But I certainly defend the right of these papers to make that judgment and take the consequences—to publish at their peril.

It seems to me that the danger of abuse by publication in such cases is much less than the danger of censorship or prior restraint.

An earlier witness, Representative Reid, has suggested the need for legislation forbidding prior restraint.

I am not sure that legislation is needed, but I suggest the subject certainly is a proper one for most careful consideration by this committee.

Incidentally, I think the least defensible performance in this whole matter of the Pentagon papers was not so much publication, or overzealous classification of documents, but the Government's failure to maintain security and some semblance of control over documents that were classified.

If the papers were as sensitive as the Government alleged, handling of them by the responsible agencies was incredibly slipshod, in my opinion.

I certainly do not agree with those critics who say that the press has virtually no restraints upon it, that it is above the law, and therefore some kind of regulatory curbs are needed.

Libel laws, contempt citations, criminal action if criminal violations are involved—we face all of these potentially restraining influences. We do indeed publish at our legal peril.

But, ultimately, the most effective safeguards against abuses are not legal restraints. They are the press' own sense of professionalism and responsibility and, finally, public approval or disapproval—the public's right to stop reading us.

Mr. Chairman, in your letter inviting me to testify, you said: "We will be seeking to create a better appreciation of the First Amendment's purpose and its crucial importance to a free society."

I am pleased and proud to have had the opportunity to join with you and your associates in your effort to advance that vital objective —better understanding of the first amendment and its crucial importance.

Thank you.

Senator Ervin. I want to commend you for the frankness of your statement.

I take it from your statement that you agree with me that the First Amendment extends its freedoms to all people within the borders of our country regardless of whether they are wise or foolish, whether they are profound or shallow, whether they are devout or ungodly, and whether they love our country and its institutions or hate them.

Mr. Andersen. Indeed I would agree with that, Senator.

Senator Ervin. And you express the opinion that you are very doubtful as to whether any legislation is needed in this field.

Mr. Andersen. Yes. I do have reservations. We have fared pretty well to date without specific legislation, and I think that perhaps we can continue to fare well.

Senator Ervin. You expressed an opinion with respect to the proposed bill to create a new confidential relationship between newsmen and their sources, that it would be better to wait until the three cases that are now pending for hearing in the Supreme Court are decided.

Mr. Andersen. Yes, sir.

Senator Ervin. I am inclined—I have not made a final decision on the subject—to agree with you that perhaps the First Amendment itself may afford a far better protection in this field than anything that Congress can write.

Mr. Andersen. I think that may well prove to be the case.

Senator Ervin. In other words, Congress can undoubtedly pass laws which further the purposes of the First Amendment, and it cannot pass laws which retard those purposes. There is always danger in a legislative act which retards rather than advances.

Mr. Andersen. Even if the intention is to the contrary.

Senator Ervin. I am sure you are familiar with the opinion of the appeals court in the Caldwell case, which is one of the cases pending before the Supreme Court.

That opinion, in my judgment, recognizes that society has many interests, and that sometimes one of its interests comes into conflict with another of its interests, and must be reconciled. In the Caldwell case the interest of society in having the public informed came into conflict with the interest of society in enforcing the law.

I hope you agree with me that the court did a pretty good job of reconciling these two conflicting interests. They held that under the peculiar facts of that case the reporter could not be compelled to go before a grand jury to testify since there was no overriding necessity for a government to have his personal testimony. The government could obtain the information from other sources.

Mr. Andersen. Yes, sir. As you know, there are some who say that the Caldwell decision didn't go far enough, and that we should have the absolutely unqualified right not to testify. I think the circuit court of appeals did a good job of distinguishing when it would be appropriate to allow newsmen to be subpenaed and when it would not be appropriate.

Senator Ervin. I certainly agree with you. and I would be inclined to think that if the Supreme Court goes along with the substance of that decision, there is no need for legislation in that field.

Mr. Andersen. I think so too.

Senator Ervin. I am intrigued by your comments regarding Vice President Agnew's statements. I had some students from Yale University who came to see me about a year ago to discuss the Vietnam war. They were very much offended by the Vice President's remarks and did not like the kind of speeches he was making. I pointed out to them that they all had been exercising their right of freedom of speech quite freely during our meeting for at least an hour and a half to 2 hours, and that I believed Vice President Agnew had just as much right to freedom of speech as they had. I will defend their right of freedom of speech as well as the Vice President's right of freedom of speech.

As I stated in my opening statement I do not think that every criticism of the press by any public figure is an attack on the first amendment. And I think it is essential to good government in this country that any public official has the right to speak out. My criticism of most public officials is that some of them have more discretion than valor, and don't come out and speak as frankly or freely on public issues as they should.

Mr. Andersen. I think it is unfortunately true in the whole area of public discussion and controversy in our country today that many people seem to almost automatically ascribe ulterior motives to their critics or to people on the other side of the issues. It seems to me that there is a possibility that those critics or those on the other side may be right or may have as good motives as we do. I don't say that Vice President Agnew has been right on every utterance, but I am not one of those who would allege that he doesn't believe in the freedom of the press.

Senator Ervin. I am impressed by another one of your observations, and that is that people have the right to be wrong. That is the whole concept, I think, that underlies freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and all other freedoms. If a man doesn't have the right to be foolish as well as wise, he really doesn't have any freedom at all.

I also want to commend you for emphasizing the fact that the press not only has rights, but it has responsibilities. I think if there is any one tendency in our Nation today that should be decried it is that we lay too much stress on rights and too little stress on responsibilities.

Mr. Andersen. I would agree with that.

Senator Ervin. Is it your feeling also that the best way to get the press to discharge its responsibilities properly is to leave the press free?

Mr. Andersen. Yes, sir.

Senator Hruska. Along that same line, Mr. Andersen, this portion of your statement is very interesting. "Freedom of the press is not a newspaper's right, really, but the people's right to know, to be accurately informed."

After all, the freedom of the press isn't exercised only for the gesture that it constitutes. Whatever press there is, the object of the press is to inform people and to have an impact on people. So we have to go that step further. The freedom of the press is only an instrumentality by which the people may be informed. Isn't that the thrust of that statement that you made?

Mr. Andersen. It is. And this makes it therefore all the more important that we think of our responsibilities, because we are in this respect representing all the people, and the responsibility is therefore all the heavier on us.

Senator Hruska. You reject this conspiracy theory which some people hold that the Nixon administration is trying to intimidate the news media by a calculated campaign of criticism and thinly veiled threats.

One of the witnesses, however, suggested that there was a difference as to who might do the criticizing, not so much in the press as it would be in radio and TV. And it is outside criticism of the press. Sometimes it is the substance of the criticism, and sometimes it is the identity of the person who makes it. Certainly if the Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission were heard to say that it was well to remind the holders of licenses that they do place their licenses in jeopardy if they don't perform properly, that is one set of criticisms. On the other hand, if some person without the power that a Federal Communications Commission Chairman has would make that criticism, it would be very easy to accept and to deal with. Do you see some merit to that type of situation as a basis for intimidation or unjust criticism?

Mr. Andersen. Yes; I do. It seems to me that in Mr. Agnew's case specifically, I doubt very much if he could get the FCC to lift the license of a TV station that displeased him, or that he could effectively exert influence to get a commentator or a network somehow disciplined. I don't think he could get that job done.

Senator Hruska. Thank you very much for appearing here. You have a very splendid statement, as the voice of one of the great newspapers of the Middle West.

Mr. Andersen. Thank you. It is my privilege to appear.

Senator Ervin. Thank you very much for your willingness to appear.

Counsel will call the next witness.

Senator Hruska. May I have the privilege of introducing Mr. Reutzel.

He has had a long career in Nebraska newspapering. For many years he has been associated in the publication of several weekly newspapers in my State.

For the past 10 years he has been editor of the Norfolk Daily News, a publication with a circulation of 21,000 serving the northeast part of Nebraska.

He also edits the Livestock Market Digest, a weekly publication which serves livestock interests throughout the Nation.

Mr. Reutzel is a past president of the Nebraska Press Association.

He is also a gentleman who can look at the relationship of the press and government with a balanced perspective. He spent 7 years in executive positions with the Federal Civil Defense Administration and later with the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization.

So he spent some time in Washington and in Government. But he is basically a newspaperman.

Senator Ervin. Mr. Reutzel, I am delighted to welcome you to the subcommittee, and to say on behalf of the subcommittee that we deeply appreciate your willingness to appear and give us your observations on what I consider one of the most important aspects of our national life.

STATEMENT OF EMIL REUTZEL, JR., EDITOR, NORFOLK, NEBRASKA, DAILY NEWS

Mr. Reutzel. Mr. Chairman, your invitation to appear before this subcommittee and present opinions on matters concerning the guarantees contained in the First Amendment, the performance of the press and its relationship to government and the legal system is very much appreciated.

There is much to criticize about the news media today; much about government. The problem is to apply ourselves to doing this freely and in constructive ways that will create a better informed public, and not try to outline new rules which seek to attain an ideal relationship between the press and the government that cannot exist and should not.

Reference is made by both representatives of the press and of government at every level to the deterioration of relationships between these two vital elements of society.

I wonder if the relationship has not been characterized as deteriorating since the Continental Congress?

For the public's benefit, they must retain an arm's length relationship. There is inherent conflict because the press must be watchful of what government does.

There can be nothing but informal ground rules about disclosure of confidential information on the part of a free press; no firm guarantees and no prior restraints. The press cannot be guaranteed that it will have access to all information at all times, because confidentiality needs to exist between a President and his close advisers, for instance; between a Senate committee and its informants: between a newspaper and its sources of information. The job of the press under such circumstances is to keep digging.

It is helpful to have the duty of the press to dig and probe acknowledged and reaffirmed in Washington as in city hall, whatever the embarrassment caused. It is also helpful to acknowledge the duty of government's officials occasionally to criticize this performance, just as readers ought to, without overdrawn charges about repression.

Freedom of the press and freedom of speech have been well served in America for nearly 200 years because the first amendment protection was simply stated and, for the most part, wisely interpreted. This makes me doubtful of the merit of prescribing in new law that a newsman shall be protected and provided certain formal legal privileges against the disclosure of confidential information and the sources of that information.

The extent of this problem ought to be clearer after the Supreme Court's rulings this session in Caldwell v. US and Branzburg v. Pound. Especially is this so when the broad exceptions suggested in S. 1311 are included. For instance, the validity of a privilege claim could remain subject to determination by a U.S. district court, which would subject the newsman to legal formalities even if he was then sustained in his nondisclosure claims. The protection for the newsman would not be absolute, nor do I believe it should be.

A related matter of vast importance—the free press-fair trial issue—has thus far been satisfactorily dealt with by the voluntary adoption of guidelines in some cases, by commonsense practices in others.

The latter includes recognition that it is the retention of a fair-minded juror—one who can close his mind to what has gone before and judge the merits of a case solely on presentations in the court—which guarantees a fair trial. Under that condition—and no less than fair-minded jurors should be accepted in the legal process—pretrial publicity is relegated to its rightfully minor place as an influence of jurymen.

In these days of increasing activism and involvement among some elements of the press, it will be more tempting to require a reporter's testimony, the revelation of his sources and information. But, hopefully, this along with excesses of interpretive reporting, is a passing phenomenon, and objectivity will continue to be served with increasing diligence as has been the case in the past. The danger here from journalism's standpoint is that its activists might become so involved as to prejudice inherent rights now recognized, for the most part informally, to keep confidences and protect sources. The argument on the issue centers not so much on a journalist's right to do so in most cases as on the matters that should be exceptions. The era of the activist will pass just as the era of the circulation-building muckrakers did.

Despite the reams of publicity given to Daniel Ellsberg and the Pentagon papers, that according Vice President Agnew's comments about the objectivity of the media and those who suggest they have been repressed because he has criticized their performance, to the issue of fair trial and its supposed conflict with the rights and responsibilities of a free press, to the rights of newsmen to maintain a privileged relationship with their sources, the greatest danger in existence today to the principles contained so briefly and eloquently in the first amendment is in another area. It is the attempt on the part of the Government, through the Federal Communications Commission, to impose special judgment on radio and television.

Both of these media are capable of influence in ways which the writers of the Constitution could not have envisioned when they set forth the doctrine on the press and on speech. They could not have been aware of the instant communications available to the press and to all media, either; to the use of photographs or the detailed reporting of events of all kinds. Yet the doctrine has proved of inestimable value to the newspapers, to magazines and to all forms of the printed press. Vast amounts of information have been produced—most of it factual, some conjecture, portions of it, unfortunately, fiction and damaging publicity. But the net effect has been good service—and constantly improving service—to a well informed, free society which the press has had a great part in molding.

But when the Government took leave of its licensing powers for the media and determined that someone should go a step further and determine if the licensees were presenting things "fairly," then at that instant it began to encroach upon freedom of the press and of speech in a literal sense.

It was for a good purpose, of course. Who doesn't want fairness? Who has insured it in the newspapers?

Readers and critics have, because there have been competing sources for the news; because the excesses of a prejudiced reporter and an unprincipled editor or publisher will generally reveal themselves. But those unworthy people are so few in number and so lacking in sustained influence in a free society as to be of no danger. Certainly they cannot be dealt within any way through law unless their activities are criminal in nature or become libelous.

If on subscribes to some of Mr. Agnew's criticism of the media—as I do—and admits that Edith Efron might have a small point with her word count on bias in political coverage of the television networks, does it follow that the solution is in a better administration of the fairness doctrine and equal time rulings?

Not at all. These things have already been in existence long enough to prove their worthlessness. The time has come to tell the broadcasters they are on their own; to tell the people, too, who are apt to become more healthily skeptical because they would then know that a broadcaster would be bound only by his conscience about "fairness." He would not mechanically be meeting guidelines to please an agency of the government which can only do as Edith Efron did, and count words or time.

Summing up one editor's views on the free press matter: The less enactments the better, including those which would dictate to candidates how much they can spend on advertising and the rates that can be paid. Proof of the worth of this hands-off approach can be found in an economically independent and thriving press which assures that the News and the Mail will be able to confront the Times and the Post with what are believed to be errors in fact-gathering and in treatment of the news.

Similarly, without fear of equal time rulings, radio and television ought to be free to point out the errors in fact or judgments which it finds apparent, within fear of intervention by regulatory third parties. This competitive interchange is needed. It exists. It is threatened only when competitors fail to regard each other skeptically; when reporters do not do their jobs and editors fail to demand truth and fairness.

But no legislation and no licensing requirements can overcome such errors—only a press free of any but its own restraints can.

Thank you.

Senator ERVIN. You have a most excellent statement. I am glad you touched on one thing that troubles me—decisions like the one rendered in the Sheppard case in Ohio, where the Court, years after the trial, set aside a conviction and punishment on its ex post facto judgment that the press had in effect denied the defendant a fair trial.

I know that people who serve on juries are fallible human beings, like the rest of us, but I believe it is absolutely necessary for us to base the administration of justice on the theory that people who are called to serve as jurors have sufficient character and intelliegence to decide a case on the evidence that is produced in the courtroom. I question the capacity of members of the Supreme Court to take a dive, years after, into the innermost recesses of a juror's mind and determine that he had been influenced by publications in the newspaper which the juror in fact may never have read.

Mr. REUTZEL. I certainly agree with you.

Senator ERVIN. Judges in most cases where there is great deal of publicity, based on my observation in many trials, always go into this question very thoroughly with those who are called to serve on the jury before they accept those persons as jurors.

And of course I think it is all right to set aside testimony which shows positively that a juror was influenced by something other than the evidence in the case.

But despite the great knowledge of Supreme Court justices, I just think they are mentally incapable of diving into the innermost recesses of the minds of other men who have served on juries 8 or 9 or 10 years after the case was tried and deciding that these people were influenced by something other than the evidence.

I don't know any way than for people to go in and seek justice on the procedures already there. So I think that setting aside the verdict and punishment years after the trial, I think a remedy like that is like using an atom bomb to getting rid of what you might suspect you are mistaken about.

I am much intrigued with your views, which coincide with those expressed by some of the broadcasters, that the First Amendment freedoms were intended to cover all media of communications, including those which are not in existence at the time the first amendment was written. Therefore, the best way to deal with this subject is to ultimately depend upon self regulation—self restraint on the part of those who exercise the right to inform the public through any media.

Mr. Reutzel. I think they should be really turned free, Mr. Chairman. And I hesitate to think what would be done today to write an amendment protecting the freedom of speech and the press knowing about television and radio broadcasting.

I have the tendency to think it would be made so hopelessly complicated that we would need a much vaster legal system to try all the cases. I simply think that the first amendment protection should cover it, and I think it does cover it, but it has not been made to apply in this way. We should not allow licensing procedures to influence judgment in this field.

Senator Ervin. You believe as I do that there is always danger in attempting to regulate freedoms, and that for some reason people who exercise governmental authority as regulators are always subject to the temptation to over regulate, are they not?

Mr. Reutzel. The temptation has not been passed up.

Senator Ervin. Your position is that you want a very minimum of regulation to ensure individuals their rights of freedom of speech and the right to be informed?

Mr. Reutzel. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Ervin. I want to commend you for the excellence of your statement, with which I find myself in much agreement.

Mr. Reutzel. Thank you, sir.

Senator Ervin. Senator Hruska.

Senator Hruska. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I join you in expressing commendation to this witness for the common sense of the prairie which asserts itself in the pages of his testimony.

He comes from an area that is quite typical of midwestern American, where the number of people is small and where the number of square miles is relatively numerous. And yet it is that type of environment which does generate a lot of independence and a lot of vigor which are worthy attributes to anyone, especially in the newspaper field.

In your statement, Mr. Reutzel, you indicated that you had grave doubts about the merit of prescribing a new law that a newspaperman should be protected and provided certain formal legal privileges against the disclosure of confidential information and the sources of that information. And at another part in your statement you say, there can be nothing but informal ground rules about disclosure of confidential information on the part of a free press. And of course you point properly to the history of the free press in the last 200 years to back up those conclusions and those statements. Now, part of the self criticism of news media undoubtedly involves the examination into the sources of information and its means of procurement. Could we have your thoughts on how you would handle information coming into your possession in the form of documents which you knew to be stolen, and improperly so.

Mr. REUTZEL. In the remote chance that a newspaper in our category received documents, we would judge simply by the nature of the documents themselves about disclosure. And we might in some instances feel that it warrented going directly to the authorities and prosecuting the individual who had the document.

I don't think we need to be afforded any special protection. If we don't want to disclose the source, then the reason is urgent enough for us to take whatever punishment there may be because of this refusal. And there can be a deep sense of dedication, perhaps. But simply to give us blanket authority to be protected against disclosure I don't think is warranted.

I wouldn't know how to relate what we would do about the documents—if they were stolen—what we would do with them without knowing what they contained.

Senator HRUSKA. The nature of the documents, and whether they infringe upon national security, for example, would that enter into the picture.

Mr. REUTZEL. Certainly it would.

And we might feel so deeply involved with such an issue that we would publish them and publish the sources of the information, or we might conclude that the information they contain can be paraphrased without revealing the sources, which is and has been possible in the past in many revelations of confidential information—simply not describing the source. So there are many ways that those things can be handled.

Senator HRUSKA. Thank you very much. Again I want to commend you for your statement and its substance, and the trouble that you have taken to come all the way from Nebraska to Washington to testify before our subcommittee.

Mr. REUTZEL. Thank you.

Senator ERVIN. On the point Senator Hruska raised, you say that a lot of these problems can be solved in an informal fashion. Now, normally a newspaperman is not an eyewitness to the events that he describes, especially where it involves crime, although there may be exceptions.

So most of the information he gets is hearsay information, which would not be admissible in a court of law, because it is not information of which he has personal knowledge having come to him through the information given him by others. Is it your belief that a newspaperman, for example, who receives information about crime having been committed might feel that he has some obligation to go to law enforcement officials and tell them what he knows in an informal fashion, and that normally it is unwise for law enforcement officials to summon a newspaperman to go before a grand jury when the only information he has about the investigation is hearsay evidence derived from other people whose credibility he knows very little about. Isn't this an area where the interests of society as well as the interests of free press can be reconciled by some kind of informal relationship between the press and the law enforcement offices?

Mr. REUTZEL. I think there exists today, really, an informal relationship between police authorities, for instance, and knowledgeable reporters who use their judgment in such matters. And I think this works as well as we can have anything work in a free society.

If we start to prescribe by law that the newsman shall be in a protected category, then I think we have made a mistake and we are attempting to define a relationship that can't be defined and obtain basically a free press.

Senator ERVIN. Certainly if you go into defining it you would include testimony about all sources of information, including a source of information which may have not seen the crime committed, which would be a great blow to the administration of justice.

Mr. REUTZEL. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. Thank you very much. I commend you on the excellence of the statement.

The subcommittee will stand in recess until 10 o'clock tomorrow.

And we will meet in 2228.

(Whereupon, at 1:30 p.m., the committee was adjourned to reconvene at 10 a.m., Thursday, October 14, 1971, in room 2228.)

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 14, 1971

U.S. Senate,
Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights of the
Committee on the Judiciary,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to recess, at 10 a.m., in room 2228, New Senate Office Building, Senator Sam J. Ervin, Jr. (chairman of the subcommittee) presiding.

Present: Senator Ervin.

Also present: Lawrence M. Baskir, chief counsel; Bill Pursley, counsel; and Stanley Ebner, minority counsel.

Senator Ervin. The subcommittee will come to order.

Counsel will call the first witness.

Mr. Baskir. Mr. Chairman, our first witness this morning is Mr. Elmer Lower, president of ABC news.

Senator Ervin. I am delighted to welcome you to this subcommittee. I wish to express to you the appreciation of the subcommittee for your willingness to appear and give us the benefit of your views in a field in which you have had much practical experience.

STATEMENT OF ELMER W. LOWER, PRESIDENT, ABC NEWS, AMERICAN BROADCASTING CO.

Mr. Lower. Thank you very much, Senator.

My name is Elmer W. Lower, vice president of American Broadcasting Co. and president of the ABC news department. We in the news profession owe a debt of gratitude to Senator Ervin as chairman and to the other members of this subcommittee for their foresight and concern in initiating and conducting this inquiry into the state of freedom of the press in America, and I am personally grateful for the opportunity to be present today to give you my views.

Before addressing myself to some particular dangers to freedom of the press which I have seen emerge in recent years, I would like to make some general observations.

The American system of government was founded upon a predominantly agrarian and homogeneous society. In the early days of the Republic, participatory democracy was a reality. Individuals could have a very direct impact on the decisions of government which affected their lives.

Today, America is a huge, highly complex, predominantly urban society. We are all aware of the feeling of frustration among millions of people who believe that our government today is distant and impersonal and indifferent to their needs and interests. President Nixon, in his state of the Union address this year, called for a new American revolution in which Americans would have a new chance to participate in their government.

Participation in government depends upon an informed public. An informed public requires a free press, a press free to ascertain what government does, and to explain, to evaluate and to criticize. Today we find cynicism about the press among minority groups and the youth in America. They see the press as the handmaiden of a monolithic establishment, reporting only what the establishment wants people to see and hear, incapable of telling it like it is. This mistrust of the press engenders a feeling of hopelessness, which raises the potential for violence in our society. Any attempt by the Government to intrude upon the editorial prerogative of the press contributes to this mistrust, to the view that the press is controlled by the vested interests.

We in broadcast journalism are keenly aware of this mistrust. The minority groups and the young people have not been reticent to criticize us. We have heard the criticism and we are emboldened by it to increase our vigilance as the eyes and the ears of the people in relation to their government.

We have also heard the criticism from many Americans who believe that we have been too responsive to dissent, that we have given too much exposure to the critics of American society, that we have contributed to a too-rapid, too-chaotic whirlwind of social change. Although I have not seen empirical data on the effects of broadcast journalism on social change, I have no doubt that radio and television have accelerated the pace of change. The term "future shock" applies to ideas as well as technology. The fact that we transmit the words, the pictures and the ideas that set in motion social change enhances our responsibility, but it does not alter the job of journalism. Our job is, and remains, to report what we see and hear as accurately, objectively, and fairly as we know how.

There are those who believe that because of the impact of television, television journalism should be controlled by the Government. I draw quite the opposite conclusion. It is precisely because television is the medium that most Americans turn to for most of their news that broadcast journalism must enjoy the fullest freedom from Government interference.

I am not one of those who thinks that the Founding Fathers meant by freedom of the press that only the machines—the hardware—which print words were to be free. Just as our Constitution has been construed as a flexible, organic document and has grown with our Nation, so must freedom of the press grow to meet the electronic revolution.

Freedom of the press does not mean that broadcasters should be immune from criticism. Quite the contrary. We recognize the need for criticism and the need for constant self-analysis. If we did not hear criticism, the silence would be a sure sign that we were not doing our job, that we were avoiding controversy. Controversy is the stuff of the social process and journalists are dutybound to report it, and to report it fairly. We journalists, by our very choice of profession, have a commitment to fairness. Even if fairness were not FCC doctrine, it would be my personal doctrine—and I would implement it at ABC News. Fairness does not mean sitting down with a stopwatch and balancing newscasts on a minute-by-minute basis. It does not mean that every statement which is not incontrovertible fact must be balanced with alternative interpretation. If that were the case, television news would be run by accountants, not journalists. Fairness does mean that to cover a controversy intelligently and responsibly requires that the major contending viewpoints be aired.

Fairness does not mean that the Government, whether the FCC, Congress or the courts, has the right to substitute its editorial judgment for that of the broadcaster. If broadcast journalism is to be free, it must be free to criticize Government. It cannot be free if Government reserves the power to penalize the broadcaster for the way he reports the news. Even if the broadcaster's editorial judgment were wrong, the remedy—Government interference—is far worse than the disease.

It is the prospect of Government interference into editorial judgment which disturbs me most about the recent controversy concerning "The Selling of the Pentagon." The use of the congressional subpena power to compel production of untelevised material is the first specific danger to freedom of the press which I would like to discuss.

I do not question the motives of the Congressmen who investigated "The Selling of the Pentagon." In fact, I am sure they were sincere in their convictions. I do question the wisdom of Government investigating journalistic efforts which criticize Government. If journalists were required time and again to troop down to Washington, lawyers in tow, to justify news reports and editorial judgments, I could envision a process by which fear and excessive caution would enter the news gathering process. The reporter would tend not to report unless he could back it up with affidavits at some future congressional inquiry.

The plain fact is that the journalist and newsmakers, whether they be administration officials, Congressmen, critics or whomever, are adversaries in a very real sense. The newsmaker may be a salesman for a viewpoint. The journalist is trained to strip away sales talk and report the facts as he sees them, not necessarily as the newsmaker would like them to be reported. The journalist is the guardian of the public's right to a free flow of information. It is the public that suffers if the congressional subpena becomes a condition to exercising freedom of the press.

We recognize that the First Amendment was not designed to create a privileged profession of writers and speakers. It was designed to insure that the public would receive the information it must have for public opinion to function intelligently. The rights of newsmen are not personal rights. They are rights held in trust to the public. We recognize the enormous responsibility of this public trust. We recognize that the information we transmit and the views we expose are the foundation on which opinions are reached and social action is predicated. Our responsibility is to report accurately and objectively and to give fair exposure to the conflicting views that contend for public support. Our responsibility is to be ever on guard that our personal bias—since we all have personal bias—does not obstruct our professional dedication to this task. My experience has been that in the vast majority of cases newsmen have been true to this responsibility. Of course, there have been and there always will be exceptions. But in my view, reliance on a free press to act responsibly is far better than reliance on an agency of Government to say what can or cannot be printed or broadcast.

A second danger to free press, related to the congressional subpena power, is the potential power of the courts if used to compel disclosure of unpublished information or sources of information.

The journalist must preserve his confidential sources of information. He relies heavily on sources and contacts who will only speak off-the-record and only under the pledge of anonymity. It is no secret that the journalist, especially the journalist who covers politics, often has to fight for information. Newsmakers in many instances like to keep the lid on embarrassing information, regardless of the public interest in disclosure. Without the confidential source, the journalist would often be relegated to reading between the lines of self-serving handouts. The confidential source also multiplies the journalist's eyes and ears. If he had to personally ferret out every story from scratch, the journalist would gather much less information. The confidential source also provides the journalist background information which is invaluable in evaluating the events he reports. Often, the source risks his job, his status, perhaps his life, if his identity is revealed. Our foreign correspondents report from many countries where the flow of information is regulated in greater or lesser degree. Confidential sources become even more crucial in reporting the news from countries where news is regulated.

If the journalist is forced to betray information obtained in confidence, whatever the immediate short-term gain for law enforcement, the long-term effect is to dry up valuable sources of information and to severely restrict the flow of information to the public. One or two instances of forced disclosure can have a snowball effect. If a source has to wonder whether a reporter will protect his identity, it does not stretch the imagination to foresee the damaging consequences to the flow of information. The source will simply cease to be a source.

There is another reason why we oppose the subpenaing of unpublished material. When outtakes are used in court to prosecute a news subject, the broadcaster becomes identified with the law. It does not matter that he is acting under court order. In the eyes of his sources, he has betrayed his objectivity and has become an arm of the law. He is not to be trusted. He is a tool of the establishment. The danger here again is a drying up of news sources. The danger is a breakdown of lines of communication to the disaffected groups in our society—members of minority groups, young people, and people from all walks of life who hold unpopular views. We at ABC News have had experience on at least one occasion when a news source told us it would not cooperate for fear that outtakes would be subpoenaed and used against it. For every source who tells us why he will not cooperate, there are I'm certain many more who don't tell us why, but who clam up out of the same fears.

Defendants in criminal actions also use the subpena power to compel unpublished information and this is equally troubling to us because it has the same effect of compromising the objectivity of the journalist. Our believability suffers when we appear to the public to be supporting or opposing an individual or a cause.

There may be limited circumstances in which the interest in the fair administration of justice outweighs the harmful effect of free press. An example would be evidence of a violent crime directly bearing on guilt or innocence which is unavailable from nonpress sources. Absent unusual circumstances such as these, we believe that the first amendment protection for untrammeled communication should prevail.

A third area of danger to free press which I would like to address myself to is the use of press credentials as a "cover" by investigators and others. We have found that this practice is widespread, and is used not only by law enforcement authorities but also by members of radical groups who use it for their own purposes to obtain access to meetings, rallies and other forums. When phony press representatives act irresponsibly, the reputation of the press suffers, and so does the believability of what we report. It becomes more difficult to gather information and more difficult to communicate it. Once the newsmaker is burned by granting access to the phony journalist, he may in the future deny access to the legitimate journalist. Any practice. such as the use of phony credentials, which undermines confidence in the medium of communication will in the long run aggravate social conflict.

Finally, I would like to comment on the limitations on free press which arise out of national security classification, a problem which was brought into focus by the Pentagon papers controversy. I will not comment on the facts of that particular case except to say that I was personally gratified by the conclusion of the Supreme Court that the unproven potential damage to national security did not justify prior restraint. The lesson to be gained from the Pentagon papers controversy is that our security classification system is in many ways antiquated and subject to abuse. A system which overclassifies as a rule and which makes no real effort at regular declassification review is inconsistent with a participatory democracy. It removes from public scrutiny and debate more than is required by national security interests. It is contemptuous of the public's right to know.

Statistics give us a good idea of the magnitude of the problem. We have been informed by an authoritative source that 125 million pages of World War II documents and 25 million pages of Korean War documents are still classified secret or higher.

It is no surprise that one widespread reaction to the Pentagon papers controversy was cynical distrust of government. In my view, this reaction was based as much on the Government attempt to prevent publication as on what the Pentagon papers had to say. After all, how many people read even part of the voluminous documents. The attempt to prevent publication confirmed the belief held by many of our citizens that the Government had something to hide, that it suppressed the truth. This belief aggravates the feelings of frustration that the President spoke about in his State of the Union address.

Most often in this country it seems that we assign priorities on the basis of the immediate, highly visible crises we confront. In the need for reform of the classification system, there is no immediate crisis. There is, however, the overriding need that the public be fully informed, consistent with national security interests, on issues as crucial as war and peace which profoundly influence their lives. I would suggest that there be a periodic review of all classified material to determine what documents do not realistically imperil national security and can therefore be removed from classified listings.

In closing, I would like to paraphrase the President, again from his State of the Union address. Let us have a government in which citizens can have confidence that not only their votes count but also their ideas count. I hope I have succeeded in communicating to you today my view that this can only be accomplished by a strong and free press and a better understanding of the role that the press plays in preserving and enhancing our freedoms.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the committee's invitation to make this statement, and I will be happy to answer any questions the committee may have.

Senator Ervin. Is it not true that the forebears of the American people suffered much at the hands of the Government in their efforts to secure freedom of thought, freedom of religion, and particularly freedom of the press, especially because of the system of licensing which existed in England after 1694?

Mr. Lower. That is correct, Senator. I believe it was a crime to publish except under license of the King.

Senator Ervin. That is correct. Do you not concede that the First Amendment was drafted to reflect the philosophy of the Founding Fathers that freedom of speech and freedom of the press were necessary to assure that the American people would be free of what I think is the worst kind of tyranny, that is, tyranny over the mind?

Mr. Lower. Yes, I do. I think it is the basis of a participatory democracy.

Senator Ervin. And your statement, I think, sets forth in very eloquent fashion the fact that the First Amendment commitment to freedom of speech and freedom of the press was made because of the realization of its drafters that freedom of speech and freedom of the press is absolutely essential to the proper functioning of the institutions which our Constitution establishes for the Government of America?

Mr. Lower. Yes, sir.

Senator Ervin. Do you not believe that the interests of good government are best served by the freest possible flow of information?

Mr. Lower. I do, sir. And I have believed that for the 38 years that I have worked in journalism.

Senator Ervin. And do you not believe that it is inducive to good government for the people to have a confidence in the truthfulness of government.

Mr. Lower. I think this is essential.

Senator Ervin. And do you not believe that that confidence is impaired by the overclassification of information and the withholding of information which really does not affect in any way national security. These tactics merely protect the security of the political fortunes of those who make mistakes and then seek by overclassification to conceal them from the people.

Mr. Lower. We have had a few examples of that in the last few years.

Senator Ervin. I was impressed with your discussion of overclassification. Senator Roth, of Delaware, has introduced a bill, which I and some other Senators have cosponsored, to establish a commission to study the whole question of classification and how it has been used for purposes other than what it was intended, to see if the commission cannot make some recommendations to Congress which would permit Congress to prescribe some sensible guidelines for what is to be classified, and some sensible guidelines as to who is to do the classifying.

Mr. Lower. Yes, sir.

Senator Ervin. Do you believe such a commission can render a real solution to this problem of overclassification?

Mr. Lower. I do. And I would like to see one set up. If it is not done on a systematic basis I don't think it will ever be done.

Senator Ervin. You stated that you disapprove of the demand of the House Commerce Committee that CBS produce some of the documents which underlay the "The Selling of the Pentagon" program, but do not question the good motives of the congressmen who made that demand. Isn't it the truth that good motives which prompt unwise actions can do as much harm to our country as bad motives?

Mr. Lower. I think that is true. But I didn't want to question their motives.

Senator Ervin. I don't question their motives as I don't question the good motives of those people who thought it was better to place a man on the rack than to have him adopt a radical belief. I don't think there was any doubt about their good motives, they were trying to save his soul from what they believed was eternal damnation. But as Justice Brandeis stated in one of his opinions, the worst dangers to society come from people of good motives, who are perfectly sincere, but who are very zealous to enforce their views upon other people.

Now, the free flow of information, I infer from your statement, demands that those who gather and disseminate the news should have access to all kinds of sources of information, including the sources of information which can only be obtained from contacts with persons or groups which may be extremely unpopular in society, and which society may deem to be very dangerous to the Nation, is that not true?

Mr. Lower. Yes, sir.

Senator Ervin. And so that is one of the several reasons which prompt your misgivings about the increased use of subpenas to compel testimony from those who gather the news?

Mr. Lower. Yes; I do.

Senator Ervin. So it is not only desirable for the Government to enjoy the confidence of the people, but it is also essential for news gatherers to enjoy the confidence of these groups whose activities and whose philosophy are unpopular but who constitute a very important segment of the American people?

Mr. Lower. I firmly believe that.

Senator Ervin. I am sure you are familiar with the decision of the circuit court of appeals in the Caldwell case.

Mr. Lower. Yes, sir.

Senator Ervin. I infer from your statement that you do not champion the cause of an absolute privilege in the gathering of news, but take the view that under certain circumstances the desirability of giving a newsman access to news from unpopular groups must yield to the necessity for society to enforce its criminal laws.

Mr. Lower. In certain cases.

Senator Ervin. Is it not a fact, however, that most of the information which newsmen gather from such organizations or groups is information which would not be admissible in courts of law because it is based on hearsay rather than personal knowledge. Only in rare instances would the information that the newsmen gather be admissible in a court of law.

Mr. Lower. Yes; much of it falls in that category. And much of it falls in the field of ideas that people hold rather than in the normal type of traditional crimes that are committed.

Senator Ervin. Now, with specific reference to the broadcast medium, there has been some testimony before the subcommittee to the effect that there is some distinction between those who use the printed page and those who engage in radio or television broadcasting. This is based, theoretically at least, on the supposition that any person can go into the newspaper business but only those who obtain a license from the Government can go into the radio or television broadcasting.

Mr. Lower. Correct.

Senator Ervin. Do you recognize this distinction?

Mr. Lower. Yes; I do.

Senator Ervin. Of course by the very nature of things it is incumbent on the Government, in our present state of technology, to allocate the broadcast frequencies among persons or groups who desire to participate in radio or television broadcasting.

Mr. Lower. Well, there are not many of them still to be allocated. but they have been allocated by the Federal Communications Commission.

Senator Ervin. The nature of technology makes it necessary that some people be licensed to engage in such broadcasting, and that others be denied that right or that privilege, because free access to the airways would make the use of the airways virtually valueless. would it not?

Mr. Lower. I believe that was the theory of the original Federal Radio Act back in the twenties.

Senator Ervin. I am glad that you emphasize the fact that every right carries with it a responsibility, and that the right of freedom of speech and freedom of the press carries with it a responsibility that those rights be exercised in a responsible manner to achieve their real objective, which is to inform the public concerning the truth as it is found.

Mr. Lower. Yes, sir.

Senator Ervin. I would like to have your comments on the so-called fairness doctrine. I think you would agree with me, because I think it is one of the plainest teachings of history, that whenever government resorts to regulation of any kind, that government tends to overregulate. For some strange reason the Government has an insatiable thirst for power, and when you give it a little power there is always a tendency to exert more power. One of the most difficult things is for men who exercise governmental power to resist the temptation to over regulate. What restrictions outside of the licensing restraints would you think Government would be justified in imposing upon the broadcast medium?

Mr. Lower. Senator, I have stated for many years that even if the FCC hadn't established a fairness doctrine in 1949, my personal belief has been for all the time I have been a journalist, either in the print media or in broadcasting—and it is today, and this is the way we try to operate—has been in favor of it. So there I am not in disagreement with the fairness doctrine. I do recognize that there is a potential for overcontrol in its administration.

Senator Ervin. You certainly maintain, however, that under no circumstances should the Government undertake to control the content of, for example, the news which radio and television broadcasters disseminate?

Mr. Lower. No, it should not.

Senator. Ervin. I have an abiding faith in the great majority of the American people, and also in American businessmen. It has always been my conviction that the chief value of any business, whether it is to disseminate the news or anything else, is the good will it acquires, which I think has been legally defined as the habit of satisfying customers to return for further trade.

Mr. Lower. Yes.

Senator Ervin. I infer from your statement that you believe that with the exception of a minimum regulation of the broadcast medium, it is better in the long run to leave broadcasters free from a system of strict Government regulation.

Mr. Lower. Very much so, Senator. Minimum regulation in news gathering and news dissemination is what we seek.

Senator Ervin. In other words, we share the view that the responsible people in the broadcasting business will be essentially fair.

Mr. Lower. Yes, sir.

Senator Ervin. And discharge to the best of their ability, with rare exceptions on rare occasions, their obligation to try to give the American people information that is as objective as possible and as accurate as possible.

Mr. Lower. Yes, sir, they are.

Senator Ervin. It is undoubtedly true, I think, and I am sure you agree, that most of the things which prompt our good conduct are not so much legal restraints but the necessity of enjoying the good will of other people and our own sense of responsibility.

Mr. Lower. Yes, sir. And I believe that we are out in the open. The American people are not fools. I don't think any broadcaster today could maintain a continual degree of bias, I just think it would be impossible. What you call good will—I think he would use up his good will in a shorter or longer term depending on how blatant he was in pursuing a biased policy.

Senator Ervin. Counsel has a question.

Mr. Baskir. Mr. Lower, from the testimony of some of our earlier witnesses and some recent commentary, there seems to me to be a pattern in recent Government action. There is an indication that the criticism and what sometimes has been described as thinly veiled threats by the Vice President, the increasing use of subpenas on newsmen particularly in what appear to be political situations, the New York Times injunctions and the prosecutions now being considered, to mention a few, all fall into a pattern, and that this pattern is an attempt by Government to undercut the credibility of the press, or to frighten the press, or to otherwise shift the balance between the press and the Government. I wonder if you would comment on this position.

Mr. LOWER. I think we all know that there have been numerous statements made and actions taken which haven't exactly resulted in greater credibility for the mass media. I have not seen a systematic campaign here to do this, although I believe there has been more of it in the last 3 or 4 years than I have experienced in my previous years as a journalist.

Mr. BASKIR. Do you see an effect upon primarily broadcast journalists, an effect to, shall we say, cut back or moderate? We have had a variety of testimony as to the impact of this campaign or non-campaign, actually, on broadcast journalists.

Mr. LOWER. No, I have not. I have not given any instructions to our own staff, and I am not aware, from my colleagues and my competitors, of any instructions to change the way they operate or what they are doing.

Mr. BASKIR. Outside of formal instructions do you see some sort of tacit drawing back?

Mr. LOWER. Well, I have thought about this at some length and discussed it. And I think that the principal result that I see of frequent criticism and attacks, shall we call them, is that people in the media perhaps ask themselves a second time on controversial stories, have we really been fair in our presentations.

Mr. BASKIR. I would like to move to another area. With respect to broadcasting and Government control, we have had some past witnesses, and will have some future witnesses, maintain that because of the limited access that broadcasting affords persons with differing points of view, there should be some sort of regulation, formal official regulation, to require the owners of radio-television to open their facilities to differing points of view. Would you please comment on that, and then I would like to move on to future developments with cable TV.

Mr. LOWER. Well, I don't think any rules are needed for limited access. I think it is a pretty well established fact now that licensees of radio and television stations have an obligation to seek out differing points of view. I know that you can go back a number of years and say that minority groups didn't get as much attention. But I think we have made a good deal of progress on this in the last few years. And I think it is progress which we were perhaps a little slow in making, but we are doing better at it.

Mr. BASKIR. There has also been some testimony to the effect that if cable television comes into general use that as a practical matter you might have an unlimited number of channels, and that with full utilization of cable television, where perhaps the price of time would be very, very low, this would enable many different groups to get on and to put their half-hour program or their 15-minute speech on television. Therefore, the arguments for some sort of Government regulation as to restricted access would disappear; indeed much of the theory behind FCC regulations would disappear. Would you agree with that and would you encourage expanded use of cable television?

Mr. Lower. I am a little out of my field here, but I will try to answer it nevertheless.

I am not sure that pay television is the panacea to the problem that you outline. If you consider that the same minority groups would like to have the widest possible audience to state their positions, then I think that a series of programs like we did last summer on the Puerto Ricans, the Chicanos and the blacks, which appeared perhaps on 180 stations, or something of that order, would be of greater impact and of value to those particular people than getting their message across on cable television.

Mr. Baskir. Nobody can ever guarantee an audience, but you can guarantee a television camera.

Mr. Lower. I know any exposure is good. I don't particularly disagree with those people getting their message across through any media.

Mr. Baskir. Just one last item. You mentioned the problem of over-enthusiastic enforcement of the fairness doctrine. I wonder if it would be possible for you to submit to this subcommittee some examples of the over-zealous enforcement of the doctrine.

Mr. Lower. I am not sure I used the word over-enthusiastic.

Mr. Baskir. That is my word.

Mr. Lower. I think I said there was a potential danger. At the present moment we haven't felt that the number of inquiries about the fairness doctrine were onerous. I believe in the last year we have noted nine or 12, something in that order. But the potential is there, in that the achievement of fairness and balance, particularly in the hard news program, is something that has to extend over a reasonable time, in some cases perhaps even a year. You can't achieve fairness every night on the programs that are going to be on the air tonight, but you can achieve it over the period of a week, a month, or a year in our overall programing. But if people are going to protest everyday, should the time come when a regulatory body should query us about this everyday, this would be a rather untenable situation, I think.

Mr. Baskir. Would it be too difficult to submit a list of those inquiries over the years?

Mr. Lower. I think we can do that.

Mr. Baskir. Thank you very much.

Senator Ervin. Thank you very much, Mr. Lower. I want to commend you for a statement that is not only excellent in its content, but also excellent in its manner of presentation.

Mr. Lower. Thank you very much.

Senator Ervin. Counsel will call the next witness.

Mr. Baskir. The next witnesses are Judge Robert B. Williamson, former Chief Justice of the State of Maine, and Fred Graham, chief reporter for the New York Times. Judge Williamson is the chairman of the Task Force on Governmental Power and Press Freedom organized by the 20th Century Fund of New York City. Mr. Graham is the rapporteur.

Senator ERVIN. Judge Williamson and Mr. Graham, I am delighted to welcome you to the subcommittee, and I express to both of you the appreciation of the subcommittee for your willingness to give us the benefit of your views on what I think is one of the most basic constitutional provisions, the First Amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GRAHAM. Before we start, may I introduce Mr. Matthew Fox, who is a staff member of the 20th Century Fund, and has been the liaison man between the Fund and this task force.

Senator ERVIN. We are delighted to welcome you also to the subcommittee.

STATEMENT OF ROBERT B. WILLIAMSON, CHAIRMAN, TASK FORCE ON GOVERNMENT POWER AND PRESS FREEDOM OF THE 20TH CENTURY FUND OF NEW YORK CITY

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, my name is Robert B. Williamson. I reside in Augusta, Maine. I welcome the opportunity of appearing before you as the chairman and the representative of a Task Force on Government Power and Press Freedom organized by the 20th Century Fund of New York City.

The task force selected by the Fund is drawn eight from journalism and three from the law. The members, you will note from the list herewith, cover in particular a wide range of activity in journalism and related fields:

Ralph de Toledano, columnist, author, Washington, D.C.

Thomas King Forcade, Washington representative, Underground Press Syndicate, Washington, D.C.

Bert H. Early, executive director, American Bar Association, Chicago, Ill.

Norman Isaacs, editor in residence, Columbia University, New York, N.Y.; also vice chairman of our task force.

L. F. Palmer, Jr., columnist, Chicago Daily News, Chicago, Ill.

George E. Reedy, author, Woodrow Wilson Center, Smithsonian Institution, Washington, D.C., and formerly, I believe, press secretary to President Johnson.

Roger Rook, district attorney, Oregon City, Oreg.

Mike Wallace, correspondent, CBS News, New York, N.Y.

Howard B. Woods, editor and publisher, St. Louis Sentinel, St. Louis, Mo.

The Honorable Shirley Hufstedler, judge of the Court of Appeals (ninth circuit), a most valuable member, felt it necessary to resign in August because of the likelihood of issues in this area arising in the ninth circuit.

We stand absolutely independent of the Fund. We are requested to study the problem, and to report thereon with recommendations. Our discussions in nine meetings since January last, have been free, frank, instructive, and often spirited and long. Difficulties at the outset in communication between newsman and lawyer dissolved in large measure as we came to understand the problems before us.

We hope to complete and publish our report by mid-November. There remains, even now, the possibility of changes in our draft but none, I think of major consequence.

The Pentagon Papers issue arose literally as we are going to a meeting in June. To complete the report for publication in September than became impossible.

We have considered five areas in the relationship between Government and the press—and by press we include broadcasting and television:

1. The newsmen's privilege (subject of S. 1311);
2. Investigation of editorial judgment in the regulated broadcast media;
3. Police posing as journalists;
4. The underground press; and
5. The Pentagon papers. (Mr. Graham took no part in drafting the report in this area.)

We were not concerned with Fair Trial—Free Press.

I shall confine my remarks chiefly to the newsmen's privilege and the Pentagon Papers, in accordance with your invitation. I shall attempt to give the views of the task force in these areas, and beyond this, my personal views.

All agreed on the fundamental propositions. Freedom of the press under the Constitution is designed to protect and advance the freedom of the people. The public need for information is obtained only through a free press. Freedom of the press is a means to reach the objective, and is not an end in itself.

From the evidence before us, a majority of the task force are satisfied that a newsmen's privilege, so-called, under a shield of law is desirable.

There are those who reject the concept of a "shield" and who believe a shield tampers with the administration of justice or may lead to restrictions upon the press.

Without a shield, the newsmen in general vigorously assert that news sources will "dry up", and their confidential lines of communication will be broken, with consequent damage to the public's information.

Obviously a privilege against giving testimony suppresses evidence—and truth. The privilege of newsmen (as indeed the privilege of attorney and client) must be weighed against the public's right to everyman's testimony.

We favor a limited or qualified privilege, covering news media, such as newspapers, periodicals, radio and television, newsletters and news services.

The common law recognizes no privilege for the news-gatherer. Any privilege, therefore, must be based on the first amendment or on shield statutes. We express no view on the constitutional issues now before the court in the Caldwell, Pappas, and Branzburg cases. Whatever the decision on constitutional issues, statute law will very likely be necessary to implement the shield.

What should the privilege cover? To what extent should a privilege broadly stated be qualified?

In our view—the majority view—a newsmen's privilege should prevent the compelled disclosure of confidences that might reduce the flow of information through the press to the public. It should protect against disclosure of confidential sources and of information given in confidence, including notes, tape recordings, and other records of confidential communications and newsmen's records leading to such disclosures.

Further, we would extend the privilege beyond the bounds of confidence to protect news organizations from compulsory production of unpublished photographs or unused television films of public events. Such protection, we believe, is not presently given in any shield law.

Such a privilege (qualified or limited as later discussed) is designed to protect and to preserve the contacts of the newsman. with persons or groups, who would otherwise cease in significant degree, to be a source of news. We recognize, of course, that such sources desire that the news be published. It is the protection of confidentiality which is necessary to the full functioning of the press.

The privilege also prevents use of the newsman in the role of an unwilling investigative arm of the State.

Our suggested privilege goes beyond protection not merely against disclosure of the confidential source, but against disclosure also of confidential information including records that would lead to violation of the desired protected confidences.

This protection is included in S. 1311 and, for example, in the New York statute, and, I believe, the Pennsylvania case law.

We believe that legal controls over press subpenas would discourage their use. We note that since the Attorney General issued guidelines governing such subpenas by his Department, there has been a marked decline in subpoenas over the previous year. The example of the Attorney General, important and constructive as it is, does not solve the problem in its entire breadth.

What is the press to which we would grant the newsmen's privilege for the benefit of the public? The task force has attempted no narrow definition. We make no distinction, for example, between the newspaper, the underground press, or the collegiate press. Radio and television as well are the press.

In recommending the extension of the shield to cover against the compelled production of unpublished photographs and unused film of public events, we go beyond any statute called to our attention. It is to be noted that such a privilege cannot rest upon information given in confidence. The reason for our suggestion has a quite different base, but is nonetheless of value in the carrying out of the usual duties of the man with the camera.

The newsman should not be compelled to be ready source of evidence for the benefit of either the State or the accused, and thus to destroy his standing as a "neutral observer." He should not be a sitting duck for a subpoena.

We are advised that one or more news organizations do now destroy routinely such material, and that others are considering adopting a like policy. The published photograph and film should be sufficient. The "neutral observer" status deserves protection.

We do not include writers of books within the newsmen's privilege. Authorship of a book is not part of the continuing news process.

The values in a shield for the reporter in this instance are outweighed by the values of full disclosures of relevant evidence in proper proceedings.

Limitations or qualifications upon the privilege, while necessary, should be as sharply marked as possible. Certainty in the relationship between the newsman and his sources in this respect is plainly an important factor in continuance of the confidence. The source will wish to know the protection available. He must be satisfied that the reporter may lawfully not disclose the confidences.

In some States, a qualification is expressed in terms of public interest or equivalent language, and in others there is no limitation. In S. 1311 the privilege is divested "if the Court . . . . determines that there is substantial evidence that disclosure of the information is required to prevent a threat to human life, espionage or foreign aggression." In the Caldwell case, a protective order was worded, "compelling and overriding national interest that cannot be served by any alternative means." The New York Times in an editorial on September 26th says, "Only proof of the most overriding and pressing public necessity could justify subpena of information gathered by newsmen in the performance of their duties."

There are several approaches that may be taken in determining the scope of a privilege and qualifications. They are:

First: A privilege without qualification;

Second: A privilege with a "public necessity" qualification;

Third: A privilege qualified by exclusion of certain offenses, as in S. 1311.

Perhaps a fourth approach should be added, that is, a privilege with both the exclusion of certain offenses and a "public necessity" clause.

We considered the qualification problem from every angle. We are unable to come up with a recommendation specifically setting forth a line that should be drawn, between privilege and no privilege.

Appealing to some, was a qualification eliminating from the privilege evidence involving past or present crimes of violence. Several of the majority favoring a "shield," support a privilege without qualification. Any line short of total privilege raises important issues of policy as well as of certainty in application.

In my view—shared, I believe, by only one other—a privilege however broad or qualified, should include a "safety valve" against the operation of the privilege when the court or other body finds a compelling or overriding national interest or public necessity that cannot be served or met by alternative means.

The "safety valve" is not a definite clear-cut rule. The source may balk at the possibility of compelled disclosure. The courts may err. But on balance it seems to me, that the privilege, insofar as it may not be found to rest on the Constitution, should cease when the line stated is reached.

The privilege should extend, in the view of the task force, to grand jury proceedings, preliminary hearings, trials, administrative hearings, legislative hearings, and investigations. It should extend wherever evidence may be compelled under sanction of contempt by the Government or any agency and at every level.

In civil matters, the privilege should be limited to prevent its use by the newsman to avoid liability for defamatory publications. The shield is designed to protect the newsman for the benefit of the public. and not for his own good.

The task force is further satisfied that under some circumstances the entry of a newsman into a grand jury room or other secret hearing may, quite apart from his testimony, seriously affect his news gathering capacity. We believe he should be protected against such injury on a showing of such harm, in the absence of a "compelling need" that his evidence, otherwise compellable, be taken in the grand jury or other secret hearing. Thus we would meet the double threat to the newsman—confidential source relationship from the giving of any testimony in secret until the need therefor should be established under the shield law.

S. 1311 reaches the heart of the matter in the sections on nondisclosure of confidential information and nondisclosure of sources. The definitions seem adequate.

Under S. 1311, as I read it, the newsmen's privilege is unqualified except in relation to details of grand jury or other proceedings required to be kept secret under law, or unless divested by court order, when the information is required to prevent a threat to human life, espionage or foreign aggression.

For my part, I wish to see in a shield law a "public necessity" safety valve, carefully drawn and limited, but present. Such a provision I prefer to the limited language of S. 1311.

In summary, a majority of the task force recommend shield laws for newsmen to meet the needs of the public in the full flow of information.

I turn now, Mr. Chairman, to the Pentagon papers and the issues arising therefrom on which you invited comment.

The Pentagon papers were not within the scope of the studies of the task force until June. Our obligation and duty to consider the issues were at once apparent. This we have done.

Our report—in which Mr. Graham took no part—will include a study, carefully drawn, of the issues in controversy. The position of the majority is persuasively set forth in the report. We do not undertake, however, to make recommendations.

The journalists in general—and the majority of the task force—stand for the absolute right of the press to publish with no prior restraints whatsoever. The lawyers do not accept the "absolute" approach, without, however, agreeing upon a particular rule.

The arguments are well-known if not thoroughly understood. Discussions of the rights and obligations of the press and government altered, as I recall it, no opinions. Division in thinking between the journalist and the lawyer was apparent from the start.

I am unable to agree with the position taken by the majority of the task force. I am not an "absolutist." Within the Constitution there is room, I believe, to establish protection against disclosure of top secret, classified papers, or state secrets, if you will.

I assume there is no question of the right to declare unlawful the publication of such material with suitable penalties.

My concern is with the right to create and the desirability of creating prior publication restraints. I speak as an individual, and in this I do not represent the task force, or any members, whether in the majority or in the minority.

Clearly an injunction to prevent publication will rarely be a useful tool. Papers will be published before the courts will be approached or action taken. In the Pentagon Papers, publication over several days gave the opportunity to seek an injunction looking to tomorrow's newspaper.

The judgment of the Supreme Court does no more, I suggest, than determine that an injunction did not lie on the facts. A majority of the Justices, as I read the opinions, did not say that the First Amendment absolutely prohibits prior restraint on publications.

If I am correct in this view, the constitutional issue remains open.

The classification system, it seems to me, has broken down. Congress or the Executive, or both, should repair it promptly to provide effective and meaningful procedures for classification and for early declassification.

From the news and general reading—I have not read far beyond the introduction of the New York Times paperback—I gain the impression that a substantial portion of the Pentagon Papers should not have been classified, or if so, only for a period some years ended. This impression is strengthened by the recent publication by the government of portions of the Pentagon Papers.

It is good news that declassification is underway.

In the dissenting opinion of Justice Harlan in which the Chief Justice and Justice Blackmun joined, I find the reasoning which appeals to me. I pass the decision of no injunction on the Pentagon Papers, for that is in the past. It is the present and future which interest me.

In the end, it comes, as I see it, to a question of trust. Granted that top secrets ought not to be published to protect vital national or state interests, and granted that officers of government must be the ones to stamp "top secret," who is to be the judge of publication? Is the judge to be the press or the Government? Whichever way we turn, men and women it may be, equal in ability, and alike in devotion to a free press under the Constitution, and in awareness of the necessity of security, must make for us the decision—perhaps fateful.

With deep belief in the freedom of the press, with full recognition of its value in a free society, with the First Amendment before me, I am unable to place my ultimate trust in the editor, not directly responsible to, and not selected by, the people. I choose, rather, to trust the officers of government charged with the responsibility, not unlike that of the President, if you will, for the security of the nation.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Ervin. Judge, I wish to commend you on your statement, which certainly points up in a most effective way the diverse interests which the Government has in this particular field, which often conflict. Also I think your statement points up the difficulty of phrasing the shield, statutory shield. You take the position, as I understand it, that any statutory shield that should be erected couldn't be based on the confidential nature of the disclosures received by the newsmen, as is true in respect to the disclosures which a lawyer receives in order that he may represent his client, or that a physician receives in order that he may treat his patient. Your position, as I understand it, and a position of the majority of the task force on that specific point, is that this statutory shield, or any other shield raised by the Constitution, is based on the desirability, or even to go beyond that, the necessity for the public to have information on the matter, which are of crucial importance to society.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes, indeed.

Senator ERVIN. I infer from your statement that the task force was divided on the question of whether this problem should be solved by the enactment of a law or statute or by leaving the matter to be determined by the courts on the basis of the provisions of the first amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes. Not all of the task force believe in shield law.

Senator ERVIN. I haven't any fixed conclusions on this point. You confess that it gives rise in the task force to a difference of opinion, and I will have to say that it creates a certain amount of intellectual chaos in our minds.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. It did in ours.

Senator ERVIN. I don't belittle the linguistic abilities of my colleagues in Congress in phrasing a statute, but I have a profound confidence in the First Amendment. And I am not certain that in drawing a statute we might not "raise up more snakes than we wish to kill."

I am very much impressed by the judicial statement by the circuit court of appeals in the Caldwell case which you cite and from which you quote. I just wonder if, recognizing as you and I do the two public interests, the public interest in the right to make information available and also the public interest in the desirability of law enforcement. As you, I am not an absolutist on the First Amendment's guarantees except as it applies to freedom of thought. I believe in absolute freedom of thought, but I think the other freedoms are not absolute. However, I wonder whether the decision in the Caldwell case, if sustained by the Supreme Court, doesn't provide an effective protection both to the writer, the interests of the public in securing information, and the interests of the public in law enforcement. As I construe the rather narrow holding in that case, it is to the effect that a news gatherer cannot be required to go before a grand jury, certainly not to reveal the sources of his information or his unpublished information, unless there is an overriding public interest requiring him to do so and unless, also, it appears that the law enforcement officers cannot secure the same information from any other source. I wonder if that protection is not sufficient, if it is affirmed by the Supreme Court. And of course, we don't know what they are going to do yet. I am sure that despite judicial certainty, in the writing of an opinion there will be a great deal of uncertainty in the thought that precedes the opinion.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. It seems to us that you couldn't really anticipate what they might do. But I think we could go this far, that probably a statute of law would be necessary or desirable to implement whatever might be the case law.

Senator ERVIN. I take it, however, you agree with me that there is a question as to whether we should go the statutory route or whether we should go to the Constitution and rely on future interpretation by the Supreme Court upon which reasonable men can disagree.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Certainly. And certainly any statute law would come necessarily after the Supreme Court has spoken.

Senator ERVIN. You have stated some very interesting views in respect to the general problem posed by the publication of the Pentagon Papers. which is quite different from the position taken by some of the news people before the subcommittee. Their position is that under no circumstances should there be any prior restraint, and that the question of what should be published in the areas which might affect the national security or state secrets, which come into the possession of the press, is a matter that should be determined by the publishers themselves, and that they can be safely trusted with acting in the national interest. As I understand, you take the position that under certain circumstances there should be prior restraint in respect to information concerning national security, or state secrets. And I would infer that your definition of state secrets would include among other things diplomatic negotiations in which are engaged with other countries. You take the position that the best interests of the Nation in the long run may, in certain circumstances, require prior restraint in respect to this restricted area, and that the determination of that question necessarily must be left to government rather than those who exercise the privileges of a free press.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I do. I should say, Senator, that that is my personal view. The lawyers in the group might have a little different view.

Senator ERVIN. Yes; I should have mentioned that, because you did make it clear that in expressing an opinion on this point you were speaking for yourself and neither for a majority or a minority of the task force.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes.

Mr. BASKIR. Justice Williamson, have you in the course of your study collected any statistics with respect to the issuance of subpenas by U.S. attorneys in recent years as compared to times past?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. We have had them through Mr. Graham, but I have not personally.

Mr. BASKIR. If the committee has them, do you think it would be possible to make them available to the subcommittee?

Mr. GRAHAM. We will make available what we have. It is very limited prior to 2 years ago, because the Justice Department kept no records based on who the subject of the subpena was.

Mr. BASKIR. I wonder if you have also done an analysis of the Attorney General's guidelines in the course of your study.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. No more really than I have given here.

Mr. BASKIR. I would like to ask one question. If the Supreme Court should, let us say, merely support the Caldwell rule, the very narrow rule, and if Congress should not see fit to adopt a shield law, what would be wrong with leaving the situation as it apparently has existed to date, that is to rely upon informal understandings or arrangements between the Justice Department on the one hand and the press on the other hand, letting them work out difficulties on a sort of ad hoc basis as apparently they have in the past.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. It seems to me from the discussions with the newsmen that that would leave it open. The source wants to know, as I understand it, whether the reporter can be compelled to disclose—obviously he has to rely on the newsman not to disclose voluntarily. But the newsman may disclose voluntarily, it is his privilege. But as I understand the shield law, disclosure cannot be forced from the newsman.

Mr. BASKIR. If a source at the present time has to rely upon his confidence in the honor of the newsman not to do it voluntarily, and if journalism as a whole feels very strongly about this, why not just let the situation remain as it is and have the newsman defend what he sees as his first amendment right or his journalism right and go to jail under contempt?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. If a man is ordered to testify, I like to have him testify. I think if I were in such a situation I would want to know that I was protected by law and not simply beating against the law.

Mr. GRAHAM. May I address myself to that for a minute, Mr. Baskir?

One of the things we discovered was that the situation has changed in the last 2 or 3 years. I notice that the Government's brief in the Branzburg and Pappas cases, the companion cases to the Caldwell case in the Supreme Court, is based largely upon the assertion that, well, we have had the First Amendment for 180 years, and no one has ever said that it should protect a newsman from having to disclose his source, why all the concern now, why can't the newsmen live with this as they did in prior history? And in our discussions I think we all agree that the situation has changed in several respects in the last 2 or 3 years. It is true, as Attorney General Mitchell has said, that the press gave information to the Justice Department on a number of occasions in the 1950's and 1960's. I know that is so because I was down in the South where a lot of that happened, and I observed it, and I was a part of some of that. In most of those cases we were giving information against the Ku Klux Klan and other terrorist groups of that nature for which we had no confidential sources at all. That was based on observation, from being around. We had no feeling that it was a violation of the First Amendment, or that we would cut the public off from any information by doing that. In the other cases that we know about primarily, the cases that you see in the reports, prior to the 1970's almost all of those had to do with local prosecutors going against the local paper, where the power is quite often distinctly on the side of the press, and it can take care of itself very well. What seems to have happened in the last couple of years is that you have the Federal Government now or you did prior to the Attorney General's guidelines, issuing a number of subpenas. And it was for information that was based on confidential sources. In many instances, the Caldwell case and others, what they knew was what had been told to them in confidence, not what they had seen. And we concluded that the situation was changed, and that where perhaps this casual, informal way of handling a problem in the past worked, that that situation may now change to the point that the law needs to step in.

Mr. Baskir. Every once in awhile one reads in the newspaper about some local conflict such as you describe. I recall a few instances having to do with college newspaper reporters and editors who have refused to accede to the demands of the local prosecutor or the local judge. Standing on what they see as the requirements of journalism and the First Amendment, they refused to cooperate, and suffered the penalties as a price they feel they have to pay, and are willing to pay, to preserve both journalism and the first amendment. Despite the changes in the use and the frequency of subpoenas, if this is such a serious situation, why shouldn't reporters go to jail for a limited period of time for the contempt generally involved and rely upon public pressure in case after case brought under the Attorney General's guidelines so that there would be no need for legislation?

Mr. Graham. I agree with the Judge that that is essentially a lawless way for dealing with the problem that our country should deal with through law. And as he said, sources want to be assured that you can't be made to tell. Now, several journalists who I know in this town have had contact with the people who stole the documents from the Media, Pa., FBI office. And there have been negotiations about interviewing those people to find out why they did it, what was behind it. I think that is something that the public might well profit from knowing. And yet I know in the case that I know of, which I have personal knowledge of, we could not give assurances that the law wouldn't have a right to get the identity of those people. And nothing came of it.

Mr. Baskir. Of course, you could give them the personal assurance that you would go to jail for contempt rather than to accede to the subpena.

Senator Ervin. If I may interject myself at this point, you haven't said this expressly, but I assume that this is the case; you feel that a news gatherer, who gathers news from members of groups considered intellectually dangerous or physically dangerous to society, render a public service in gathering such news, and that he should not be penalized by sending him to jail because in rendering this public service he acts on the basis of his conscience. Isn't that fundamentally the argument for making this certain by law?

Mr. Graham. I agree with that, Senator.

Senator Ervin. Excuse the interruption.

Mr. Baskir. I should have prefaced my series of questions by saying that this is the position which has been expressed to the subcommittee, it is not necessarily my own, and I just wanted to find your views about it.

Senator Ervin. I wonder if this problem has not been accentuated of late by a change in the nature of crimes that excite public apprehension. In other words, a few years ago when I practiced law, grand juries usually passed upon specific cases. Proposed indictments sent by the prosecuting attorney contained the names of the witnesses who could identify the culprits. During the last few years we have had an increased tendency on the part of certain individuals and organizations whose membership is not clearly defined or identified publicly to resort to violence, such as the bombing, the destruction of property and the like. In order to perform its duty, a grand jury is often called on to conduct what we used to call something in the nature of a "dragnet investigation." These crimes are committed in secret. In many cases they were committed by men whose identities are more or less concealed and unknown, and under circumstances which are concealed. That requires a much more far-reaching investigation by grand juries than we normally have. Is that not true, Judge?

Mr. Williamson. I think it is.

Senator Ervin. So the issuing of subpenas for newsmen, and the effort to convert newsmen into an army of law enforcement officers has become more intense during recent times than it ever was in the past.

Mr. Graham. Yes.

And, Senator Ervin, you may know that one of the amicus curiae briefs that we filed recently in the Caldwell case disclosed that in the last 2½ years 124 subpenas have been served on CBS and NBC and their affiliated and wholly owned stations. Now, we don't have accurate statistics as to what the situation was, say, prior to that 2½ year period, but we are told, and I am sure it is true, that there was nothing like that.

Senator Ervin. Judge, I want to commend you on your statement on behalf of the majority task force, and for expressing your personal viewpoint as well.

Mr. Williamson. Thank you very much.

(The prepared Statement of Mr. Williamson follows:)

STATEMENT OF ROBERT B. WILLIAMSON ON BEHALF OF THE TASK FORCE ON GOVERNMENT POWER AND PRESS FREEDOM ORGANIZED BY THE TWENTIETH CENTURY FUND OF NEW YORK CITY.

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee: My name is Robert B. Williamson. I reside in Augusta, Maine. I welcome the opportunity of appearing before you as the chairman and the representative of a Task Force on Government Power and Press Freedom organized by the Twentieth Century Fund of New York City.

With me is Mr. Fred P. Graham, rapporteur of the Task Force, who is chiefly responsible for our Report, except upon the Pentagon Papers.

The Task Force selected by the Fund is drawn eight from Journalism and three from the Law. The members, you will note from the list herewith, cover in particular a wide range of activity in journalism and related fields.

The Honorable Shirley Hufstedler, Judge of the Court of Appeals (9th Circuit), a most valuable member, felt it necessary to resign in August because of the likelihood of issues in this area arising in the 9th Circuit.

We stand absolutely independent of the Fund. We were requested to study the problem, and to report thereon with recommendations. Our discussions in nine meetings since January last, have been free, frank, instructive, and often spirited and long. Difficulties at the outset in communication between newsman and lawyer dissolved in large measure as we came to understand the problems before us.

We hope to complete and publish our report by mid-November. There remains, even now, the possibility of changes in our draft, but none, I think of major consequence.

The Pentagon Papers issue arose as we were in our June meeting. To complete the report for publication in September then became impossible.

We have considered five areas in the relationship between Government and the Press—and by Press we include Broadcasting and Television:

(1) The Newsmen's Privilege (subject of S 1311);

(2) Investigation of editorial judgment in the regulated broadcast media;

(3) Police posing as journalists;

(4) The underground Press; and

(5) The Pentagon Papers. (Mr. Graham took no part in drafting the report in this area.)

We were not concerned with Fair Trial—Free Press.

I shall confine my remarks chiefly to the newsmen's privilege and the Pentagon Papers, in accordance with your invitation. I shall attempt to give the views of the Task Force in these areas, and beyond this, my personal views.

There is a wide difference between the newsmen's privilege and the privilege, for example, of attorney-client. It is the client's privilege; he alone may waive it. In the newsmen's privilege, it is the privilege of the newsman and not of the source. The newsman may choose whether or not to exercise his privilege. No waiver from the source is required to permit the newsman to give his testimony. The option to testify lies with the newsman.

All agreed on the fundamental propositions. Freedom of the press under the Constitution is designed to protect and advance the freedom of the people. The public need for information is obtained only through a free press. Freedom of the press is a means to reach the objective, and is not an end in itself.

From the evidence before us, a majority of the Task Force are satisfied that a newsmen's privilege, so-called, under a shield law is desirable.

There are those who reject the concept of a "shield" and who believe a shield tampers with the administration of Justice or may lead to restrictions upon the press.

Without a shield, the newsmen in general vigorously assert that news sources will "dry up", and their confidential lines of communication will be broken, with consequent damage to the public's information.

Obviously a privilege against giving testimony suppresses evidence—and truth. The privilege of newsmen (as indeed the privilege of attorney and client) must be weighed against the public's right to everyman's testimony.

We favor a limited or qualified privilege, covering news media, such as newspapers, periodicals, radio and television, news letters and news services.

The common law recognizes no privilege for the newsgatherer. Any privilege, therefore, must be based on the First Amendment or on shield statutes. We express no view on the constitutional issues now before the Court in the Caldwell, Pappas, and Branzburg cases. Whatever the decision on constitutional issues, statute law will very likely be necessary to implement the shield.

What should the privilege cover? To what extent should a privilege broadly stated be qualified?

In our view—the majority view—a newsmen's privilege should prevent the compelled disclosure of confidences that might reduce the flow of information through the press to the public. It should protect against disclosure of confidential sources and of information given in confidence, including notes, tape recordings, and other records of confidential communications and newsmen's records leading to such disclosures.

Further, we would extend the privilege beyond the bounds of confidence to protect news organizations from compulsory production of unpublished photographs or unused television films of public events. Such protection is not presently given in any shield law.

Such a privilege (qualified or limited as later discussed) is designed to protect and to preserve the contracts of the newsman, with persons or groups, who would otherwise cease in significant degree, to be a source of news. We recognize, of course, that such sources desire that the news be published. It is the protection of confidentiality which is necessary to the full functioning of the press.

The privilege also prevents use of the newsman in the role of an unwilling investigative arm of the State.

Our suggested privilege goes beyond protection not merely against disclosure of the confidential source, but against disclosure also of confidential information including records that would lead to violation of the desired protected confidences.

This protection is included in S 1311 and, for example, in the New York statute.

We believe that legal controls over press subpenas would discourage their use. We note that since the Attorney General issued guide lines governing such subpenas by his Department, there has been a marked decline in subpenas over the previous year. The example of the Attorney General, important and constructive as it is, does not solve the problem in its entire breadth.

What is the Press to which we would grant the newsmen's privilege for the benefit of the public? The Task Force has attempted no narrow definition. We make no distinction, for example, between the newspaper, the underground press, or the collegiate press. Radio and Television as well are the press.

In recommending the extension of the shield to cover against the compelled production of unpublished photographs and unused film of public events, we go beyond any statute called to our attention. It is to be noted that such a privilege cannot rest upon information given in confidence. The reason for our suggestion has a quite different base, but is nonetheless of value in the carrying out of the usual duties of the man with the camera.

The newsman should not be compelled to be a ready source of evidence for the benefit of either the State or the accused, and thus to destroy his standing as a "neutral observer." He should not be a sitting duck for a subpena.

We are advised that one or more news organizations do now destroy routinely such material, and that others are considering adopting a like policy. The published photograph and film should be sufficient. The "neutral observer" status deserves protection.

We do not include writers of books within the newsmen's privilege. Authorship of a book is not part of the continuing news process.

The values in a shield for the reporter are here outweighed by the values of full disclosures of relevant evidence in proper proceedings.

Limitations or qualifications upon the privilege, while necessary, should be as sharply marked as possible. Certainty in the relationship between the newsman and his sources in this respect is plainly an important factor in continuance of the confidence. The source will wish to know the protection available. He must be satisfied that the reporter may lawfully not disclose the confidences.

In some states, a qualification is expressed in terms of public interest or equivalent language, and in others there is no limitation. In S. 1311 the privilege is diverted "if the Court . . . determines that there is substantial evidence that disclosure of the information is required to prevent a threat to human life, espionage or foreign aggression". In the Caldwell case, a protective order was worded, "compelling and overriding national interest that cannot be served by any alternative means." The New York Times in an editorial on September 26th says, "Only proof of the most overriding and pressing public necessity could justify subpena of information gathered by newsmen in the performance of their duties."

There are several approaches that may be taken in determining the scope of a privilege and qualifications. They are:

First: A privilege without qualification;

Second: A privilege with a "public necessity" qualification;

Third: A privilege qualified by exclusion of certain offenses, as in S 1311.

Perhaps a fourth approach should be added, that is, a privilege with both the exclusion of certain offenses and a "public necessity" clause.

We considered the qualification problem from every angle. We are unable to come up with a recommendation specifically setting forth a line that should be drawn, between privilege and no privilege.

Appealing to some, was a qualification eliminating from the privilege evidence involving past or present crimes of violence. Several of the majority favoring a "shield", support a privilege without qualification. Any line short of total privilege raises important issues of policy as well as of certainty in application.

In my view—shared, I believe, by only one other—a privilege however broad or qualified, should include a "safety valve" against the operation of the privilege when the Court or other body finds a compelling or overriding national interest or public necessity that cannot be served or met by alternative means.

In short, in my view, there comes a time when the needs of Justice outweigh the needs of the privileged newsman.

The "safety valve" is not a definite clear-cut rule. The source may balk at the possibility of compelled disclosure. The Courts may err. But on balance it seems to me, that the privilege, insofar as it may not be found to rest on the Constitution, should cease when the line stated is reached.

The privilege should extend, in the view of the Task Force, to grand jury proceedings, preliminary hearing, trials, administrative hearings, trials, administrative hearings, legislative hearings and investigations. It should extend wherever evidence may be compelled under sanction of contempt by the Government or any agency and at every level.

In civil matters, the privilege should be limited to prevent its use by the newsman to avoid liability for defamatory publications. The shield is designed to protect the newsman for the benefit of the public, and not for his own good.

The Task Force is further satisfied that under some circumstances the entry of a newsman into a grand jury room or other secret hearing may, quite a part from his testimony, seriously affect his news gathering capacity. We believe he should be protected against such injury on a showing of such harm, in the absence of a "compelling need" that his evidence, otherwise compellable, be taken in the grand jury or other secret hearing. Thus we would meet the double threat to the newsman—confidential source relationship from the giving of any testimony in secret until the need therefor should be established under the shield law.

S 1311 reaches the heart of the matter in the sections on non-disclosure of confidential information and non-disclosure of sources. The definitions seem adequate.

Under S 1311, as I read it, the newsmen's privilege is unqualified except in relation to details of grand jury or other proceedings required to be kept secret under law, or unless divested by Court Order, when the information is required to prevent a threat to human life, espionage or foreign aggression.

For my part, I wish to see in a shield law a "public necessity" safety valve, carefully drawn and limited, but present. Such a provision I prefer to the limited language of S 1311.

In summary, a majority of the Task Force recommend shield laws for newsmen to meet the needs of the public in the full flow of information.

I turn to the Pentagon Papers and the issues arising therefrom on which you invited comment.

The Pentagon Papers were not within the scope of the studies of the Task Force until June. Our obligation and duty to consider the issues were at once apparent. This we have done.

Our report (in which Mr. Graham took no part) will include a study, carefully drawn, of the issues in controversy. The position of the majority is persuasively set forth in the report. We do not undertake, however, to make recommendations.

The journalists in general—and the majority of the Task Force—stand for the absolute right of the press to publish with no prior restriants whatsoever. The lawyers do not accept the "absolute" approach, without, however, agreeing upon a particular rule.

The arguments are well-known if not thoroughly understood. Discussions of the rights and obligations of the Press and Government altered, as I recall it, no opinions. Division in thinking between the journalist and the lawyer was apparent from the start.

I am unable to agree with the position taken by the majority of the Task Force. I am not an "absolutist". Within the Constitution there is room, I believe to establish protection against disclosure of top secret, classified papers, or state secrets, if you will.

I assume there is no question of the right to declare unlawful the publication of such material with suitable penalties.

My concern is with the right to create and the desirability of creating prior publication restraints. I speak as an individual, and in this I do not represent the Task Force, or any members, whether in the majority or in the minority.

Clearly an injunction to prevent publication will rarely be a useful tool. Papers will be published before the Courts will be approached or action taken. In the Pentagon Papers, publication over several days gave the opportunity to seek an injunction looking to tomorrow's newspaper.

The judgment of the Supreme Court does no more, I suggest, than determine that an injunction did not lie on the facts. A majority of the Justices, as I read the opinions, did not say that the First Amendment absolutely prohibits prior restraint on publication.

If I am correct in this view, the constitutional issue remains open.

The classification system has broken down. Congress or the Executive, or both, should repair it promptly to provide effective and meaningful procedures for classification and for early declassification.

From the news and general reading—I have not read far beyond the introduction of the New York Times paperback—I gain the impression that a substantial portion of the Pentagon Papers should not have been classified, or if so, only for a period some years ended. This impression is strengthened by the recent publication by the Government of portions of the Pentagon Papers.

It is good news that declassification is under way.

In the dissenting opinion of Justice Harlan in which the Chief Justice and Justice Blackmun joined, I find the reasoning which appeals to me. I pass the decision of no injunction on the Pentagon Papers, for that is in the past. It is the present and future which interest me.

In the end, it comes, as I see it, to a question of trust. Granted that top secrets ought not to be published to protect vital national interests, and granted that officers of Government must be the ones to stamp "top secret", who is to be the judge of publication? Is the judge to be the Press or the Government? Whichever way we turn, men and women it may be, equal in ability, and alike in devotion to a free press under the Constitution, and in awareness of the necessity of security, must make for us the decision—perhaps fateful.

With deep belief in the freedom of the Press, with full recognition of its value in a free society, with the First Amendment before me, I am unable to place my ultimate trust in the editor, not directly responsible to, and not selected by, the people. I choose, rather, to trust the officers of Government charged with the responsibility, not unlike that of the President, if you will, for the security of the nation.

Senator Ervin. This is an intriguing question to me. When I hear both sides of these problems presented in such an impressive fashion, I sometimes wish I could resort to the procedure of the justice of the peace down in North Carolina. When the plaintiff finished his presentation of the case the justice of the peace asked the defendant not to present his side, he said he didn't have much trouble reaching a conclusion when he heard one side, but when he heard both sides it engendered a lot of confusion in his mind.

You may proceed, Mr. Graham.

STATEMENT OF FRED P. GRAHAM, RAPPORTEUR FOR THE TWENTIETH CENTURY FUND'S TASK FORCE ON GOVERNMENTAL POWER AND PRESS FREEDOM

Mr. GRAHAM. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

As you know, I am normally seated at the press table when these hearings are conducted, and I feel more comfortable over there than where I am now.

That reminds me of a story, too. William Howard Taft's great-granddaughter wrote an autobiography when she was in the third grade. It went like this:

> "My grandfather's father was President of the United States. My grandfather was a Senator. My daddy is an ambassador. And I am a Brownie."

And I feel a little bit like a "Brownie" in this company.

Senator ERVIN. I will elevate you to a very high rank in this company.

Mr. GRAHAM. The task force's chairman, Judge Williamson, has summarized for you the group's conclusions about press subpenas and the Pentagon Papers litigation. I would like to talk about several other interesting developments that came to the notice of the task force.

My testimony concerns two less obvious areas of friction between the Government and the press: a subtle and apparently growing form of governmental penetration of the news media, in which police either pose as newsmen or employ them as paid informers; and a constitutional double standard applied by some officials to the underground press, granting it a watered-down version of First Amendment protection or none at all.

In recent months a series of unrelated and apparently uncoordinated instances have come to light in which personnel of government intelligence and law enforcement agencies have posed as news reporters or photographers. In a variation of this, law enforcement agencies have paid reporters and press photographers to collect information for them, thus using journalism as a guise to obtain material for governmental use. These incidents appear to be remarkably widespread both geographically and organizationally. They have occurred from Washington to Saigon and within the Army, Federal Bureau of Investigation, and local police.

Whether such incidents were common in the past and were not discovered, is not known. What does seem significant is that a rash of these occurrences has come to light within the past 2 years—almost in rhythm with the rising tempo of dissent, violence and official concern about dissent and violence. In fact, most of the instances that have been discovered involved police investigations of political dissenters—groups about which the public should be as fully informed as possible. However, the frequency with which police have been found to be posing as newsmen in recent months has tended to raise barriers of suspicion that have made it more difficult for the press to cover many events.

No one knows, of course, how often this has actually happened. But the task force was able to verify at least a dozen instances within the past 2 years in which either sworn testimony or a responsible police official conceded that it did:

> In Saigon, two U.S. agents were found to have infiltrated the press corps.
> The Army Security Agency painted a van with the name of a nonexistent television company and filmed demonstrators at the Democratic National Convention in 1968.
> Army Intelligence agents also posed as TV cameramen during the Presidential inauguration activities in Washington in January 1969.
> A female intelligence agent for the District of Columbia Police Department posed as a reporter to gain acess to a welfare rights group's meeting.
> Army intelligence agents obtained press credentials from the New York City Police Department to cover actions of H. Rap Brown and Stokely Carmichael in New York during the summer riots of 1967.
> In Witchita, Kans., press credentials were given to local policemen during a visit by Vice President Agnew.
> A member of the Chicago Police Department's Intelligence Division was discovered posing as a newsman to gain information from black students at a protest rally.
> Two plainclothes officers of the Nassau County, N.Y. police force posed as photographers for a weekly newspaper in order to photograph the audience at a veterans' antiwar rally.
> An Army agent masqueraded as a reporter for the Richmond Times Dispatch to obtain information on the Southern Christian Leadership Conference.
> A Detroit policeman passed as a news photographer to observe a General Motors stockholders' meeting.
> In Albuquerque a city policeman posed as an Associated Press photographer at the University of New Mexico campus during demonstrations protesting the invasion of Cambodia in the spring of 1970.
> Complaints by newsmen covering July 4 ceremonies in San Juan, P.R. that police were posing as reporters led to an admission by the Commonwealth Secretary that his department had been issuing press credentials to police for about 8 years.

Senator ERVIN. If I may interject myself at this point, I can say that this subcommittee can furnish another illustration to add to that list. We conducted some investigations into the surveillance of civilians by the Army when the Army Intelligence was assigned that task in 1967 and 1968. And we had testimony from some military intelligence agents that they frequently adopted the guise of newspaper reporters or news photographers when they went to cover a rally or demonstration staged by dissidents. And we had testimony from one former military intelligence agent that on one occasion on a college campus 67 students and their friends staged a peaceful rally to protest the Vietnam War, and that this rally, the rally attended by 67 people, was covered by 52 persons, either actually newspaper men or news photographers, or military intelligence agents in disguise, which is a great example of an overkill, it seems to me, in this area of posing as newspapermen to cover rallies.

Mr. GRAHAM. Senator, we found in every case but one of the dozen we were able to verify that it was political dissent that was being watched. And that is what makes this most dangerous to the first amendment and to the public's access to information.

The Defense Department has issued an order—and of course you know this because it was done in reaction to the investigation that you made—which says:

> "There should be no covert or otherwise deceptive surveillance for penetration of civilian organizations unless specifically authorized by the Secretary of Defense or his designee."

Now, I am told, Mr. Chairman, that this is regarded by Pentagon officials as prohibiting agents from posing as journalists. But I must say that they could have certainly made it clearer.

Senator ERVIN. I might state that the Pentagon and the Department of the Army officials didn't make a lot of things clear to our Subcommittee. They dismissed some of our requests for witnesses who had personal knowledge of some of these activities by the military. They stated that they didn't think the committee needed that information and that they would select the witnesses we would hear.

Mr. GRAHAM. As I say, they say this action is taken to rule that out, although we have not been able to discover anyone who was punished as a result of any of these instances. And yet police officials in New York, Chicago, Detroit, here and some other cities have said that they disapprove of it.

As I said, the reason for this impersonation seems obvious: Law enforcement agencies tend to be ill-informed about political dissenters who do not fit the traditional "criminal" mold, and newsmen often have easy access to them. However, when policemen masquerade as newsmen, the same kind of forces come into play that arise when journalists are subpoenaed, except that the effect is more direct. And that is the target groups are usually highly suspicious of officialdom and "establishment" institutions, and are likely to freeze the press out at any indication that the media is serving law enforcement. This is compounded when the dissenters have good reason to believe that the "journalist" or "news cameraman" that take such interest in their activities may very well be reporting to city hall rather than to the city desk.

The task force has listed a series of instances of hostility and distrust demonstrated by some radical groups toward the press which appears to be due in part, at least, to these actions by the police. Newsmen have been assaulted by militants and excluded from their meetings. However, the most serious threat posed by this tactic is to the public. Its First Amendment right to be fully informed of developments within all elements of our society is threatened by this law enforcement tactic. The principal reason why it should be stopped is not that it makes the reporters' job more difficult, but that it may on occasion make that job impossible, the availability of information will be impaired.

Also, Mr. Chairman, it seems likely that the increased use of this tactic will rapidly dissipate its usefulness to the police. As such incidents come to public notice, people will become reluctant to give important information to reporters not known to them. As newsmen are increasingly frozen out of dissenters' meetings, so will the masquerading police agents. In the end law enforcement as well as the public will be shorter on information than before.

The FBI presents a special variation of this phenomenon. Its Director, J. Edgar Hoover, stated in a letter to this task force that: "FBI agents are not permitted to pose as reporters or press photographers in the course of their investigations." While there is no evidence that FBI agents actually flash press cards or use bogus television organizations as fronts there have been indications that FBI men do occasionally gain access to information by allowing others to think that they are journalists. At a draft card burning demonstration outside the Supreme Court in June of 1968, reporters for the Washington Post and Boston Globe spotted men whom they recognized as FBI agents using shiny new television cameras and tape recorders to interview the demonstrators along with the familiar faces of the Washington press. More recently, a man recognized by reporters as an FBI agent was seen taking notes with reporters at a meeting convened by Representative William Anderson of Tennessee of Congressmen who were being briefed about the celebrated Berrigan conspiracy prosecution. The agent ran away when he was asked by a congressional aide to identify himself and drove away in a car that was traced through its license number to the FBI. But such tactics, which the FBI seems to disavow, are not as damaging to press independence as the Bureau's policy of infiltrating the press by employing journalists as paid informers. During the riot-conspiracy trial of the "Chicago Seven" two journalists—Louis Salzberg and Carl Gilman, testified for the prosecution and said that they had been paid FBI informants for years. When this task force inquired about this to the Justice Department, John W. Hushen, Director of Public Information, sent the following reply which he said was prepared by Director Hoover.

> "The FBI accepts from any person information which may be of value in the course of an FBI investigation. The FBI does not now, and never has actively recruited journalists as informers. However, there is no policy against accepting information from a journalist or any news media representative if it is volunteered, which was the case with Mr. Louis Salzberg and Mr. Carl Gilman. Both of these individuals furnished information to the FBI on a voluntary basis. They were paid for their services and expenses.

It is difficult to accept the characterization of these journalists' relationship with the FBI as merely suppliers of volunteered information. Mr. Salzberg's FBI salary—$600 per month—was his principal source of income for at least 1 year. Mr. Gilman was on the FBI payroll for 2 years, receiving about $10,000 in pay and expenses. Their information may have been volunteered in the sense that they initially broached the idea of becoming paid informants to an FBI agent—rather than the other way around—but as a practical matter their work as regular paid informants meant that the FBI had infiltrated the press.

It seems logical that the same considerations that prompted Mr. Hoover to forbid his agents to pose as journalists should preclude the FBI agents from accepting journalists as paid informants. Obviously, if journalists or any other citizens volunteer information as acts of citizenship, any law enforcement agency should gratefully accept it. But an infallible test exists for determining whether information is actually being volunteered as an act of citizenship, or whether the informant has become an undercover arm of the Government—that is whether he gets paid for his information. Thus it seems that when the FBI pays journalists for their services as informants, then the journalists' profession has been infiltrated by the FBI. The task force concluded that the present FBI policy is wrong, and that journalists should not be employed as paid informants.

I would like to add here, Mr. Chairman, that I have been informed that there may be a dissent by one member of our task force from that conclusion, and that is Roger Rook, the district attorney of Clackamas County.

The task force also felt, Mr. Chairman, that the practice of news reporters accepting employment as informers is unethical and contrary to the trust required of professional journalists. The members expressed the hope in their report that the profession would condemn and discourage this practice.

Senator Ervin. Irrespective of specific instances, isn't it undoubtedly true that the press performs its obligations to society best when it is absolutely independent of Government?

Mr. Graham. Yes, sir.

Senator Ervin. And one of the principal obligations which rests upon the press is to point out the errors and deficiencies of Government for the purpose of enabling the public to demand that those errors and deficiencies be corrected?

Mr. Graham. Yes, sir.

Senator Ervin. And the press disables itself to some extent to perform this obligation when it places itself under obligation as employees of the Government, does it not?

Mr. Graham. Yes, sir. Mr. Chairman, the FBI of course has certain categories of people which it will not infiltrate. For instance, until very lately it would not recruit informers who were less than 18 years of age. I understand that that has been modified lately. But there are groups and such a policy concedes that there are—that should not be infiltrated as a matter of policy. And I feel that it would be a good policy to add reporters to those groups that should not be infiltrated.

Senator Ervin. In other words, the press functions better when it is not subject to constraints which prevent it from operating effectively, especially so far as Government action is concerned?

Mr. Graham. Yes.

Senator Ervin. And many things, it seems to me, have a tendency to curb the purpose of the press. For example, I have heard some Governors of various States being accused of appointing very influential newspapermen to honorary positions of one kind or the other in the hope that they would therefore get a very favorable presentation of their administration's work. I think that that is one way that is perfectly legitimate by which the press is to some extent disabled to perform its duties to the public.

Mr. Graham. And of course many journalists wouldn't take part in that kind of thing.

With regard to the underground press, Mr. Chairman, I know that you have heard testimony from a person who has made an extensive study of the subject. There are a few points that we saw that we would like to add.

If there is an inherent tension between the press and the Government, the friction is multiplied with regard to the underground press. It seems to have a special genius for antagonizing officialdom, yet it has little or none of the establishment press' protective political clout. As the frictions between militants of the political left and the Government have increased in the past few years, so have the occasions upon which local law enforcement officials have become aggrieved by statements in the underground press:

> The Los Angeles Free Press was fined $1,000 for having published a purloined list of State narcotics agents, and its publisher was placed on probation for several years.
> Dallas police raided an underground newspaper and hauled away 2 tons of material from an underground newspaper in an "obscenity" raid—yet failed to obtain an obscenity conviction that would stand up in Federal court.
> The Police Department at Buffalo, N.Y., drove the Black Panther newspaper from the streets by announcing its intention to arrest any vendors selling the publication.
> Officials in Los Angeles, Philadephia, Providence, and Richmond denied press credentials to the reporters of the local underground newspapers.
> The San Diego Street Journal's office was searched by police without a warrant and its street vendors handcuffed, searched, and jailed for loitering and obstructing the sidewalk.

There have been numerous other allegations by the underground press of heavy-handed treatment by law enforcement officials. In Orpheus, a bimonthly publication of articles drawn from various underground newspapers, the underground press has described its situation as follows:

> Although these papers have been evicted from their offices and homes, harrassed by the police, had their street sellers arrested en masse, had their benefit parties raided, been bombed, burned, beaten, gypped, framed and lost printer after printer, the underground press continues to increase in size and number.

The list above included only those incidents that have been verified in sworn court testimony or reported in the "straight" press, but that is evidence enough that some law enforcement officials have used their officials authority against the underground press in a way in which it would never have been invoked against the establishment press. These actions seem to have been based upon an erroneous assumption that underground publications forfeit some degree of their protection under the First Amendment when they violate standards of taste, preach a tolerance of drugs and fornication and criticize the police. The result has been a double standard of treatment between the underground and the establishment press—a double standard that is inconsistent with the First Amendment's guarantee of freedom of the press.

A notable lack of attention has been given to this by the "straight" press. Of the numerous instances that were brought to the task force's attention in which elements of the underground press protested that they had been abused by the police, a majority were not mentioned in either the news or editorial columns of the establishment press. In those incidents that have developed into court cases, the underground press has been left largely to its own fragile devices by the more affluent elements of the news media. Others in the journalistic profession stood by and gave no aid in three legal actions involving the underground press that produced legal precedents damaging to all newsmen—the prosecution of the Los Angeles Free Press for theft, the subpenaing of the editor of the Madison Kaleidoscope after the bombing at the University of Wisconsin in 1970, and the denial of press credentials to the Los Angeles Free Press' reporters.

It might be asked, Mr. Chairman, why this has been brought to the attention of a congressional subcommittee, since the underground press' difficulties have usually been with local officials. The reason, of course, is that it is the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution that is being violated. It is intolerable that any element of the press should be denied its protection—but if that is not enough reason to oppose this double standard, another reason is that legal precedents are being set that can come back to haunt the entire fourth estate. Last spring, the Supreme Court refused, with three Justices dissenting, to review a California decision upholding the denial of press cards to underground press personnel. The lower court's decision rejected out of hand the idea that the First Amendment gives newsmen a right of access to the scene of public disorders and upheavals. As Justice William O. Douglas noted when the Court refused to intervene in the Dallas case mentioned above:

> If this search and destroy technique (by the police) can be done against this Dallas newspaper, then it can be done to the New York Times (or) the Washington Post.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Ervin. Mr. Graham, do you agree with me that the first amendment grants its freedoms to all persons within the boundaries of our country?

Mr. Graham. Yes, sir.

Senator Ervin. And that, consequently, it grants its freedoms to both the wise and the foolish?

Mr. Graham. Yes.

Senator Ervin. The profound and the shallow?

Mr. Graham. Yes.

Senator Ervin. The devout and the ungodly? And those that hate our country and its institutions as well as to those who love our country and its institutions?

Mr. Graham. Yes; I do.

Senator Ervin. And do you agree with me that until the mere expression of ideas ceases and crime ensues, that the best interests of our country are served by recognizing the fact that the First Amendment protects the utterances of all kinds and conditions of men?

Mr. Graham. Yes, sir.

Senator Ervin. I thank you for a very interesting statement and for the disclosure to the subcommittee of some things that have not been brought to our attention before. I want to thank both of you gentlemen for the assistance you have given this subcommittee.

Counsel?

Mr. Pursley. Mr. Graham, I would like to ask you what has been the traditional basis for local officials granting or denying press credentials to members of the press corps?

Mr. Graham. Well, Mr. Pursley, as I understand it, in many places press credentials are viewed as worthless pieces of paper. In my previous press experience we knew all the police and they knew us in the smaller cities. And when we came running up to the scene of some disaster they let us through. However, in the major cities they have had to limit access to disasters. And the theory normally is that anyone who is a journalist should have a press pass. In Los Angeles, although the city of Los Angeles and the county of Los Angeles together had given credentials to some 3,000 newsmen, when the eight news photographers for the underground paper applied, they were told that this would be too many, and they were turned down. And the Supreme Court of the United States denied certiorari in that case.

Mr. Pursley. Do you know of any specific examples where local authorities have cited politically-oriented bases for denying the issuance of press credentials?

Mr. Graham. Well, in the Los Angeles case one of the officials was quoted as having said that he wouldn't let his daughter read that paper, that it was a vulgar sheet, and it was rabble-rousing, and he didn't think they should have press credentials. But obviously, public officials, whatever their motives, are usually able to cloak them in more respectful reasons.

I must say that in the incident at Providence there appears to have been some justification for what was done. Press passes were given to some of the underground reporters, and they came back with a platoon of others who wanted them, too. And you have to start drawing lines, I assume, at some place.

Senator Ervin. Thank you.

Mr. Ebner. Mr. Graham, one question please. In mentioning the double standard that you believe often applies to the underground press, I would certainly agree with you in a lot of the examples you mentioned. But you didn't mean to imply that the first amendment would prohibit any legitimate prosecution for a criminal act which was committed by the underground press, did you?

Mr. Graham. Of course I don't believe that the press can commit a criminal act under most circumstances, individuals can commit acts—unless you mean obscenity. Do you mean that?

Mr. Ebner. Not necessarily. I was thinking particularly of the first example you gave where the Los Angeles Free Press was fined $10,000 for having published a purloined list. I presume that was because they violated some criminal statute.

Mr. Graham. They were found guilty of having published a list of narcotics informers, and they were indicted and tried for that, and they were found guilty. To my mind that was an unconstitutional conviction. And all I can say is that if people who print information that public officials deem to be confidential because it originated in some Government office—if they are all subject to prosecution for theft—I believe all of us had better get our striped suits out, because all of us do that all the time. Because this was the underground press it was prosecuted. I don't see much difference between what the New York Times did in the Pentagon Papers and what the Los Angeles Free Press did. But the New York Times is too big to be prosecuted.

Mr. Ebner. In other words, you are drawing a distinction solely because this was an underground press and not because there might have been some specific criminal statute violated in this case? Do you know for a fact that there was not a criminal statute involved at all?

Mr. Graham. I am sure that there is a criminal statute which says it is a crime to steal, and to receive stolen goods. But I am just saying that all of the reporters in this room have had pieces of paper which came out of a Government office without the consent of the head of that office, and we have printed that information, and none of us have ever been prosecuted, although perhaps technically it could have been done.

Mr. Ebner. But you would draw a distinction between that situation and the situation where perhaps the reporter himself stole it, or an agent of the newspaper?

Mr. Graham. This person did not—I should have made that clear—there was no allegation that the reporters for this paper went in and did the theft. A young man who was a clerk in the State troopers' office became disenchanted with what he thought was over-zealous penetration by narcotics agents of the public, and so he handed this out to representatives of the underground press. They didn't break and enter, it was none of that.

Mr. Ebner. Nevertheless, you would agree that if there were a criminal act committed by a newspaper, underground or otherwise, that prosecution would not be unconstitutional in your view, that the first amendment does not protect such acts?

Mr. Graham. I do not believe that a newspaper can commit a criminal act, other than under our obscenity laws as they stand today. Now, individuals can commit criminal acts.

Mr. Ebner. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Ervin. There is a question in your answer that is very intriguing to me. One thing that has bothered me about such incidents where a person, a Government employee, takes confidential information and gives it to the newspaperman—I am not talking about the legal aspects of it now—is whether there is any moral distinction being made between the act of the Government employee in giving classified information orally and the newspaperman receiving such information and the giving of information to the newspaperman, by a Government employee, that happens to be written out on a piece of Government paper and marked classified?

Mr. GRAHAM. I see no distinction.

Senator ERVIN. And isn't the prosecution in those cases fundamentally prosecution for stealing or receiving the information rather than the piece of paper that the information is on.

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. I am frank to state that as a lawyer I have been baffled by that kind of question. There are laws against stealing, and there are laws against receiving stolen property, knowing that it has been stolen. We had some very intriguing testimony yesterday from a great authority in this field. Professor Emerson of the Yale Law School. I asked him about that question, and he testified in substance that he didn't think that the Constitution permitted Congress or the legislature to make it a crime for a member of the press to receive a stolen Government document and publish that document. He took the position that receipt of the Government paper with the information on it was in essence, under the First Amendment, a part of the act of publication. Since publication is protected by the first amendment, the act of receiving the information for publication should not be made a crime by the Government under the first amendment. Otherwise there would be interference with the full exercise of the First Amendment. Now, the judge and myself might be troubled with that reasoning, but it is very intriguing, and was advanced here yesterday by a man whose preeminence in the field of the First Amendment is recognized throughout the United States.

Mr. GRAHAM. Apparently the Justice Department has been guided to some extent by that, because they have indicted Daniel Ellsberg for stealing, for theft—one of the two counts in connection with the Pentagon papers. And apparently either of those same pieces of paper or xeroxes of them went to a number of publications, and they have not been indicted for receiving stolen goods.

Senator ERVIN. Your protest against the course of action taken in the case of the underground newspaper in Los Angeles arises out of the fact that you thought they were really punishing the paper not for receiving a stolen piece of government paper, but for publishing the information which the Government had accumulated.

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. Judge, I wouldn't ask you to comment on this question unless of course you want to. It is a very intriguing area to me.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I didn't quite hear you sir.

Senator ERVIN. I wouldn't ask you to express any opinion on these points, because I would hate to be asked myself if I hadn't given it great consideration.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I can say that I am somewhat baffled.

Senator ERVIN. So am I. Thank you very much.

(The statement of Mr. Graham follows:)

TESTIMONY OF FRED P. GRAHAM, RAPPORTEUR FOR THE TWENTIETH CENTURY FUND'S TASK FORCE ON GOVERNMENTAL POWER AND PRESS FREEDOM

Mr. Chairman: It is a pleasure to accept the Subcommittee's invitation to testify about several particularly interesting developments that came to the notice of the Task Force on Governmental Power and Press Freedom. The Task Force's Chairman, Judge Williamson, has summarized for you the group's conclusions about press subpenas and the Pentagon Papers litigation. My testimony concerns two less obvious areas of friction between the Government and the press: a subtle and apparently growing form of governmental penetration of the news media, in which police either pose as newsmen or employ them as paid informers; and a constitutional double standard applied by some officials to the underground press, granting it a watered-down version of First Amendment protection or none at all.

POLICE POSING AS JOURNALISTS

In recent months a series of unrelated and apparently uncoordinated instances have come to light in which personnel of government intelligence and law enforcement agencies have posed as news reporters or photographers. In a variation of this, law enforcement agencies have paid reporters and press photographers to collect information for them, thus using journalism as a guise to obtain material for governmental use. These incidents appear to be remarkably widespread, both geographically and organizationally. They have occured from Washington to Saigon and within the Army, Federal Bureau of Investigation and local police.

Whether such incidents were common in the past and were not discovered, is not known. What does seem significant is that a rash of these occurences has come to light within the past two years—almost in rhythm with the rising tempo of dissent, violence and official concern about dissent and violence. In fact, most of the instances that have been discovered involved police investigations of political dissenters—groups about which the public should be as fully informed as possible. However, the frequency with which police have been found to be posing as newsmen in recent months has tended to raise barriers of suspicion that have made it more difficult for the press to cover many events.

No one knows, of course, how often this has actually happened. But the Task Force was able to verify at least a dozen instances within the past two years in which either sworn testimony or a responsible police official conceded that it did:

In Saigon, two U.S. agents were found to have infiltrated the press corps.

The Army Security Agency painted a van with the name of a nonexistent television company and filmed demonstrators at the Democratic National Convention in 1968.

Army Intelligence agents also posed as T.V. cameramen during the Presidential Inauguration activities in Washington in January 1969.

A female intelligence agent for the District of Columbia police department posed as a reporter to gain access to a welfare rights group's meeting.

Army intelligence agents obtained press credentials from the New York City Police Department to cover actions of H. Rap Brown and Stokely Carmichael in New York during the summer riots of 1967.

In Wichita, Kansas, press credentials were given to local policemen during a visit by Vice President Agnew.

A member of the Chicago Police Department's Intelligence Division was discovered posing as a newsman to gain information from black students at a protest rally.

Two plainclothes officers of the Nassau County, N.Y. police force posed as photographers for a weekly newspaper in order to photograph the audience at a veterans' antiwar rally.

An Army agent masqueraded as a reporter for the Richmond Times Dispatch to obtain information on the Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

A Detroit policeman posed as a news photographer to observe a General Motors stockholders' meeting.

> In Albuquerque a city policeman posed as an Associated Press photographer at the University of New Mexico campus during demonstrations protesting the invasion of Cambodia in the Spring of 1970.
> Complaints by newsmen covering July 4 ceremonies in San Juan, Puerto Rico that police were posing as reporters led to an admission by the commonwealth Secretary that his department had been issuing press credentials to police for about eight years.

Police officials in New York City, Chicago, Detroit and the District of Columbia have issued orders condemning the practice of police agents posing as newsmen. The Defense Department has issued an order that "there shall be no covert or otherwise deceptive surveillance or penetration of civilian organization unless specifically authorized by the Secretary of Defense or his designee." This order is regarded by Pentagon officials as prohibiting agents from posing as journalists.

All but one of the instances listed above involve police or intelligence agents masquerading as newsmen to gather information about dissident groups as to investigate other "political" matters. The reason seems obvious: Law enforcement agencies tend to be ill-informed about political dissenters who do not fit the traditional "criminal" mold, and newsmen often have easy access to them. However, when policemen masquerade as newsmen, the same kind of forces come into play that arise when journalists are subpoenaed, except that the effect is more direct. As in the subpena situation, the target groups are usually highly suspicious of officialdom and "establishment" institutions, and are likely to freeze the press out at any indication that the media is serving law enforcement. This is compounded when the dissenters have good reason to believe that the "journalist" or "news cameraman" that take such interest in their activities may very well be reporting to City Hall rather than to the city desk.

The Task Force has listed a series of instances of hostility and distrust demonstrated by some radical groups toward the press which appears to be due in part, at least, to these actions by the police. Newsmen have been assaulted by militants and excluded from their meetings. However, the most serious threat posed by this tactic is to the public. Its First Amendment right to be fully informed of developments within all elements of our society is threatened by this law enforcement tactic. The principal reason why it should be stopped is not that it makes the reporters' job more difficult, but that it may on occasion make that job impossible, the availability of information will be impaired.

Furthermore, it seems likely that the increased use of this tactic will rapidly dissipate its usefulness to the police. As such incidents come to public notice, people will become reluctant to give important information to "reporters" not known to them. As newsmen are increasingly frozen out of dissenters' meetings, so will the masquerading police agents. In the end law enforcement as well as the public will be shorter on information than before.

The F.B.I. presents a special variation of this phenomenon. Its director, J. Edgar Hoover, stated in a letter to this Task Force that "F.B.I. agents are not permitted to pose as reporters or press photographers in the course of their investigations." While there is no evidence that F.B.I. agents actually flash press cards or use bogus television organizations as "fronts" there have been indications that F.B.I. men do occasionally gain access to information by allowing others to think that they are journalists. At a draft-card burning demonstration outside the Supreme Court in June of 1968, reporters for the Washington Post and Boston Globe spotted men whom they recognized as F.B.I. agents using shiny new television cameras and tape recorders to interview the demonstrators along with the familiar faces of the Washington press. More recently, a man recognized by reporters as an F.B.I. agent was seen taking notes with reporters at a meeting convened by Rep. William Anderson of Tennessee of Congressmen who were being briefed about the celebrated Berrigan conspiracy prosecution. The agent ran away when he was asked by a Congressional aide to identify himself and drove away in a car that was traced through its license number to the F.B.I. But such tactics, which the F.B.I. seems to disavow, are not as damaging to press independence as the Bureau's policy of infiltrating the press by employing journalists as paid informers. During the riot-conspiracy trial of the "Chicago Seven" two journalists—Louis Salzberg and Carl Gilman, testified for the prosecution and said that they had been paid F.B.I. informants for years. When this Task Force enquired about this to the Justice Department, John W. Hushen, Director of Public Information, sent the following reply which he said was "prepared by Director Hoover":

> "The FBI accepts from any person information which may be of value in the course of an FBI investigation. The FBI does not now, and never has actively recruited journalists as informers. However, there is no policy against accepting information from a journalist or any news media representative if it is volunteered, which was the case with Mr. Louis Salzberg and Mr. Carl Gilman. Both of these individuals furnished information to the FBI on a voluntary bases. They were paid for their services and expenses."

It is difficult to accept the characterization of these journalists' relationship with the F.B.I. as merely suppliers of "volunteered" information. Mr. Salzberg's F.B.I. salary—$600 per month—was his principal source of income for at least one year. Mr. Gilman was on the F.B.I. payroll for two years, receiving about $10,000 in pay and expenses. Their information may have been "volunteered" in the sense that they initially broached the idea of becoming paid informants to an F.B.I. agent—rather than the other way around—but as a practical matter their work as regular paid informants meant that the F.B.I. had infiltrated the press.

It seems logical that the same considerations that prompted Mr. Hoover to forbid his agents to pose as journalists should preclude the F.B.I. agents from accepting journalists as paid informants. Obviously, if journalists or any other citizens volunteer information as acts of citizenship, any law enforcement agency should gratefully accept it. But an infallible test exists for determining whether information is actually being "volunteered" as an act of citizenship, or whether the informant has become an undercover arm of the Government—that is whether he gets paid for his information. Thus it seems that when the F.B.I. pays journalists for their "services" as informants, then the journalists' profession has been infiltrated by the F.B.I. The Task Force concluded that the present F.B.I. policy is wrong, and that journalists should not be employed as paid informants.

The Task Force also felt, Mr. Chairman, that the practice of news reporters accepting employment as informers is unethical and contrary to the trust required of professional journalists. The members expressed the hope in their report that the profession would condemn and discourage this practice.

THE UNDERGROUND PRESS

Mr. Chairman, I understand that you have heard testimony from a person who has made an extensive study of the underground press, so I will refer to it briefly, from the standpoint of the Task Force's examination of the matter.

If there is an inherent tension between the press and the government, the friction is multiplied with regard to the underground press. It seems to have a special genius for antagonizing officialdom, yet it has little or none of the establishment press' protective political power. As the frictions between militants of the political left and the Government have increased in the past few years, so have the occasions upon which local law enforcement officials have become aggrieved by statements in the underground press:

> The Los Angeles Free Press was fined $10,000 for having published a purloined list of state narcotics agents.
> Dallas police raided an underground newspaper and hauled away two tons of material from an underground newspaper in an "obscenity" raid—yet failed to obtain an obscenity conviction that would stand up in Federal Court.
> The Police Department of Buffalo, New York, drove the Black Panther newspaper from the streets by announcing its intention to arrest any vendors selling the publication.
> Officials in Los Angeles, Philadelphia, Providence and Richmond denied press credentials to the reporters of the local underground newspapers.
> The San Diego Street Journal's office was searched by police without a warrant and its street vendors handcuffed, searched and jailed for loitering and obstructing the sidewalk.

There have been numerous other allegations by the underground press of heavy-handed treatment by law enforcement officials. In Orpheus, a bimonthly publication of articles drawn from various underground newspapers, the underground press has described its situation as follows:

"Although these papers have been evicted from their offices and homes, harrassed by the police, had their street sellers arrested en masse, had their benefit parties raided, been bombed, burned, beaten, gypped, framed and lost printer after printer, the underground press continues to increase in size and number."

The list above included only those incidents that have been verified in sworn court testimony or reported in the "straight" press, but that is evidence enough that some law enforcement officials have used their officials authority against the underground press in a way in which it would never have been invoked against the establishment press. These actions seem to have been based upon an erroneous assumption that underground publications forfeit some degree of their protection under the First Amendment when they violate standards of taste, preach a tolerance of drugs and fornication and criticize the police. The result has been a double standard of treatment between the underground and the establishment press—a double standard that is inconsistent with the First Amendment's guarantee of freedom of the press.

A notable lack of attention has been given to this by the "straight" press. Of the numerous instances that were brought to the Task Force's attention in which elements of the underground press protested that they had been abused by the police, a majority were not mentioned in either the news or editorial columns of the establishment press. In those incidents that have developed into court cases, the underground press has been left largely to its own fragile devices by the more affluent elements of the news media. Others in the journalistic profession stood by and gave no aid in three legal actions involving the underground press that produced legal precedents damaging to all newsmen—the prosecution of the Los Angeles Free Press for theft, the subpoenaing of the editor or the Madison Kaleidoscope after the bombing at the University of Wisconsin in 1970, and the denial of press credentials to the Los Angeles Free Press' reporters.

It might be asked, Mr. Chairman, why this has been brought to the attention of a Congressional subcommittee, since the underground press' difficulties have usually been with local officials. The reason, of course, is that it is the First Amendment to the United States Constitution that is being violated. It is intolerable that any element of the press should be denied its protection—but if that is not enough reason to oppose this double standard, another reason is that legal precedents are being set that can come back to haunt the entire Fourth Estate. Last spring, the Supreme Court refused, with three Justices dissenting, to review a California decision upholding the denial of press cards to underground press personnel. The lower Court's decision rejected out of hand the idea that the First Amendment gives newsmen a right of access to the scene of public disorders and upheavals. As Justice William O. Douglas noted when the Court refused to intervene in the Dallas case mentioned above: "If this search and destroy technique (by the police) can be done against this Dallas newspaper, then it can be done to the New York Times (or) the Washington Post."

Senator ERVIN. Counsel will call the next witness.

Mr. BASKIR. Mr. Chairman, our next witness is Mr. William H. Fitzpatrick, editor of the Ledger-Star, Norfolk, Va.

William H. Fitzpatrick is vice president and executive editor of Landmark Communications, Inc. Newspapers in the Landmark group are the Virginian-Pilot and the Ledger-Star in Norfolk, (Va.); the Greensboro (N.C.) Daily News and the Greensboro Record; and the Roanoke (Va.) Times and World-News.

Mr. Fitzpatrick, a native of New Orleans, was awarded the Pulitzer Prize for distinguished editorial writing in 1951, while editor of the New Orleans States, for editorials opposing certain United Nations treaties. Under his editorship, the States earlier won the Sigma Delta Chi "courage in journalism" award for its contribution to the defeat in 1946 of the New Orleans arm of the Huey Long machine. He was vice president and director of the Times-Picayune Publishing Co. when he went to New York in 1952 as associate editor of the Wall Street Journal. He was named editor of the Ledger-Star in Norfolk in 1960.

Senator ERVIN. I am delighted to welcome you to the subcommittee, and I wish to express to you our deep appreciation for your willingness to come and give us the benefit of your observations in a field in which you have had much practical experience.

STATEMENT OF WILLIAM H. FITZPATRICK, EDITOR, LEDGER-STAR, NORFOLK, VA.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Thank you very much, Senator. I am delighted to be here.

I would like first of all to make the statement that our publisher committed the egregious error of making me no longer editor of the Ledger-Star, but executive editor of the six Landmark newspapers. And I mention that only for the purposes of registering a disclaimer.

I speak for none of the other editors, but only for myself. And I confine my remarks to the newsman's privilege.

The subject of granting a privilege to newsmen is not a new one. In 1959, as associate editor of the Wall Street Journal, I took part in a panel discussion on the subject before the New York State Society of Newspaper Editors, and a great deal of what I have to say here today applies as much as it did then, in my opinion.

All of us can agree, I am sure, that those who support the so-called shield law, or newsmen's privilege, are supporting a proposal that they think to be in the public interest. Nonetheless, support for a shield law is not by any means unanimous among editors. The convention report—called Problems of Journalism—of the American Society of Newspaper Editors carried comment, one can hardly characterize it as debate, on the shield law. By my count, Donald Sterling of the Oregon Journal, George Kentera then of the Newark News, Robert Smith of the Minneapolis Star, John McMullan of the Philadelphia Inquirer and I expressed some doubt concerning either the wording or effectiveness of a bill almost exactly similar to S. 1311, or doubt that a need exists for the legislation it proposed. I know also that other editors question the idea, for a note on page 42 of the proceedings shows that following a request by Newbold Noyes of the Washington Star, then president of ASNE, for a show of hands as to the wisdom of leading a move to secure a national shield law, the official count was described as follows:

"The results appeared to indicate support for the shield law proposal in a 4 to 1 ratio."

This means of course that 20 percent of the editors present weren't convinced of the need for such a law.

Indeed, in my view, the proposition that newsmen ought to be shielded by law from revealing their sources of information deserves to be questioned on at least three levels.

One is the relation of this suggested privilege to the public good.

One is to ask whether the granting of such a privilege as envisioned in S. 1311 does not actually limit freedoms now believed to exist by creating exceptions to the privilege it claims to grant.

And one is a question that probably ought to be addressed to my colleagues in the news media, but which nonetheless has a bearing on one of the bothersome questions of the times; the credibility of the news media. That question is to ask how the Nation's press, the acknowledged champions of the right of the public to know all where the public interest is involved, can at the same time champion for itself a privilege to remain silent on matters that may also involve the public interest.

One argument goes that if the privilege is not granted, newspapers will not be able to gather news as heretofore. It is also said that a number of States have granted such a privilege. As of last April in the discussion in ASNE it was brought out that 17 have done so. The answer to that, it seems plain, is that 33 States have not granted such a privilege and newspapers in those States seem to have got along nicely without such a law.

There have been attempts in the past to justify the newspaper privilege on the ground that it is similar to privileges known in the past as the lawyer-client, doctor-patient, and husband-wife privileges.

Yet all of you gentlemen know that the so-called lawyer-client, doctor-patient, husband-wife privileges over the years have been narrowed in the interests of the administration of justice. At the same time, newspapers should remember that such privileges exact a price. Lawyers and doctors are answerable to the State, for they are licensed. I don't think any newspaper man wants to be licensed or to have his newspaper licensed.

This is not the only question to arise. There are others. They are not new; some were pointed out in 1949, when the New York State Law Revision Commission went pretty thoroughly into newsmen's privilege from the viewpoint of an absolute privilege.

Some of the questions raised then were: What sorts of newsgathering and news-dissemination would come within the scope of such a law? Who should be covered? Everybody, or if not everybody, just a few? Publishers as well as reporters? What of a crime that the reporter himself observes? And what if he participates in it? What about the nature of the news in question? Assuming that the public interest may well be served by refusal to divulge a source of information when a mayor's official misdeeds are exposed, is there a like service to the public interest in permitting a reporter to use the privilege where the private indiscretions of a private citizen are concerned? Should the privilege exist only in criminal cases? What about libel actions? What about grand juries; or legislative bodies?

John McMullan, executive editor of the Philadelphia Inquirer, whom I mentioned earlier in this statement, in an article in the July/August 1971 ASNE Bulletin, asked his lawyers questions about H.R. 837, which is almost identical to S. 1311, and his lawyer, Harold Kohn, replied with this criticism:

> 1. The bill does not specifically state that it covers documents.
> 2. The current wording of the bill leaves open the possibility that the exception for materials published will be interpreted to swallow up the general protection granted confidential information.
> 3. The exception for allegedly defamatory information also holds the real potential of destroying the entire purpose of the proposed bill.

The question of what constitutes a defense based on the source of such information could cause much difficulty.

Such criticisms are only a measure of the difficulty of legislating in this field. I think that my predecessor at this table, Justice Williamson pointed that out.

Senator Ervin. Yes, he pointed out that there were four different ways to approach this problem.

Mr. Fitzpatrick. Some believe as I do that a shield law's privilege cannot be an absolute and that any privilege must acknowledge that the public interest must be paramount. Where the public interest is paramount, courts should require that sources be revealed.

Let it be noted that for many newspapermen there are circumstances under which no power on earth could force them to reveal a source of information. Let us assume that as a newsman I am handed by a person in a State highway department a set of documents. These documents clearly prove that some funny business in contracts has been going on. After due checking, the story is printed, and it stands up.

A legislative investigation follows, the newspaperman, myself, is sworn as a witness and on the stand is asked the name of his informant.

The investigating legislators are not going to get this from the newsman because the name of the informant in this case isn't pertinent and the man's identity is not at all necessary to serve the ends of justice. The disclosure could, however, serve the ends of vengeful injustice. And if the State legislators should vote this newsman in contempt, the State courts uphold the contempt, and a judge sentences me, I might have to live for a time in jail. But any newsman in that condition can live with himself, at least, and he may even acquire a little instant immortality.

Now, imagine another situation. A newsman is investigating a report that the local bank is in trouble because somebody has lifted some money. So he goes to the bank president who says the cashier stole $10,000 but please don't quote him as saying so. Instead of digging further, the newsman writes a story saying that an official of the bank says Joe Johnson, the cashier, stole $10,000; and let's also assume the newspaper is foolish enough to print it as it stands. I think most newsmen will agree that this could happen.

The police grab Joe Johnson and throw him in jail and after a few days of polite police questioning, they turn him loose. He hasn't stolen the money at all, it seems. Joe Johnson sues the bank for what happened to him, and the newsman is called as a witness in a civil suit. Can it seriously be claimed this newsman would be entitled to refuse on either moral or legal grounds, to reveal the sound of his information under oath, in a trial to arrive at justice to Joe Johnson? Will anyone argue that he is not himself obstructing justice by refusing to testify?

We all recognize that the press freedom anchored in article I of the Bill of Rights of the Constitution was placed there in the public interest. The founders believed that a freedom to print was necessary to preserve most other freedoms of free men. But it should be remembered that freedom to print is not an irresponsible freedom nor an unlimited one. I need not remind any of you gentlemen or any newspaperman of Justice Holmes' remark that "freedom of speech does not include shouting fire in a crowded theater." Nor should editors need reminding that, for all the self-congratulations, newspapers were restrained from publication of the Pentagon papers by Federal judges.

Neither is press freedom all that some editors, from time to time, might like it to mean. There are other freedoms possessed by others that sometimes clash with it, and one of them is directly concerned with bearing witness.

Articles VI and VII of the Bill of Rights have to do with criminal trials and civil suits. In both criminal trials and civil suits there are constitutional requirements for compulsory process to obtain witnesses in the search for truth and justice. Compulsory process means the right to subpena and the right of trial judges to hold witnesses in contempt for refusal to testify.

I believe there is no exception to this constitutional right to summon witnesses that excludes newsmen from the same responsibility to serve the public interest that is required of everybody else.

And there is another point, an alternative point, to be sure, that perhaps the most important of all to newspapermen, that ought to be considered. Surely it should be considered by those favoring a shield law.

If newspapers support the proposition that a grant of immunity to newspapermen from testifying can be limited in any way for any purpose by act of Congress, they are supporting a proposition that grants Congress a limiting power. Once the philosophy of limitation is adopted who will dare predict when the limitations on immunity will end?

As things are now, there are no spelled out rights to refuse to testify as to the sources of information nor are there any spelled out acts of Congress that would force disclosure.

In this, newspapermen are perhaps fortunate. For it permits the individual newspapermen to choose his course, right or wrong, according to his own principles. Balanced against the individual's concepts will be the concept of the individual court as to whether the cause of justice is served or not by the refusal. And here is exactly the point that Mr. Baskir made in his question earlier to one of my predecessors.

In sum, a shield law that attempts to exempt newsmen from testifying may be unconstitutional inasmuch as the Bill of Rights guarantees defendants the right to summon witnesses in criminal cases.

A shield law that includes exceptions is a dangerous precedent to the extent that it can become, by frequent amendment, a law that does not protect newsmen from revealing their sources but a law that requires them to do so.

A shield law that attempts to grant newsmen privileges other citizens do not possess is not an altogether becoming posture for newsmen to assume. I do not think newspapermen should be proud of seeking an immunity broader than anyone else posesses under the Constitution, and I find it ironic that some of us think it proper to demand disclosure where all others are concerned but deny disclosure where we are concerned. Surely it is understandable if the public begins to wonder whose interest, the public interest or our own interest, is our chief concern.

Senator Ervin. You maintain, as I interpret your statement, that any rule of law which grants a privilege against testifying limits the courts in their search for truth?

Mr. Fitzpatrick. I maintain, Senator Ervin, that if any such law were constitutional it would. I also don't believe that it would be constitutional.

Senator Ervin. There can be no doubt of the fact that any law which excuses anyone from testifying as to facts within their knowledge in a litigated case, civil or criminal, tends to disable—at least deprives—the court of the full power to investigate the truth.

Mr. Fitzpatrick. I believe newspapermen ought to be the last people summoned in cases like this, and that justice in the case at hand should require a newsman's testimony before he is summoned. If the truth can be found without his testimony, I think it would be best not to require him to testify.

Senator Ervin. Now Judge Williamson stated—and I think it is undoubtedly true—that if any such privileges are granted it cannot be based on the same reasons which sustain the other privileges. Under the law we have what is called the rule which grants the patient the right to object to the introduction in evidence of confidential communications made by him to his physician to enable his physician to prescribe for his disease, that a client can object to the admission in evidence of confidential communications which he made to his lawyer for the purpose of enabling his lawyer to prepare his case or his defense, and that a husband or a wife can object to the admission in a case of a confidential communication which he or she made to the other spouse in the course of the marital relationship, and in a few States we have what is called a priest penitent privilege under which a penitent can object to a priest testifying to a confidential communication which he made to his priest in an effort to obtain some relief at the hands of the priest from some psychological problem that was bothering him.

In every one of these cases the privilege is based upon the purpose of protecting the person who made the communication. Now, if a newsman's privilege could be established it couldn't possibly rest upon the protection of that, it would have to be based on some other foundation, wouldn't it?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I should think so, sir. I think these other privileges—I am not sure it would include the priest-penitent privilege, but they have all been limited by the law over the years in the administration of justice.

Senator ERVIN. Yes, in many States there have been statutes provided as to the physician patient relationship that the court can nevertheless require the disclosure where it is essential to the administration of justice. And of course the confidential communication between the lawyers and the client cannot be excluded where it was designed to perpetrate a fraud. So there are exceptions.

You have pointed out, I think, a very drastic and quite plausible situation in your illustration about the man Joe Johnson, who was thrown in jail on the false charge of having stolen bank funds. It is quite conceivable in that case that it would be impossible for Joe Johnson, who has been at the least slandered by or libeled by the publication, to recover damages against the real cause of his imprisonment, the official of the bank, or the bank, without the testimony of the newspaperman.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. I have to confess that I have many misgivings about this proposal, because I think Judge Williamson's testimony indicated the great difficulty of phrasing proper law and finding language which would express it. And as I stated to him, I don't want to belittle the linguistic capacity of my colleagues in Congress, but I am nevertheless constrained to say that I think the men that drew the first amendment probably surpassed them in capacity in that field.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Senator, if I may observe, those men also drew the other nine.

Senator ERVIN. You point out that the sixth amendment gives a man the right to confront his accusers, and gives him the right to have compulsory process to obtain witness for his defense. Therefore your position is that a privilege of kind envisioned in S. 1311 would conflict with that provision of the Constitution.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I am no lawyer, I am a simple newspaperman, but that is the way it seems to me, sir.

Senator ERVIN. It is a very interesting proposition that you have advanced. I believe it is original so far in these areas.

There is one thing certain. I think even though you plead not guilty to the offense of being a lawyer—to which I would have to plead guilty—I think it is clear to you and me both that any act Congress might pass in this field would be invalid if it conflicted with any provision of the Constitution. All that Congress can do is to pass laws which are in harmony with the Constitution, not laws which are inconsistent with its provisions.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Yes, sir.

Mr. BASKIR. Mr. Fitzpatrick, let me sort of return the compliment by taking the side of Mr. Graham and Justice Williamson and ask you to respond to their point. They said that the situation today is much different from what the press has had to face, or justice has had to face, in the past; there has been a great increase in the number of subpenas issued, they are now being issued presumably by the Federal authorities, they are apparently predominantly being issued in the context of political trials, they are being used as investigative aids—not in the course of grand jury investigations and not as direct evidence in the trial, and they are seeking not first hand information such as the examples that you gave, not evidence, but intelligence work. This is a different situation which now for the first time requires some legislative resolution. I wonder if you would respond to what you might say is their case.

Mr. Fitzpatrick. I think that I will agree that these are areas that may have developed—these may have developed in the last few years. I am not sure that they will continue that way. This is not the first time that newspapers have been under pressure from other areas of society. I just happen to have been raised in newspapers in New Orleans when the late Senator Long ran the State.

And we had a great deal of pressure on us. But we managed to be able to continue to print without a law that granted us a privilege of this sort.

I can see areas in which conditions might be greatly improved from newspapermen in covering the news. But I think that this is a situation where a confrontation is something that should be avoided. There are certain times and places when I think some part of the Constitution comes in conflict with other parts, and the best way you can work it out is, as you have suggested, through discussion. I think Mr. Graham pointed out that there has been a cessation in the past year of the use of subpenas after Attorney General Mitchell spoke to some of his more enthusiastic underlings. And I think this probably is a better way to go about it than to pass a law the full result of which to me is just impossible to foresee.

Mr. Baskir. Let me ask you also about the proposition I presented to them, and that is, when a reporter's view of what the public interest requires differs from that of a judge, the reporter is held in contempt, and the objection raised to such a situation is that a contempt citation is a lawless way of resolving the problem, although your testimony suggests that you approve of it. I wonder if you would reply to that objection, is it a lawless way of handling this problem?

Mr. Fitzpatrick. I think that there are certain cases when, as a newsman, I would not reveal my sources of information, unless I were convinced that this information was absolutely necessary to a determination of justice, and that a determination of justice depended solely on my testimony.

Otherwise I think I would refuse, and they could find out, whoever the people who were seeking this information were, could find it out some other way.

Mr. Baskir. You would be willing to face a contempt citation?

Mr. Fitzpatrick. I would be willing to go to jail under certain circumstances. I wouldn't welcome it every weekend, but I would be willing under certain circumstances to go to jail, certainly.

Mr. Baskir. Thank you.

Senator Ervin. Don't you think that this problem of the subpena has been greatly increased by overzealous prosecuting attorneys in criminal cases.

Mr. Fitzpatrick. I would certainly agree with that; yes, sir.

Senator Ervin. Don't you believe that a confrontation could be avoided in most cases by simple discussions between the district attorney and the newsman.

Mr. Fitzpatrick. I have had enough experience with district attorneys not to say this as an absolute, but I think in most cases you are perfectly correct, it could be.

I think an understanding of the problem could always aid to its solution.

Senator Ervin. Do you agree with me that many of the ills and annoyances in a growing society are due to a lack of restraint on the part of the people who exercise public authority.

Mr. Fitzpatrick. I beg your pardon, sir.

Senator Ervin. Do you agree with me that a very large percentage of the ills and annoyances we suffer are due to a lack of restraint on the part of the persons who exercise governmental power.

Mr. Fitzpatrick. There is no question about that.

Senator Ervin. Don't you also agree with me that most of the information which newspapermen gather from individuals or groups that society regard as dangerous would be inadmissible in courts as being pure hearsay.

Mr. Fitzpatrick. I agree, sir.

Senator Ervin. So a lot of these overzealous district attorneys who have an indiscriminate practice of issuing subpenas, without making such preliminary investigations as to the admissibility of the testimony they are seeking from the persons who are subpenaed, cause a lot of the trouble.

Mr. Fitzpatrick. There is no question about it, sir.

Senator Ervin. In addition to the illustration you give about the libel suit, it occurs to me that it is possible, and quite probable, that a situation would arise where a news photographer goes out to take photographs of a rally or a demonstration where he believes violence is likely to occur, and violence does actually ensue. Suppose somebody is murdered by one of the demonstrators, who cannot be identified in any way except by a photograph taken of the demonstration at the time the homicide occurred, and that photograph has never been published.

Now, don't you think a very strong case could be made for the proposition that law enforcement officers should be permitted under those circumstances to require the news photographer to present this unpublished photograph which shows the guilty party actually committing the murder.

Mr. Fitzpatrick. I would wonder how they would know about it if it were unpublished. But I would like any photographer on any newspaper I am associated with to come forward with such evidence if he has it, and the necessity of the subpena would be avoided.

Senator Ervin. Thank you very much.

Mr. Fitzpatrick. Thank you, sir.

Mr. Baskir. Mr. Chairman, our final witness this morning is Mr. Eugene S. Duffield, who is director of the Magazine Publishers Association, and appearing on behalf of the association.

Senator Ervin. I am delighted to welcome you to the subcommittee, and I express to you the appreciation of the subcommittee for your willingness to come before us and give us the benefit of your experience and observations in a field in which you have had much experience.

STATEMENT OF EUGENE S. DUFFIELD, DIRECTOR OF THE MAGAZINE PUBLISHERS ASSOCIATION

Mr. Duffield. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Let me modify one thing that counsel said. The Magazine Publishers Association certainly induced me to come here this morning, but what I shall say has not been approved by the association. I am speaking, as you will see, in my own right. And that includes an official position with the association.

I am Eugene S. Duffield. I am president of Popular Science Publishing Co. We publish two magazines (Popular Science and Outdoor Life) copies of which are before you on the rostrum. I have been a director of the Magazine Publishers Association for 12 years and for the past year I have been chairman of the board. I have spent 33 years in magazine and newspaper publishing on both the editorial and the business sides.

Other witnesses have discussed First Amendment problems arising out of editorial activities. I would like to present for your consideration two interrelated First Amendment questions affecting the commercial, or business, activities of a free press.

At this point I would like to interject that this aspect of the freedom of the press has not received much attention from law professors, legislators, or even editors. But in my opinion, editorial freedom will be largely hollow rhetoric if the press does not have the economic muscle with which to exercise that freedom.

The first question I would like to discuss is this:

Under the First Amendment can anyone, including any government, dictate what must be said on the advertising pages of a free press?

The second question is: Does the First Amendment protect a free press from being starved into impotence by direct or indirect government interference with its sources of revenue?

Before I give examples of each problem and discuss them, let me dispose of the obvious. Of course, the First Amendment does not protect fraudulent selling in or by the press any more than it protects libel. What I shall be talking about is the truthful selling of lawful products and services.

The keynote of what I urge today can be expressed in two sentences. One sentence comes from an opinion by Justice Douglas. The second is from a circuit court decision that was affirmed by the Supreme Court.

Justice Douglas said: "The press in its historic connotation comprehends every sort of publication which affords a vehicle of information, and let me stress the words, "opinion."

The Circuit Court said:

> If the advertisement is not false, defendants have a constitutional right to utilize it even though its content and blatancy may annoy both the (Federal Trade) Commission and the General public.

What do these two sentences mean?

To me they mean that, except for fraud, the content of advertising pages should be as thoroughly protected by the First Amendment as are editorial pages. No one, including Government, should dictate what must be said or must not be said in the advertising pages of a free press. Under the First Amendment that decision must be left to the conscience and judgment of publishers, just as are editorial decisions.

Yet in three ways, the Federal Government seems to be trying to interfere with freedom of the press to control advertising pages.

First, the Government seems to be saying that advertising must be limited to quantifiable facts. The implication is that statements not verifiable by laboratory or statistical evidence cannot be used in advertising. Opinion is to be proscribed. For example, the manufacturer of a spinning reel may not express the opinion that his reel offers the best value unless he can prove it by laboratory tests, field tests, and price comparisons.

Second, the Government shows signs of wanting to tell publishers: "If you run this advertisement, you must run that advertisement." For example, if you publish automobile advertising, you must publish clean air ads. Or, if you have published an ad saying that bread is good for kids, you must publish another ad denying the first one.

Third, the Government shows signs of saying, "If you publish ads of a certain kind, you must include in each one certain words displayed in a certain way." For example, if you publish an ad for vitamins, you must leave one-fifth of the ad white and print therein black lettering a quarter-inch-high saying: "The need for these vitamins in human nutrition has not been established."

In each of these three incipient attempts to dictate what shall or shall not appear in advertisements, the Government is not confronting the press directly. It is attempting to control the press indirectly by dictating to advertisers. Government has not said to publishers directly: "You must not publish ads unless they say thus and so." Such an attempt would produce a clear first amendment confrontation. The Government instead is proceeding toward the same end by indirection. It is saying to manufacturers, you may not offer advertisements for publication unless they say thus and so. This indirection does not avoid the first amendment, in my opinion. It changes the angle from which the first amendment must be applied, but it does not fake the First Amendment out of play, as I shall explain later.

Let me conclude the first part of my statement by expressing a hope. It is this: If the Government persists in these attempts to dictate what must be said on advertising pages, I hope some advertisers will have enough courage to prepare and offer ads that defy the Government's dictates. I know they will find publishers of equal courage who will join them in a direct First Amendment challenge to the Government.

Thus far I have discussed the question: Under the First Amendment can anyone dictate what must be said or must not be said on the advertising pages of a free press?

I turn now to the second question: Does the First Amendment protect a free press from being starved into impotence by direct or indirect Government interference with its sources or revenue? I should like to discuss direct interference and indirect interference separately.

As to Government actions that would interfere directly and materially with the income of a free press, the first amendment safeguards seem to be well established. In the courts, a leading case is Grosjean v. American Press Company, 297 U.S. 233. In the Congress, the press has been exempt twice from price control to avoid any temptation to the executive branch to tamper with the financial well being of the press. With your permission, I will leave with your committee a brief on that subject that the Magazine Publishers Association filed last week with the Cost of Living Council.

Senator ERVIN. The subcommittee would be delighted to receive that brief.

Mr. DUFFIELD. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator ERVIN. I will direct counsel to have the brief printed in the body of the record immediately after your testimony.

Mr. DUFFIELD. Thank you very much, sir. We may ask the Congress to reaffirm this exemption if and when it extends the Economic Stabilization Act of 1970.

Another congressional policy of long standing that is important to a free press is embodied in second class postage rates. These rates were established and maintained by Congress for decades to encourage the wide circulation of a free press. When Congress gave up control of postage rates, it wrote into the Postal Reorganization Act of 1970 eight standards rate making that, in our opinion, are adequate to justify special consideration for the social value of second class mail. However, the new Postal Service seems to be ignoring seven of the standards for ratemaking that Congress prescribed, concentrating only on the eighth, cost coverage. The result is a direct Government threat to a healthy, free press. Therefore, we may have to come before Congress soon to ask for a stronger and clearer statement of postal ratemaking policy.

I will not prolong this digression into postal affairs. It is sufficient to say that in the courts and in the Congress there seems to be a clear understanding that the First Amendment forbids direct Government meddling with the economic well-being of a free press.

First amendment protection against Government action that would starve the press into impotence indirectly is less well established. By indirectly I mean shutting off revenues at their source. Earlier I touched on three incipient attempts by the Government to dictate what must or must not appear in advertising pages. One of these attempts would go so far that, if it were to succeed, every advertisement for a certain product would be converted into an ad against that product. Under such Government strictures, what advertiser would continue to pay for advertising? If the Government establishes the legal right to destroy the effectiveness of advertising by regulation, the Government could move from one category of advertising to another as the predilections of officials dictate.

The result could be to dry up most of the $10 billion or $11 billion of annual advertising revenue that now makes possible the wide dissemination of publications at popular prices. The press would not cease to exist, but its editorial activities would be pinched back and its prices to readers would go so high that its circulation and its influence would dwindle to a fraction of their size. Its effectiveness as the fourth estate, balancing big government, would become miniscule. It would have been starved into impotence.

Does the First Amendment protect a free press from economic emasculation by the Government acting consciously or unconsciously to that end? We may be on the eve of testing that question unless, as I said earlier and as I prefer, the freedom to advertise legal products honestly is established by a direct first amendment confrontation between the Government on one side and the press and advertisers on the other.

Before I close, permit me to speak briefly of the responsibility that freedom imposes on the press. I have said that the advertising pages of a free press must be as completely protected by the first amendment as its editorial pages. Therefore, each publisher must feel the same responsibility for his advertising pages as he does for his editorial pages. In his day-to-day editorial operations he relies on the integrity of his editors. In advertising, he almost always can rely on the self-interest of advertisers in preserving their own credibility.

However, advertising, like editorial activities, sometimes presents a publisher with hard decisions about what he will and will not print. He must make these decisions alone, for if he consults outsiders, he probably will be guilty of illegal conspiracy. For example, you all know that some publishers will not print advertising for alcoholic beverages. Others will print ads for beer and wine, but not for hard liquor. Some publishers will not accept tobacco advertising of any kind. Others accept it only with certain conditions. Health and hygiene advertising that some publishers will accept, others will not. Within the specialities of my company's two magazines, there are types of advertising that we will not accept.

In their exercise of this responsibility for what they print, publishers are rightfully subject to exhortation and criticism by everyone, including government. A free press is not immune from criticism.

But the First Amendment says that the press shall be immune from dictation, especially from government dictation, and that freedom protects the press in its entirety. To quote from a Supreme Court decision, "The rights of free speech and free press are not confined to any field of human interest."

October 6, 1971

MEMORANDUM FOR THE HONORABLE HAROLD C. PASSER, ASSISTANT SECRETARY FOR ECONOMIC AFFAIRS, DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE

SUBJECT: A HISTORICAL REVIEW OF THE RELATIONSHIP OF ECONOMIC CONTROLS AND THE PRINT MEDIA

ECONOMIC CONTROLS DURING WWII: THE EMERGENCY PRICE CONTROL ACT OF 1942

When spiraling inflation threatened economic devastation during the Second World War and the Korean conflict, the federal government was forced to control the national economy. During both periods of economic crisis Congress enacted legislation designed to prevent the ruination of the national currency, which would inevitably result if the runaway inflation remained unchecked.

To this end, on January 30, 1942, President Franklin D. Roosevelt signed into law the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942 (P. L. 421, 56 Stat 26), the purpose of which being clearly stated in the Act's preamble:

> An Act to further the national defense and security by checking speculative and excessive price rises, price dislocations, and inflationary tendencies, and for other purposes.

The Act was drawn to deal with the pervasive inflationary tendencies from the standpoint of prices alone. It did not of itself fix any prices, but gave to a Price Administrator, a Presidential appointee, power to establish ceilings on prices, and, in defense areas, on rents for housing accommodations. Nor did the Act as originally drawn provide for wage stabilization. Subsequent legislation was required to give the government that authority.

Both this Act and its successor during the Korean conflict, the Defense Production Act of 1950 (P.L. 774, 64 Stat 932), were carefully drawn to exclude specifically the print media, including magazines, periodicals, books, newspapers, etc., from that area of economic activity over which the Price Administrator could exercise control.

The framers of the EPCA of 1942 exempted the print media from the reach of the Act's regulatory scheme by drafting the Act in such a way that, in addition to controlling "defense-area" rents, the Price Administrator was authorized to control "commodity" prices, agricultural and otherwise. And, consequently, by drafting the Act's special definition of "commodity" to exclude the print media, an exemption from all regulation under the Act was achieved.

Under Title III of the Act at Section 302(c) this most important definition appeared:

> The term "commodity" means commodities, articles, products, and materials (except materials furnished for publication by any press association or feature service, books, magazines, motion pictures, periodicals and newspapers other than as waste or scrap), and it also includes services rendered otherwise than as an employee in connection with the processing, distribution, storage, installation, repair, or negotiation of purchases or sales of a commodity, or in connection with the operation of any service establishment for the servicing of a commodity: Provided, That nothing in this Act shall be construed to authorize the regulation of (1) compensation paid by an employer to any of his employees, or (2) rates charged by any common carrier or other public utility, or (3) rates charged by any person engaged in the business of selling or underwriting insurance, or (4) rates charged by any person engaged in the business of operating or publishing a newspaper, periodical, or magazine, or operating a radio-broadcasting station, a motion-picture or other theater enterprise, or outdoor advertising facilities, or (5) rates charged for any professional services. (Underscoring supplied)

The legislative history of this definitional section clearly illustrates congressional penchant to promote freedom of the press and to insure that the sources of the public's information remain free from even the taint of governmental influence, indirect as well as direct. The first step toward the enactment of this legislation was taken by President Roosevelt. Motivated by the fear that inflationary price rises and increases in the cost of living would undermine the national defense effort, he transmitted a message (H. Doc. No. 332, 77th Cong., 1st sess.) to Congress on July 30, 1941, requesting legislation to prevent rising inflation by implementing certain economic controls. The President specifically requested that the "legislation should include authority to establish ceilings for prices and rents, to purchase materials and commodities when necessary to assure price stability, and to deal more effectively with excesses in the field of installment credit.

The next day a bill, H.R. 5479, embodying legislation of the character recommended in the President's message, was introduced and referred to the House Committee on Banking and Currency. As originally introduced, the bill did not exempt the print media from regulation and control. However, during the course of exhaustive hearings, it was brought to the attention of the Congress that an exemption for the print media was a necessity.

Advertisers and advertising agencies, understandably apprehensive because the literal language of the bill gave the Price Administrator nearly unfettered control over marketing and selling, including advertising, requested that the bill be amended to limit this inordinate amount of power and to insure that the power which would be placed in the hands of the government could not be used to the detriment of the free press. The amendment requested took the form of the following proviso, which was to be added to Title I of the bill containing the general provisions and authority:

> Provided, however, that nothing in this Act shall authorize the President to compel changes in the normal methods of distribution now or hereafter established in any industry which would have for its effect curtailing the services rendered by advertising, except in such cases where advertising has been wilfully used to evade the purpose of this Act.

Letters to various Congressmen advocating the adoption of this amendment were included in the hearing record immediately following the October 11, 1941, testimony. (U.S. Congress, House, Banking and Currency Committee; Hearings on Price-Control Bill H.R. 5479 (Superseded by H.R. 5990); 77th Cong. 1st sess. Washington, Government Printing Office, 1941. Pt. 2, pp 1826–31.) The following letters, found at that point in the record, are representative and clearly manifest a grave concern regarding the control of advertising and the possible effect on the print and news media:

THE LEXINGTON HERALD
Lexington, Ky., October 24, 1941.

CONGRESSMAN BRENT SPENCE,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR BRENT: I am enclosing a bulletin from the American Newspaper Publishers Association, of which Cranston Williams, formerly of Knoxville, Tenn., is now the secretary and which includes nearly all the newspapers of any size in the United States, in regard to a provision concerning advertising in price-control legislation.

I personally think that any kind of control of advertising would be very dangerous, as a start toward censorship and control of the freedom of the press.

I do not believe that there is anything that will assist in getting a favorable support for price fixing like this provision which is suggested by the American Newspaper Publishers Association and I certainly hope that you will use your influence on the committee to have this amendment inserted.

Thanking you and with all best wishes.

Very sincerely yours,

THOS. R. UNDERWOOD,
Editor, The Lexington Herald.

(The bulletin, which is included in the record immediately following this letter, is omitted here.)

OREGON NEWSPAPER PUBLISHERS
ASSOCIATION, INC.
Eugene, Oreg., October 28, 1941.

Representative WALTER PIERCE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE PIERCE: The newspapers of Oregon ask you to use your good offices to see that Section 2, Paragraph (4), of House Resolution 5479, now pending before the committee, be amended as follows:

"Provided, however, That nothing in this Act shall authorize the President to compel changes in the normal methods of distribution now or hereafter established in any industry which would have for its effect curtailing the services rendered by advertising, except in such cases where advertising has been wilfully used to evade the purpose of this Act."

The newspapers of Oregon need only remind you that survival of the democratic way of life in the United States depends in a great measure upon a free press. Furthermore, a free press must be a solvent press. The newspapers stand ready and have already contributed their share to national defense and we ask that Congress pass no unwarranted acts which jeopardize the freedom of the press.

We ask your immediate and complete cooperation in the above. May I hear from you at your convenience?

Sincerely yours,

HARRY S. SCHENK, Manager.

The extensive hearings held on this bill were in session for nearly three months. At their conclusion the committee, in executive session, considered the bill, and adopted certain amendments thereto, including the following, which differs from the amendment requested by the advertisers only in that it is susceptible of a broader, more universal application:

> The powers granted in this section shall not be used or made to operate to compel changes in the business practices or cost practices or methods, means or aids to distribution established in any industry, except to prevent the circumvention or evasion of any ceiling established under this Act.

(This prohibition appeared under Title I as Section 2(g).)

In fact, H.R. 5479 was as a consequence of the hearings so vastly modified that the chairman introduced in the House a clean bill, H.R. 5990, representing the thoroughly amended H.R. 5479. This bill including the advertising amendment was considered by the Committee of the Whole House during the week of November 24, amended in other areas and passed on November 28.

The Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate began consideration of this bill on December 4, 1941. Since the two volumes of House hearings were available to the members of the committee, and included almost 2,300 pages of testimony and exhibits, an effort was made, so far as practicable, to restrict the Senate hearings, which covered the period from December 9 to December 17, to new matters. After the termination of hearings, the subcommittee, which had been appointed earlier, extensively revised and strengthened the House bill in light of the hearings and the onslaught of war. And quite understandably this revised bill contained a number of very significant changes, most important of which, from the point of view of the print media, was the new definition of "commodity".

Until H.R. 5990 reached the subcommittee of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, the definition of "commodity" was so framed as to include within its reach the print media. The original definition of "commodity" appearing in superseded H.R. 5479 at Section 302(c) remained unaltered through the comprehensive House hearings and was retained as Section 302(c) of H.R. 5990. This definition was framed as follows:

> The term "commodity," in addition to commodities, articles, products, and materials, includes services rendered otherwise than as an employee in connection with the processing, distributing, storage, installation, repair, or negotiation of purchases or sales, of a commodity, or in connection with the operation of any service establishment: Provided, That nothing in this Act shall be construed to authorize the regulation of (1) compensation paid by an employer to any of his employees, or (2) rates charged by any common carrier or other public utility.

But the bill prepared by the subcommittee and passed by both the full committee and the Senate contained a more restrictive definition of "commodity", which explicitly and unequivocally manifested the Senate's intention that the print media should be exempted from regulation under the provisions of the bill. Indeed, it is hardly conceivable that a definition could be drawn to make the exemption of the print media more explicit or more emphatic. The Senate's reframed definition of "commodity" was:

> The term "commodity" means commodities, articles, products, and materials (except books, magazines, motion pictures, periodicals and newspapers, and materials furnished for publication by any press association or feature service, other than as waste or scrap), and it also includes serv> ices rendered otherwise than as an employee in connection with the processing, distribution, storage, installation, repair, or negotiation of purchases or sales of a commodity, or in connection with the operation of any service establishment for the servicing of a commodity: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize the regulation of (1) compensation paid by an employer to any of his employees, or (2) rates charged by any common carrier or other public utility, or (3) rates charged by any person engaged in the business of selling or underwriting insurance, or (4) rates charged by any person engaged in the business of operating or publishing a newspaper, periodical, or magazine, or motion pictures or other theater enterprise, or operating a radio-broadcasting station, or outdoor advertising facilities, or (5) rates charged for any professional services. (Underscoring supplied)

From even a cursory perusal, it is obvous that this definition is virtually identical to that finally included in the Act. The House-Senate conference committee did not add or delete a single word, nor did it alter the meaning in any way: in fact, the only change it made was to transpose two phrases, apparently for the sake of clarity alone. The conference report accompanying H.R. 5990 (H. Rept. 1658, 77–2—1) devoted only three paragraphs to the definition of "commodity", and apparently these were included not to explain the reasoning which prompted the changes, but rather to identify clearly what changes were, in fact, made.

These pertinent remarks in the conference report are:

Definition of commodity

Under both the Housee bill (sec. 302(c)) and the Senate amendment (sec. 302(c)) the powers of the Administrator with respect to commodities was limited by the definition of commodity. The House bill defines commodity to include services rendered otherwise than as an employee in connection with the processing, distribution, storage, etc., of a commodity, or in connection with the operation of any service establishment. Nothing in this bill was to be construed to authorize the regulation of (1) compensation paid by an employer to any of his employees, or (2) rates charged by any common carrier or other public utility.

The Senate amendment excluded from the definition of commodity books, magazines, motion pictures, periodicals, and newspapers, and materials furnished for publication by any press association or feature service. It also provided, in addition to what was provided in the House bill, that nothing was to be construed to authorize the regulation of the rates charged (1) by any person selling or underwriting insurance, or (2) by any persons engaged in the business of operating or publishing a newspaper, periodical, or magazine, or operating a broadcasting station or a motion picture or other theater enterprise, or outdoor advertising facilities, or (3) for professional services.

The conference agreement adopts the provisions of the Senate amendment. (Underscoring supplied)

Another important change made by the Senate and subsequently enacted into law was to rewrite Section 2(g) of Title I. As the committee print of December 9, 1941, indicates (U.S. Congress, Senate, Banking and Currency Committee. Hearings on Price-Control Bill: 77th Cong., 2nd sess., on H.R. 5990. Washington, Government Printing Office, 1941. p. 79), the members of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee tentatively considered changing the section in the following manner:

> The powers granted in this section shall not be used or made to operate to compel changes in the business practices or methods, means or aids to distribution established in any industry any business practices or cost practices, relating to advertising, which are established in any industry as means or aids to distribution, except to prevent circumvention or evasion of any ceiling established under this act.

This section, of course, had been originally requested by advertisers, advertising agencies, and newspapers to insure that the provisions of the bill would not be used in a way that would produce a curtailment of the services rendered by advertising. The section passed the House in the form of prohibition against using the bill "to compel changes in the business practices or cost practices or methods, means or aids to distribution established in any industry". However, as the section from the Senate committee print above indicates, the Senate was desirous, at least in the initial stages of considering the bill, of restricting the application of Section 2(g): and this it accomplished by inserting the limiting phrase "relating to advertising". Subsequently, the Senate receded from this limitation and ultimately passed Section 2(g) as the following broad rule-making and enforcement provision, which was not restricted in application to the field of advertising:

> Regulations, orders, and requirements under this Act may contain such provisions as the Administrator deems necessary to prevent circumvention or evasion thereof.

Neither the Senate report (S. Rept. 931, 77–2—1), nor the conference report (H. Rept. 1658, 77–2—1) accompanying H.R. 5990 contain an explanation of this change, and no mention regarding it can be found in the Congressional Record. It does seem logical, however, to assume that the members of the Senate subcommittee concluded that advertising and advertisers were protected from government regulation by the newly framed definition of "commodity" prohibiting any construction of the Act which would authorize the regulation of "rates charged by any person engaged in the business of operating or publishing a newspaper, periodical, or magazine . . .". Moreover, the fact that both these changes affecting the print media and advertising were made by the same subcommittee during the same session, lends credence to the inference that they were intended, or at least, arguably, could have been intended to be complementary.

The language used in the newly framed definition also can be relied on to support this inference. By proviso, the Senate made it abundantly clear that the Act was not to be construed to regulate the "rates" charged by people in the newspaper, periodical, or magazine business. "Rates", significantly plural, not singular, was used without qualification, explicit or implicit. As so used in this context, it would seem beyond argument that the Senate intended to include within the meaning of "rates" both the subscription rate and the per-page advertising rate.

The next result of this definitional change was to exempt directly the print media from regulation under the Act and to exempt indirectly the advertising industry by leaving decisions regarding advertising sales and rates within the unfettered discretion of the publishers.

Before moving forward in the chronology to a consideration of the status of the print media vis a vis economic regulation during the Korean crisis, it is necessary to investigate the language and the legislature history of Section 205(f) (1) under Title II, Administration and Enforcement, of the 1942 Act. This section was not discussed supra in conjunction with the definitional section because it merely serves to support and perhaps to amplify the degree of congressional deference accorded the First Amendment Right of Freedom of the Press. Indeed, in view of the unequivocal exemption of the print media from economic regulation and control under the provisions of the Act, it would seem hardly likely, if not altogether impossible, that even the slightest encroachment under the guise of legislative authorization, or administrative legerdemain could be made on the province of the free press.

Congress incorporated Section 205(f)(1) to insure against just such an improbability. As already indicated, Section 205 deals with enforcement of the Act's provisions. Prior to consideration by the subcommittee of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee the means of enforcing the provisions of the Act were very restricted. The Price Administrator could seek injunctive relief against violators, or, in the case of wilful violations, he was entitled to seek criminal sanctions in the form of fines, imprisonment, or both. The Senate expanded these sanctions to include actions by wronged individuals against violators for damages, sometimes treble, and licensing provisions.

Of primary importance was the addition of the licensing provisions. The Senate wisely included them because the experience of this and other democratic nations had shown that in many cases criminal prosecutions were too harsh and that suits to enjoin further violations not only were inadequate to prevent initial infractions of the law, but were too costly and too drawn out to prove effective in a period of crisis. Neither method of enforcement, moreover, provided a means for determining who was engaged in any particular trade or industry where there were numerous sellers. Nor did the Senate feel that criminal prosecutions or suits for injunctive relief were sufficiently flexible to assure substantial justice in the great majority of cases. On the other hand, the Senate felt that licensing in many cases would provide the effectiveness and speed that are so necessary to adequate enforcement of war time measures, and, in addition, the flexibility which is essential to avoid hardship to the law-abiding businessman.

On the basis of this reasoning the Senate added a licensing provision to the enforcement title of the Act. Denominated as Section 205(f)(1), it was subsequently enacted into law with only insignificant modifications. This section provides:

> Whenever in the judgment of the Administrator such action is necessary or proper in order to effectuate the purposes of this Act and to assure compliance with and provide for the effective enforcement of any regulation or order issued or which may be issued under section 2, or of any price schedule effective in accordance with the provisions of section 206, he may by regulation or order issue to or require of any person or persons subject to any regulation or order issued under section 2, or subject to any such price schedule, a license as a condition of selling any commodity or commodities with respect to which such regulation, order, or price schedule is applicable. It shall not be necessary for the Administrator to issue a separate license for each commodity or for each regulation, order, or price schedule with respect to which a license is required. No such license shall contain any provision which could not be prescribed by regulation, order, or requirement under section 2 or section 202: Provided, That no such license may be required as a condition of selling or distributing (except as waste or scrap) newspapers, periodicals, books, or other printed or written material, or motion pictures, or as a condition of selling radio time: Provided further, That no license may be required of any farmer as a condition of selling any agricultural commodity produced by him and no license may be required of any fisherman as a condition of selling any fishery commodity caught or taken by him: Provided further, That in any case in which such a license is required of any person, the Administrator shall not have power to deny to such person a license to sell any commodity or commodities, unless such person already has such a license to sell such commodity or commodities, or unless there is in effect under paragraph (2) of this subsection with respect to such person an order of suspension of a previous license to the extent that such previous license authorized such person to sell such commodity or commodities. (Underscoring supplied)

It certainly would appear to be unreasonable to conjecture that the language of the underscored proviso above could be misunderstood or misinterpreted. The language makes it crystal clear that the sanctions incorporated in the licensing provisions shall not be employed in such a way as to exert indirect control over the print media, which, by definition, is exempted from direct control.

The Senate report accompanying H.R. 5990 explained the provisos incorporated in the licensing provision as "safeguards against abuse". The pertinent language in the committee report (S. Rept. 931, 77–2—1, p. 9) is:

> Balances against the efficiency of the licensing provisions of the bill are elaborate safeguards against abuse. Thus, the bill provides that no person may be refused a license. The license cannot be used to control the number of persons in the particular trade or industry. Freedom of speech and of the press is guaranteed by a provision that no license may be required as a condition of selling and distributing written matter or radio time, and the freedom of every farmer to market his own produce without a license is guaranteed by express provision. (Underscoring supplied)

ECONOMIC CONTROLS DURING THE KOREAN CRISIS: THE DEFENSE PRODUCTION ACT OF 1950

The consideration supra of the language and legislative history of Section 205(f)(1) completes the investigation of the relationship of economic control measures and the freedom of the press during the WWII period by emphasizing that Congress intended to resist all infringements, direct and indirect, on the province protected by the First Amendment. Now attention will be focused on the Defense Production Act of 1950 (P.L. 81–774, 64 Stat. 932), which was enacted to control the economy and to redirect the nation's industrial might during the period of massive rearmament necessitated by the Korean crisis.

By the spring of 1950, the Truman Administration, in response to the increasing tendency of the cold war to turn hot, was committing itself to a large-scale rearmament program. The unprovoked aggression in Korea appeared to confirm fears of Soviet intentions and prompted a decision to proceed forthwith. However, with the economy running at close to capacity, it was clear that defense requirements could not be met without some limitation on production of civilian goods. In his message to Congress on July 19, 1950 (H. Doc. No. 646, 81st Cong., 2nd sess.), President Truman made it clear that rearmament would "require substantial redirection of our economic resources." In order to achieve this redirection, specific authority was requested to: establish priorities and allocate materials, prevent inventory hoarding, and requisition materials needed for defense; make loans and loan guaranties to expand defense production, and make long-term contracts for purchase of scarce materials; and control consumer credit, credit used for commodity speculation, and privately financed real estate credit. Authorization for price and wage controls was conspicuously absent from President Truman's requests.

Initial reaction in Congress to the President's proposals was, predictably, cool. Bills including the proposed legislation were introduced in the House and Senate. H.R. 9176 and S. 3936, as they were denominated, were referred to the Committees on Banking and Currency in each respective house, where hearings were held. As a result of these hearings a marked change in sentiment took place in Congress. The July 26 testimony before the Senate Banking and Commerce Committee of Bernard M. Baruch, a dominant figure in World War I and II mobilization programs, must be credited as initiating this pronounced change in sentiment.

The much respected Mr. Baruch argued most persuasively that the menace of the current emergency could not be dealt with adequately without an "over-all ceiling across the entire economy—over-all prices, wages, rents, fees and so forth." The gravamen of Mr. Baruch's testimony quoted below appears immediately after some very terse opening remarks concerning the inefficacy of the League of Nations and the threat the Korean Crisis posed to the U.N. and the entire world:

> If we are to see it through, the legislation before this committee is vital. Many parts of this bill are excellent. There is one major fault which destroys much of its value. This bill does not go far enough.
> Experience has taught us that when the Government steps into the market, with such enormous demands requiring such quick priority, you must control all prices, including wages, rents, food, and other costs, eliminate profiteering and ration certain scarce essentials. This is not a pleasant outlook. Neither is that of the young man who has to go to battle. He risks all. Those who remain at home are called upon only to have less comforts.
> The situation is sufficiently grave to warrant an over-all ceiling across the entire economy, over-all prices, wages, rents, fees, and so on, with high enough taxes to prevent profiteering and to pay all defense costs and an all-embracing, effective system of priorities.

And several paragraphs below he argued even more persuasively for price control.

As now drawn, the bill before the committee defeats itself.

This bill proposes a system of priorities over production: yet, nowhere is provision made for controlling prices and other costs. Should this bill be enacted, without price control, the Government may get what it wants, but with needless delay and ever-increasing prices. The public will be left to compete for the remainder, with the fattest pocketbook, not the greatest need, deciding who gets what is available. The cost of every defense item will be needlessly increased; profiteering encouraged; cruel injusticese inflicted upon millions with fixed incomes or who have no pressure group to represent them.

This bill, gentlemen, is an invitation to inflation.

No system of priorities can work effectively or for long without price control. That was learned during World War I. It was forgotten and had to be learned anew, at what bitter cost, in World War II. Must we persist in repeating the mistakes of the past, even to inviting disaster?

Mr. Baruch's testimony coincided with a heavy run of mail from constituents protesting the pronounced upswing in prices following the June 25 invasion of South Korea. Quite understandably, then, congressional leaders quickly expressed support for the inclusion of standby rationing, price, and wage controls. On August 1, as the House began consideration of H.R. 9176, President Truman wrote to Representative Spence and Senator Maybank, chairmen of the two Banking and Currency Committees, saying that he would accept additional powers provided they were flexible. Rep. Spence then drafted a substitute bill incorporating rationing and price and wage control authority. But the Spence substitute bill contained no language exempting the print media from regulation.

In order to cure this deficiency an amendment was proposed on the House floor on August 3, 1950. The following dialogue from the Congressional Record (81st Cong., 2nd sess., CR-H, Vol. 96, Pt. 9, p. 11732) includes the text of the amendment, gives the purpose for it, and points out that it was patterned after the exemption for the print media found in the EPCA of 1942:

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Admendment offered by Mr. Buchanan to the Spence substitute: Add a new section 409 to read as follows:

> "Nothing in this title shall be construed to authorize the regulation of (1) rates charged by any common carrier or other public utility, or (2) rates charged by any person engaged in the business of selling or underwriting insurance, or (3) rates charged by any person engaged in the business of operating or publishing a newspaper, periodical, or magazine, or operating a radio or television broadcasting station, a motion-pictuture or other theater enterprise, or outdoor-advertising facilities, or (4) rates charged for any professional services, or (5) materials furnished for publication by any press association or feature service, or (6) books, magazines, motion pictures, periodicals and newspapers, other than as waste or scrap."

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SPENCE. That is practically the same provision that was in the old Price Control Act.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Public Law 421 of the Seventy-seventh Congress, with the two parts I have added, "or (5) materials furnished for publication by any press association or feature service, or (6) books, magazines, motion pictures, periodicals, and newspapers, other than as waste or scrap."

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who helped collaborate and worked with me on this particular amendment in the discussion of yesterday.

I wish to compliment the gentleman for introducing this amendment and to join with my friend in sponsoring this provision.

Mr. FULTON. This amendment goes a little further than section 214 of the Kunkel bill, but is basically that provision, is it not?

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is true.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. The amendment, with the exception of the two additions which the gentleman mentioned, is exactly the same as the previous law during World War II and practically the same as the amendment which the gentleman from Ohio, myself, prepared and have at the desk at this time. I might say that this matter has been discussed with the leadership on both sides, and I understand there is no objection to it. It simply protects the sources of information of the American people so that under no stretch of circumstances can anyone interfere with the furnishing of information to the American people. (Underscoring supplied)

Further on in the discussion Rep. Brown clarifies what the intent and purpose of this amendment are:

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. The whole intent and purpose of this is simply to protect the right of the American people to obtain information without any control over it.

As might be anticipated in the case of such a controversial bill, the Buchanan amendment was not enacted into law without change in language or modification of content. After further hearings in both Houses, followed by a conference, the amendment finally emerged in the following form as Section 402(e) of Title IV, Price and Wage Stabilization, of the Defense Production Act of 1950:

(e) The authority conferred by this title shall not be exercised with respect to the following:

(i) Prices on rentals for real property;

(ii) Rates or fees charged for professional services;

(iii) Prices or rentals for (a) materials furnished for publication by any press association or feature service, or (b) books, magazines, motion pictures, periodicals, or newspapers, other than as waste or scrap; or rates charged by any person in the business of operating or publishing a newspaper, periodical, or magazine, or operating a radio-broadcasting or television station, a motion-picture or other theater enterprise, or outdoor advertising facilities;

(iv) Rates charged by any person in the business of selling or underwriting insurance;

(v) Rates charged by any common carrier or other public utility: Provided, That no common carrier or other public utility shall at any time after the President shall have issued any stabilization regulations and orders under subsection (b) make any increase in its charges for property or services sold by it for resale to the public, for which application is filed after the date of issuance of such stabilization regulations and orders, before the Federal, State or Municipal authority having jurisidction to consider such increase, unless it first gives 30 days' notice to the President, or such agency as he may designate, and consents to the timely intervention by such agency before the Federal, State or Municipal authority having jurisdiction to consider such increase;

(vi) Margin requirements on any commodity exchange. (Underscoring supplied)

ECONOMIC CONTROLS AT PRESENT: THE ECONOMIC STABILIZATION ACT OF 1970

The foregoing exposition clearly demonstrates that Congress wisely exempted the print media from regulation and control when crisis situations necessitated government intervention and control of the nation's economic activity. In the context of both an all-out war and an armed conflict which fell considerably short of world war. Congress wrote into the legislation authorizing control of the economy an explicit and unequivocal exemption of the print media. Strangely, however, in the context of a non-crisis situation and at a time when the United States was taking meaningful steps to extricate itself from the Southeast Asian morass, Congress delegated to the President seemingly unfettered authority to control the nation's economy. This it did by enacting the Economic Stabilization Act of 1970 (P.L. 91–379, 84 Stat. 799), Title II Section 202 of which sets forth in the broadest possible terms the authority given the President, as follows:

Presidential Authority

(a) The President is authorized to issue such orders and regulations as he may deem appropriate to stabilize prices, rents, wages, and salaries at levels not less than those prevailing on May 26, 1970. Such orders and regulations may provide for the making of such adjustments as may be necessary to prevent gross inequities.

(b) The authority conferred on the President by this section shall not be exercised with respect to a particular industry or segment of the economy unless the President determines, after taking into account the seasonal nature of employment, the rate of employment or underemployment, and other mitigating factors, that prices or wages in that industry or segment of the economy have increased at a rate which is grossly disproportionate to the rate at which prices or wages have increased in the economy generally.

From even a cursory reading of this section, it is obvious that the first sentence of subsection (a) is of the first magnitude of importance as it gives the President carte blanche authority "to issue such orders and regulations as he may deem appropriate to stabilize prices, rents, wages and salaries at levels not less than those prevailing on May 25, 1970". The only limitation on the exercise of Presidential authority is that the levels of stabilization be not less than those prevailing on May 25, 1970. Otherwise, the literal language accords the President unrestricted authority. In fact, his authority is so unrestricted that the Act, unlike its predecessors, allows not even a single exemption for any economic activity of any character whatsoever.

Without addressing the obvious Constitutional questions which could reasonably be leveled at this Act, the question of whether or not the President and/or the Cost of Living Council is authorized to exempt the print media and others from regulation under its provisions must be considered.

This question must be answered affirmatively. Both the President and the Cost of Living Council are empowered by the Act to make such exemptions. Section 202(a) leaves no doubt about this, as it authorizes the President "to issue such orders and regulations as he may deem appropriate to stabilize prices, rents, wages, and salaries. . . ." There can be no denial that making an exemption is well within the ambit of this power.

Certainly, in light of the fact that such exemption always has been included in prior legislation—for good reason—the President could and should "deem" such exemption "appropriate". Therefore, he would be authorized to issue an order or regulation granting it.

The Cost of Living Council, to which the President delegated his authority in accordance with Title II section 203 of the Economic Stabilization Act of 1970, has the identical authority to grant an exemption. President Nixon has not left the Council's authority open to question. In his August 15, 1971, Executive Order 11615, Providing For Stabilization Of Prices, Rents, Wages, And Salaries, he established the Council (in Section 2(a) thereof), delegated his authority to it (in Section 3(a)) and gave specific authorization to certain activities of the Council (in Section 4(a) thereof). Section 4(a) is included in its entirety, below, simply to emphasize the fact that the Council is empowered to exempt the print media from control under the provisions of the 1970 Act:

> Sec. 4(a) The Council, in carrying out the provisions of this Order, may (i) prescribe definitions for any terms used herein, (ii) make exceptions or grant exemptions, (iii) issue regulations and orders, and (iv) take such other actions as it determines to be necessary and appropriate to carry out the purposes of this Order. (Underscoring supplied)

Senator Ervin. We are told that the First Amendment protects the publication of ideas. Aren't what kind of food people should eat, or what kind of clothes they should wear, or what they should drink, ideas, also?

Mr. Duffield. That is an idea in my judgment, too, Senator.

Senator Ervin. And I take it from your statement that you believe that government shall not undertake to separate some ideas and prohibit the free expression of those ideas in light of the First Amendment.

Mr. Duffield. I certainly do.

Senator Ervin. You concede that government can prohibit false advertising?

Mr. Duffield. That is right, I said that right at the beginning.

Senator Ervin. I regret to say that nobody is able to forestall false advertising on the part of government.

I say that because a few years ago the Post Office Department had some great placards put outside of all mail trucks proclaiming that 100,000 doctors had stopped smoking. They must have known something you do not know.

Since North Carolina grows a lot of tobacco and manufactures a lot of tobacco, I asked the Post Office Department why they did that, and they said it was done at the insistance of HEW. I pressed HEW for information as to why they did it, and they replied that it was done at the behest of that political doctor, the Surgeon General. So I demanded to know the basis of the information that 100,000 doctors had stopped smoking. I found that a public relations firm employed by HEW, the Surgeon General's office, had issued a questionnaire to about 3,000 doctors out of the multitude of doctors in the U.S. Most of the doctors had ignored the questionnaire, but perhaps a thousand or more replied to it, and a certain percentage of those who had replied said that they had stopped smoking. Many in the group did not give reasons as to why they had stopped smoking. So the U.S. Government undertook by false pretenses to turn the American people against smoking cigarettes.

Do you not think that the freedom of speech gives the one who is exercising it the power to say in his own way what he has to say instead of accepting dictation from government as to what he has to say?

Mr. DUFFIELD. Yes, sir. And certainly that dictation goes beyond the bounds of all reason if they require him at the same time he says it to deny it.

Senator ERVIN. And is there not always danger when the Government undertakes to dictate what people can say and what they cannot say, that the First Amendment is stifled and destroyed?

Mr. DUFFIELD. No doubt about it, in my judgment.

Senator ERVIN. For an illustration, I will turn again to tobacco. Congress passed a law that you could not advertise tobacco on TV, but you can advertise in the newspapers provided you adopt a certain formula for doing so. Well, in times past the FCC has professed to have a fairness doctrine. However, they allow the TV stations to issue spot announcements, at the expense of the taxpayers, and at the insistance of that political doctor, the Surgeon General, to condemn cigarette smoking. When the tobacco people demand the right under the fairness doctrine to reply to these spot announcements they were refused. In effect they were told that the political doctor, the Surgeon General, has complete possession of all of the truth on the subject of cigarette smoking, and the very eminent medical practitioners who emphatically disagree with him have none, and, therefore, this question has ceased to be controversial, and the fairness doctrine does not permit any reply on these assaults on the means of livelihood of hundreds of thousands of American people.

Mr. DUFFIELD. I believe, Senator, you made that point in your statement at the opening of these hearings, and made it very effectively.

Senator ERVIN. Yes.

I want to ask this question. There can be no doubt of the fact—I think all medical practitioners agree—that the consumption of dairy products in excessive amounts will produce kidney stones, and cholesterol. It would then follow that if the Federal Government has the right to prohibit the advertisement of cigarettes on the ground that they are injurious, it has a right likewise to prohibit the advertisement of dairy products, would it not?

Mr. DUFFIELD. I would think so.

Senator ERVIN. When you start to encroaching on the First Amendment rights in one respect, what assurances do you have that the Government is ever going to stop until the First Amendment is entirely removed as an effective instrument for debate in American life?

Mr. DUFFIELD. I agree with that, Senator. It seems to me that some people get confused about the application of the First Amendment to any utterance that may have a commercial motive. I believe I am correct that the right to picket was upheld in part based on the first amendment. And certainly that is speech directed at an economic motive, or motivated by an economic objective. It seems to me clear on that precedent that just because there is a commercial aspect to what a man expresses, be it fact or opinion, he is not robbed of the protection of the First Amendment.

Senator ERVIN. I will add to your closing statement which says:

"The rights of free speech and free press are not confined to any field of human interest".

Mr. DUFFIELD. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. I would paraphrase that and say: The rights of free speech and free press cover all human activities regardless of whether they are merely for the purpose of expanding the intellectual horizons of the people or for the purpose of enlightening them about what kind of candidates or policies they should support in the affairs of the Nation, or about any product which they should purchase or use. I think the rights of the First Amendment are not limited to any field of human endeavor.

Mr. DUFFIELD. I agree with you, Senator, exactly.

Senator ERVIN. Now, do you not agree with me that the right of freedom of speech or the freedom of the press gives one the right to exercise that right according to his own notions as long as he is not seeking to perpetrate fraud on any other person?

Mr. DUFFIELD. I certainly do.

Senator ERVIN. And is it not a negation in your judgment, of the right of freedom of speech, freedom of the press, for the Government in any way to say to an individual, or a newspaper, or magazine which carries advertisements, how they shall phrase that advertisement?

Mr. DUFFIELD. I do.

Senator ERVIN. In other words, when the Government undertakes to dictate in what manner or fashion you or I shall express ourselves, or that we shall not say certain things, or that we must say certain things, that is just as much a negation of freedom of speech as any act which denies us the right to speak at all.

Mr. DUFFIELD. Exactly so.

Senator ERVIN. The big question in your mind, I take it is that those who exercise the freedom of the press have a right to say, insofar as the advertisement is concerned, what products they will advertise and what products they will not advertise.

Mr. DUFFIELD. Indeed, they do have. And they have historically done so. I think that they must not be capricious in the exercise of that responsibility, but it is their responsibility under the first amendment, in my judgment.

Senator ERVIN. And that responsibility is something which the Government does not have the right to usurp or exercise?

Mr. DUFFIELD. Exactly, sir.

Senator Ervin. Governmental policies which impose restrictions on those who seek to exercise freedom of the press, destroy the value of the First Amendment in that respect just as much as the governmental policies which absolutely prohibit the exercise of that freedom.

Mr. Duffield. Yes, indeed. It seems to me that one recent development here—and I believe this is responsive to your question—has been not to prohibit but to say, you must say thus and so, which in my judgment, is just as fundamental a violation as a prohibition.

Senator Ervin. Now, in order that the people may have the benefit of the information which they can obtain by the exercise by magazines and newspapers of the right to freedom of the press, it is necessary from the very nature of things that those people who publish magazines and newspapers be allowed to receive such a financial recompense as will give them incentive to provide that information.

Mr. Duffield. It is essential—if the revenues were denied to a press, particularly revenues except such as it could raise from readers, the press would be restricted in its effectiveness almost to impotence.

Senator Ervin. I am glad you have sided with the Grosjean case, which was, I recall, a case where some or perhaps a majority of the legislature of Louisiana became dissatisfied with the way certain of the leading newspapers of Louisiana were exercised their rights of freedom of the press, and passed a particular tax law which imposed some excessive tax burdens on particular newspapers.

Mr. Duffield. Exactly. That is the case, as I understand it.

Senator Ervin. The Supreme Court of the United States struck down the law on the ground that by imposing taxation of that nature the State had violated the first amendment provisions guaranteeing those newspapers the freedom of the press.

Mr. Duffield. My limited knowledge, Senator, leads me to believe that both the courts and the Congress, and in Congress particularly the Senate, are quite well aware of this economic aspect of a free press.

Senator Ervin. And there is no doubt in your mind that the Court recognized in the Grosjean case the proof of John Marshall's assertion, the power to tax is the power to destroy, and recognized that you could destroy the freedom of the press guaranteed by the First Amendment by taxation.

Mr. Duffield. Exactly so.

Senator Ervin. Is there any doubt in your mind of the validity of the position that any Federal regulation which so limits advertising by newspapers and magazines, so as to destroy them as viable economic entities which are able to give information to the American people, is also a violation of the first amendment?

Mr. Duffield. In my opinion it is, yes, sir.

Senator Ervin. I am glad that you alluded to the effect of postage rates. I have been informed by a number of very highly respected publications that the increase in postage rates which has been made by the new Postal Corporation since it threatens some very fine nationwide publications with economic destruction.

Mr. Duffield. It does indeed, up and down the whole scale of size, from small to large.

Senator Ervin. That is one aspect this subcommittee intends to look into in later hearings.

Mr. Duffield. I am glad to hear that.

Mr. Baskir. Your discussion with Senator Ervin, I think, established your view that you do not think there is any conceptual difference between advertising for commercial products and the advertising of ideas. I would like to go into that a little bit more deeply to see if there is any practical distinction that can be made. The reason I raise this is because on page 3 you refer to the increasing practice of the Government to require that if one kind of advertisement is run, then another one rebutting it has to be run. This, of course, has been using the fairness doctrine quite a bit. I think probably that would certainly apply to the cigarette controversy, those persons advertising cigarettes are advertising their point of view about a problem. So therefore the person who thinks cigarette smoking is dangerous has to be given the opportunity to advertise their opposing point of view. In effect is not the reason for requiring the rebuttal advertising based on the fact that these are political controversies, that the usefulness of a particular product is in doubt, it is a matter of public controversy, and that both sides have to be expressed?

Mr. Duffield. Yes, Mr. Baskir, as I understand it. You have cited the fairness doctrine which is applicable to broadcast media. I have never worked in the broadcast field, and I am not a lawyer, and, therefore, I am not competent really to discuss it in any depth. I have an uninformed adversion to the fairness doctrine. I do not know to what extent the fact that the Government must license broadcast media in order to prevent chaos gives it a right to intervene in any other way. I cannot discuss that. But I will say that if any parallel attempt were extended to the print media, where I have worked, and where I do feel I know something about the legal rights, if it were that we must do thus and so subject to some penalty if we did not, I would feel that is clearly unconstitutional. I have no objection to Government agencies exhorting us to and urging us to present both sides of any question, either in editorial columns or in our advertising columns. They have a perfect right to say, you are not really discharging your public responsibility unless you do both of these things. True. But to require us to do it under any restraint or dictation would in my judgment, be a violation of the first amendment.

Mr. Baskir. The attempt to do so would seem to me to be based upon a theory or rationale that if there is a public controversy, that both sides ought to be presented.

Mr. Duffield. True.

Mr. Baskir. If that is the rationale, it seems to me that you cannot make a distinction between commercial goods and political issues, because the selling of commercial goods, one of those that you suggested, is a matter of public controversy.

Mr. Duffield. Absolutely.

Mr. Baskir. So, whether on theory or conceptual coverage or on very practical terms, if there are politics and political issues involved with respect to the selling of a commodity on old fashioned, very narrow, too narrow First Amendment grounds, the Government should not be getting into this area.

Mr. Duffield. I would agree with that, Mr. Baskir.

Mr. Baskir. Thank you.

Mr. Ebner. Mr. Duffield, in the highly unlikely situation that a distributor of heroin wanted to advertise in the magazine that his product was better than anybody else's heroin, would you feel that the Government could step in and prevent such advertising in that case?

Mr. Duffield. Yes, sir. I said at the beginning I was discussing the honest selling of a lawful product.

Mr. Ebner. In other words, your position is that once a product becomes lawful to possess, there is no way that the advertising of that product could be limited?

Mr. Duffield. Exactly.

Mr. Ebner. Thank you.

Senator Ervin. Is that not the line of demarcation? In other words, the First Amendment does not prohibit the Government making certain practices illegal as long as those practices do not consist solely of the dissemination of ideas, and so long as the Government permits something to be legally sold to the general public, the Government has no right to prohibit that kind of advertising?

Mr. Duffield. That is my understanding.

Senator Ervin. And when the Government adopts any other course and says, we are going to prohibit the advertising of this, that and the other, and whether there is great controversy about the article, and whether Congress permits it to be sold, the Government is assuming the right to say that it is the sole determiner of the truth, and undertakes to deny people the right to proclaim their ideas as to what is the truth if it disagrees with the Government's conclusion?

Mr. Duffield. Thank you.

Senator Ervin. Thank you very much. You have made a very helpful contribution to the study of this whole subject.

Mr. Duffield. Thank you, Senator, for staying here long enough for me to testify today.

(The prepared statement follows:)

STATEMENT BY EUGENE S. DUFFIELD, PRESIDENT, POPULAR SCIENCE PUBLISHING CO.

I am Eugene S. Duffield. I am President of Popular Science Publishing Company. We publish two magazines (Popular Science and Outdoor Life) copies of which are on the rostrum. I have been a director of the Magazine Publishers Association for 12 years and for the past year I have been chairman of the board. I have spent 33 years in magazine and newspaper publishing on both the editorial and the business sides.

Other witnesses have discussed First Amendment problems arising out of editorial activities. I would like to present for your consideration two interrelated First Amendment questions affecting the commercial, or business, activities of a free press.

The first question is: under the First Amendment can anyone, including any government, dictate what must be said or must not be said on the advertising pages of a free press?

The second question is: Does the First Amendment protect a free press from being starved into impotence by direct or indirect government interference with its sources of revenue?

Before I give examples of each problem and discuss them, let me dispose of the obvious. Of course, the First Amendment does not protect fraudulent selling in or by the press any more than it protects libel. What I shall be talking about is the truthful selling of lawful products and services.

The keynote of what I urge today can be expressed in two sentences. One sentence comes from an opinion by Justice Douglas. The second is from a Circuit Court decision that was affirmed by the Supreme Court.

Justice Douglas said: "The press in its historic connotation comprehends every sort of publication which affords a vehicle of information and opinion." Let me stress the words "and opinion."

The Circuit Court said: "If the advertisement is not false, defendants have a constitutional right to utilize it even though its content and blatancy may annoy both the (Federal Trade) Commission and the general public."

What do these two sentences mean?

To me they mean that, except for fraud, the content of advertising pages should be as thoroughly protected by the First Amendment as are editorial pages. No one, including government, should dictate what must be said or must not be said in the advertising pages of a free press. Under the First Amendment that decision must be left to the conscience and judgment of publishers, just as are editorial decisions.

Yet in three ways, the Federal Government is trying to interfere with freedom of the press to control advertising pages.

First, the government seems to be saying that advertising must be limited to quantifiable facts. The implication is that statements not verifiable by laboratory or statistical evidence can not be used in advertising. Opinion is to be proscribed. For example, the manufacturer of a spinning reel may not express the opinion that his reel offers the best value unless he can prove it by laboratory tests, field tests and price comparisons.

Second, the government shows signs of wanting to tell publishers: "If you run this advertisement, you must run that advertisement." For example, if you publish automobile advertising, you must publish clear air ads. Or, if you have published an ad saying that bread is good for kids, you must publish another ad denying the first one.

Third, the government shows signs of saying, "If you publish ads of a certain kind, you must include in each one certain words displayed in a certain way." For example, if you publish an ad for vitamins, you must leave one fifth of the ad white and print therein black lettering a quarter inch high saying, "The need for these vitamins in human nutrition has not been established."

In each of these three incipient attempts to dictate what shall or shall not appear in advertisements, the government is not confronting the press directly. It is attempting to control the press indirectly by dictating to advertisers. Government has not said to publishers directly, "You may not publish ads unless they say thus and so." Such an attempt would produce a clear First Amendment confrontation. The government instead is proceeding toward the same end by indirection. It is saying to manufacturers, "You may not offer advertisements for publication unless they say thus and so." This indirection does not avoid the First Amendment. It changes the angle from which the First Amendment must be applied, but it does not fake the First Amendment out of play, as I shall explain later.

Let me conclude the first part of my statement by expressing a hope. It is this: If the government persists in these attempts to dictate what must be said on advertising pages, I hope some advertisers will have enough courage to prepare and offer ads that defy the government's dictates. I know they will find publishers of equal courage who will join them in a direct First Amendment challenge to the government.

Thus far I have discussed the question: Under the First Amendment can anyone dictate what must be said or must not be said on the advertising pages of a free press?

I turn now to the second question: Does the First Admendment protect a free press from being starved into impotence by direct or indirect government interference with its sources of revenue? I should like to discuss direct interference and indirect interference separately.

As to government actions that would interefere directly and materially with the income of a free press, the First Amendment safeguards seem to be well established. In the courts, a leading case is Grosjean v. American Press Com- pany, 297 U.S. 233. In the Congress, the press has been exempt twice from price control to avoid any temptation to the executive branch to tamper with the financial well being of the press. With your permission I will leave with your Committee a brief on the subject that the Magazine Publishers Association filed last week with the Cost of Living Council.

We may ask the Congress to enact that exemption again if and when it extends the Economic Stabilization Act of 1970.

Another Congressional policy of long standing that is important to a free press is embodied in second class postage rates. These rates were established and maintained by Congress for decades to encourage the wide circulation of a free press. When Congress gave up control of postage rates, it wrote into the Postal Reorganization Act of 1970 eight standards for postal rate making that, in our opinion, are adequate to justify special consideration for the social value of second class mail. However, the new Postal Service seems to be ignoring seven of the standards for rate making that Congress prescribed, concentrating only on the eigth, cost coverage. The result is a direct government threat to a healthy, free press. Therefore, we may have to come before Congress soon to ask for a stronger and clearer statement of postal rate making policy.

I will not prolong this digression into postal affairs. It is sufficient to say that in the courts and in the Congress there seems to be a clear understanding that the First Amendment forbids direct government meddling with the economic well being of a free press.

First Amendment protection against government action that would starve the press into impotence indirectly is less well established. By "indirectly" I mean shutting off revenues at their source. Earlier I touched on three incipient attempts by the government to dictate what must or must not appear in advertising pages. One of these attempts would go so far that, if it were to succeed, every ad for a certain product would be converted into an ad against that product. Under such government strictures, what advertiser would continue to pay for advertising? If the government establishes the legal right to destroy the effectiveness of advertising by regulation, the government could move from one category of advertising to another as the predilections of officials dictate.

The result could be to dry up most of the 10 or 11 billion dollars of annual advertising revenue that now makes possible the wide dissemination of publications at popular prices. The press would not cease to exist, but its editorial activities would be pinched back and its prices to readers would go so high that its circulation and its influence would dwindle to a fraction of their size. Its effectiveness as the Fourth Estate, balancing Big Government, would become miniscule. It would have been starved into impotence.

Does the First Amendment protect a free press from economic emasculation by the government acting consciously or unconsciously to that end? We may be on the eve of testing that question unless, as I said earlier and as I prefer, the freedom to advertise legal products honestly is established by a direct First Amendment confrontation between the government on one side and the press and advertisers on the other.

Before I close, permit me to speak briefly of the responsibility that freedom imposes on the press. I have said that the advertising pages of a free press must be as completely protected by the First Amendment as its editorial pages. Therefore, each publisher must feel the same responsibility for his advertising pages as he does for his editorial pages. In his day-to-day editorial operations he relies on the integrity of his editors. In advertising, he almost always can rely on the self interest of advertisers in preserving their own credibility.

However, advertising, like editorial activities, sometimes presents a publisher with hard decisions about what he will and will not print. He must make these decisions alone, for if he consults outsiders, he probably will be guilty of illegal conspiracy. For example, you all know that some publishers will not print advertising for alcoholic beverages. Others will print ads for beer and wine, but not for hard liquor. Some publishers will not accept tobacco advertising of any kind. Others accept it only with certain conditions. Health and hygience advertising that some publishers will accept, others will not. Within the specialties of my company's two magazines, there are types of advertising that we will not accept.

In their exercise of this responsibility for what they print, publishers are rightfully subject to exhortation and criticism by everyone, including government. A free press is not immune from criticism.

But the First Amendment says that the press shall be immune from dictation, especially from government dictation, and that freedom protects the press in its entirety. To quote from a Supreme Court decision, "The rights of free speech and free press are not confined to any field of human interest."

Senator Ervin. The subcommittee stands in adjournment until Tuesday at 10 o'clock in the same room.

(Whereupon, at 1:25 p.m., the subcommittee was adjourned, to reconvene at 10 a.m., Tuesday, October 19, 1971.)

S. 1311—FREEDOM OF THE PRESS

U.S. SENATE,
OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to recess, at 10 a.m., in room 2228, New Senate Office Building, Senator Sam J. Ervin, Jr. (chairman of the subcommittee) presiding.

Present: Senators Ervin (presiding) and Hruska.

Also present: Lawrence M. Baskir, chief counsel; Bill Pursley, counsel; and Stanley Ebner, minority counsel.

Senator ERVIN. The subcommittee will come to order.

The subcommittee today resumes its hearings on freedom of the press. We will hear testimony from representatives of both the broadcast and printed press and from a Member of Congress with considerable legislative experience in this area.

It is important that these hearings provide a forum for the presentation of the widest possible range of views. The different backgrounds and perspectives of today's four witnesses underscore the subcommittee's determination to hear a variety of viewpoints concerning this subject. When the subcommittee schedules the second series of hearings on freedom of the press in early 1972, we look forward to hearing from other individuals and groups who are knowledgeable and concerned about the state of freedom of the press in America.

Counsel will call the first witness.

Mr. BASKIR. Mr. Chairman, our first witness this morning is Congressman William L. Springer of Illinois, ranking minority member of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Senator ERVIN. Representative Springer, I wish to welcome you to this subcommittee, and to express to you our appreciation for your willingness to come and give us the benefit of your views on a subject on which you have made an extensive study and have been much concerned.

STATEMENT OF HON. WILLIAM L. SPRINGER, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE 22D CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT OF THE STATE OF ILLINOIS

Mr. SPRINGER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. It is very kind of you to grant me this time.

I think this is indeed a serious matter in this country at this time, because there is nothing that has an impact, I am sure, upon the people at large as much as television. Newspapers have none of the impact that is associated with TV, principally for the reason that nearly all polls show that the TV station at home is turned on in roughly 90 to 95 percent of the homes in this country at least once in every 24 hours. And I think all of us realize that a daily newspaper is not available to all the people in this country. I happen to come from rural Illinois, where a daily newspaper does not reach everybody everyday. And if you go on further west you will find it even more so.

Now, I think that we can put aside newspapers for the purpose of my discussion this morning very shortly by saying that there are no restrictions as far as the first amendment that I know of on newspapers. There are no decisions that I know of any court in the Anglo-Saxon world which puts a restriction on newspapers. This is not true just in this country, it is true everywhere where the English word is spoken. I think we can dispose of newspapers with that. There are no restrictions of any kind. The First Amendment is complete with regard to newspapers.

I want to take up TV and radio. There are serious restrictions on the right of radio and TV in the exercise of the First Amendment. Those were placed in the law with a definite purpose at the time of the creation of the Federal Communications Act of 1927, as amended in 1934.

Now, what are those? And let's specifically find out wherein the broadcast media differs from newspapers.

First of all, you request a license. You file an application for a license. The newspapers file no application with anybody, they start up whenever they get enough money to start a newspaper.

Second, when they request that license they make an affidavit that they will operate that license in the public interest.

Third, although there is no law, by a series of regulations and decisions of the FCC you have the fairness doctrine. Here is the legislative history of the fairness doctrine as developed by the Federal Communications Commission, and by the courts in this country, chiefly the U.S. Supreme Court. That is No. 3.

Four, section 315 applies, which means that if you allow any political candidate to appear on that station you must in turn allow the candidate running against him to appear. That is No. 4.

The newspaper certainly has nothing of that. I don't say that they don't do it, I just say that they are not required to by the first amendment.

The fifth reason, they operate on the public airwaves which are owned by the Federal Government. In other words, these are public airwaves they use, and the limitation is put there by virtue of the fact that the Federal Government owns the airwaves.

Now, you say, do they control opinions, does the FCC do anything about controlling opinions. Mr. Chairman, they took away a license down in Mississippi 4 years ago for a man expressing his opinion. They said that he was making racial slurs. I happen to agree myself with the FCC. But this was this man's opinion. They took the license away from him because he expressed his opinion. And I think the FCC was right in that. And I didn't hear anybody in the networks who were in here objecting at that time when a man's license had been taken away. But I will wager to you that if for some reason the FCC took away one of these licenses here in Washington you would hear the greatest outcry that has ever been heard that there was a limitation of the freedom of speech. And yet no one said a word when that man's license was revoked and I think rightfully so. But I give you this as one example with reference to radio where a license was removed because of a man's opinion.

If I could I would like to refer to the origins of this, Mr. Chairman, long before you and I came here. I understand that you were a judge of an appellate court. And I was sort of a curbstone judge in a lesser court in my earlier days, so I sympathize with you.

But I read here from the proceedings last year against Frank Stanton, and I quote from the report:

> Senator Wallace White, the Chairman of the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commission Committee, emphasized the distinguishing feature between broadcasting and print journalism when that committee in 1947 considered amending the Communications Act to give radio the same degree of freedom from government regulation of content as newspapers.

And I quote Senator White. This was on the hearings where that bill was considered:

> I do not accept in any degree that there is no difference between the power of government with respect to newspapers and the power of the government with respect to radio communication. If you radio people are placing your feet on that foundation you are just indulging in dreams, because Congress will not stand in the long run for any such interpretation.

Those are from the hearings of the 80th Congress, the first session.

Now, I would like just another quote over here in the Red Lion Broadcasting case, wherein the Supreme Court ruled that previous decision in these words:

> The Court upheld the regulation unequivocally, recognizing that the Commission was more than a traffic policeman concerned with the technical aspects of broadcasting, and that it neither exceeded its power under the statute nor transgressed the First Amendment in interesting itself in general program format and the kind of programs broadcast by licensees.

I quote again from the Red Lion case as also:

> Where there are substantially more individuals who want to broadcast than there are frequencies to allocate it is ideal to posit an unabridgeable First Amendment right to broadcast comparable to the right of every individual to speak, write or publish.

And again:

> But the people as a whole retain their collective right to have the medium function consistently with the end and the purposes of the First Amendment. It is the right of the viewer and listener and not the right of the broadcaster which is paramount.

Now, in developing the fairness doctrine, again in the Mayflower decision in 1940, they laid down unequivocally that the FCC was more than a traffic cop, and it was its duty to see that fairness was had in any matter having to do with broadcast.

I would like to take up one thing which I think brings us to the meat of the program, and I would like to take a specific example. We had a report come to our Committee on Investigations of the full House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that there was deceit and fraud in "The Selling of the Pentagon." "The Selling of the Pentagon" was not a news documentary in which opinions were given or in which the testimony that was taken was consolidated; it was a question and answer program. That was the format of that program.

We had two witnesses in before us, and we asked them questions with reference to what they had said. And we said, did you give this question and answer which appeared in "The Selling of the Pentagon?"

And they said, we did not give that answer to that question.

We took this and went all the way through it. What they in fact did on that program was to broadcast questions and answers, and they took answers to some questions and put them to different questions. A second technique they used was to take partial answers to questions and consolidate those into one answer and put them through another question. We said that that was deceit and fraud, because this was a question and answer series, and they did not give those answers.

That was why we got into this matter in the beginning. We believe that you could not commit deceit and fraud and this was the reason we had Mr. Stanton in. And the purpose of following up was not the deceit and fraud, that was there on the record, that showed from the film: what we were trying to find out was how the fraud was committed.

And I say to the chairman that we have all kinds of letters in our committee asking us how such fraud could be committed, the public writing to us wanting to know how the fraud could be committed. And that is what we did in subpenaing the outtakes in "The Selling of the Pentagon." We were trying to find out how the fraud took place; that is what we were attempting to find out.

May I say to my distinguished chairman that if he were sitting in an appeals court, the U.S. Court of Appeals, or an appeals court in the State of North Carolina, and I took answers to questions and put them to other questions, and combined the answers and put them to other questions, and took them up to you, and the lawyer called it to your attention, you would say to me, you have falsified the record. And I suspect probably that you would order me put in jail.

Now, there is nothing in this that would allow Frank Stanton or any other member of CBS to be put in jail. But the important part is that they did falsify the record; this is the all-important thing—they falsified a question and answer documentary.

Now, out of this, may I say, we saw this coming years ago. If you had the Communications Act of 1934 up for amendment today I can tell you that there would be some serious amendments made. We saw this coming when the Public Broadcasting Corporation was created 4 years ago. And we very carefully covered this matter in order to be sure that that did not take place in public broadcasting. And what did we do? We put in these records—and may I say as to those who were trying to create the Public Broadcasting Corporation, they not only consented to it, they approved it, because they didn't want to get in just exactly the situation that Frank Stanton and CBS did over "The Selling of the Pentagon," they wanted to be sure that controversial matters received attention both pro and con—and we put in there: "All controversial matters must be treated in perspective and in balance."

If the 1934 code were being written today, I can assure you, those words would be in that code.

There is one thing I think that probably ought to be covered here. Every poll in this country that I know of that has been taken in the last 2 years—and I would guess that there are any number—shows that the public believes that the news boardcasts are biased. If you can find a poll which does not show that, I would like to see it.

Now, I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that that kind of a belief of people generally at large would not be true if both sides of the matter were treated equal. And this is the reason we see such an outcry on "The Selling of the Pentagon," because it was such a one-sided thing.

But I will say this, even if they had condensed this program, had not made it a question and answer format, I doubt if there is anything that our Subcommittee on Investigations could have done, because consolidation of a program is a matter of judgment for the newsmen. So therefore I doubt if we would have even gone into it. In fact, I think we would have said we probably didn't have jurisdiction of it. But where it was a question and answer, and in the question and answers we said that those questions and answers were falsifications, then we believed that we had a right to investigate it. And that is the reason we demanded the out-takes.

Now, may I say that some of this was taken in Peoria, Ill. And the fact of it is that they spent several hours up there, more than 1 day, in getting material for "The Selling of the Pentagon."

By merely an accident some 2 months ago I ran into a man on radio who was involved in this in that he was working for the station. And he gave me an idea of how this question and answer was done, because he sat there and watched it. And they asked question after question when the set was not even turned on. And then finally when they got the answers they wanted, they turned on the lights and turned on the sound.

Now, these are the kinds of things I think we ought to be interested in. These are the kinds of things I think that not only my committee ought to be interested in but your's ought to be interested in, because the effect that you are going to have on the media as we go through these next few years is going to be most important.

In talking with other newsmen that I believe are as nearly unbiased as I can find, they tell me that it is not necessarily a question of bias in most instances on newscasts. What causes this difficulty with the listeners and why they are getting these adverse polls against them is because of the selectivity of the news.

I think the chairman realizes that in the course of the day there is a tremendous amount of news accumulated from all over the world in 24 hours. The important part, and where the newsman has the great chance to have the bias, is because he discusses only the news which he believes to be the news.

There is one thing I have found. If you go to New York you will find that nearly all of them up there have very much of the same kind of an outlook on life. I don't say that this is necessarily political bias, I say that nearly all of them have that kind of an outlook in New York City. Now, what would be selected for New York City might not fit Charlotte, N.C.; Chicago, Ill.; San Francisco, or Houston. But as I watch the news night after night, this same type of news, the same selectivity of the items of the news seems to fit pretty much all of the broadcasts.

It is in this great area of selectivity of the news—and I think almost every newsman that I can find tells me that this is the secret of the bias, is the same selectivity of the news night after night. The items of the news that they choose to air seem to fit the kind of a format that fits them up here in their brains and in their hearts.

Now, how can you correct this situation?

Well, I had one newsman I remember distinctly, who probably is going to testify, or has testified already, who said: "I don't try to be objective, I have never made any effort to be objective. What I try to do is to be fair." Well, if you will just read the definition of objectivity, fairness is included in objectivity; if you are objective you will be fair. But there is more to it than that. The idea is that the news is presented from both sides of the spectrum. And may I say that that is one of the violent issues that I think we are involved with.

Now, 315 I don't think we have any difficulty with. Everybody understands it.

Mr. Chairman, wherever you have a station, and you have an issue presented, and you have an opportunity to choose one pro and con, you always get that kind, you always get a fair answer to that, because you get both sides of the issue presented. There is no difficulty in making that decision by the station as to whether you have one on one side and one on the other. The problem is, how does the newscaster himself absorb both sides of this issue and attempt to present it not only fairly but objectively. And I think that is what we have tried to do in the Public Broadcasting Corporation Act. And I think it is going to work.

I will be happy to answer any questions, but I believe this is the gist of what I have to say.

Senator ERVIN. If I construe your testimony correctly, you recognize and emphasize the fact that there are no limitations on the freedom of the press with respect to the printed word other than those limitations which are applicable to the spoken words of an individual. In other words, the only limitations on the press are the limitations which are imposed on the individual, such as he shall not slander or defame.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is true.

Senator ERVIN. You take the position that although the radio is a powerful media, the most powerful media in this country is TV?

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I think anybody on our committee who has been at this as long as I have, 18 years, and has watched the development of this wonderful media, certainly comes to the conclusion today that this is by far the most powerful media in America, far surpassing anything in the newspapers, because, as I say, between 90 and 95 percent of all the TV's in this country are turned on once during a 24-hour period. This is the most immediacy that you have. I would say in most homes those that are at home listen to the 12 o'clock noon news. Those that maybe get there at 6 o'clock and are at home watch the 6 o'clock. But the great majority watch the 10 o'clock or 9 o'clock news, as it is in some communities.

Senator Ervin. I don't know what the statistics are on the subject, but as I ride along the road I pass a lot of houses which give the impression that the occupants don't have enough bread to eat, but they have an aerial sticking out of the roof. So I think there are perhaps more broadcast reception instruments in this country than any other country.

Mr. Springer. You are right, Mr. Chairman. May I take a personal example in my own district. In a home I entered in the last 6 months, where the recipients were getting $105 a month—that is all—they had a TV. And I asked them about this. And they said, well, you would be amazed at what we can do for $19 a month. But in explaining it to me, they said they felt this was even more important than eating, to have this available to them all these hours of the day, because they had nothing else to do. And I think this is just as true as human nature, when they can get this kind of entertainment this cheap, they are going to buy it.

Senator Ervin. You take the position that there is a fundamental distinction between news media which uses the printed word and news media which uses the broadcast frequencies?

Mr. Springer. I don't think there is any doubt about it, Mr. Chairman. For instance, the Fairness Doctrine as developed has been accepted, it has been reinforced in the Supreme Court. I don't say the newspapers are always fair. Some of them aren't. They don't have to be fair. Because a newspaper prints the words of one political candidate it doesn't have to another. These are fundamental things.

And second, the newspaper doesn't have to operate in the public interest. There is nothing that compels them to operate in the public interest. But when you file for a license you make an affidavit and swear that you will operate in the public interest.

I think these are serious distinctions. These are what I call, Mr. Chairman, modifications of the first amendment, modifications of the first amendment by law.

Senator Ervin. Isn't it true, however, that there are certain freedoms which belong to the broadcasters as well as to other individuals? You take the position that the freedom of speech clause of the First Amendment does not apply to broadcasters?

Mr. Springer. I say that it is modified by these three principles.

Senator Ervin. They certainly do speak. In other words, it has always seemed to me that the genius of the Constitution was that while the Founding Fathers could not foretell all future inventions, they framed the grants of power and the liberties in such a way that they covered every subsequent development or discovery to which those words would apply. Consequently, they couldn't foresee television or the radio, they did include some provisions in the Constitution about freedom of speech, and those provisions certainly, to some substantial degree, apply to those who speak words over the broadcast.

Mr. Springer. I have no fault with that. I do say this, that the question of what is in the public interest, and the reason that we took up "The Selling of the Pentagon" was because we said that when you had falsified a record which you said over the air was true—and that is in effect what they said—and that record was not true, we didn't believe they were operating in the public interest. But we didn't get into that. What we were trying to do was to defend the right of the people to know how that falsification was done. And they were trying to conceal the falsification by concealing the outtakes, so that we couldn't say how the falsification took place. Everybody knew that it was a falsification. It was deceit and fraud, that was evident from the record, they admitted on the witness stand that that is what took place. There wasn't any denial that they consolidated the answers to these questions and they put answers to other questions over in front of other questions, and they said, this is the record. They falsified the record. And we say there is a serious question in the public interest as to whether or not radio and TV can falsify a documentary where it is a question and answer documentary.

Now, that is the real issue, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Ervin. Now, nobody can gainsay the fact that where there is any person who has the finances he can go into publishing a newspaper or magazine, but there are limits on broadcast frequencies. It is therefore absolutely essential that some agency of the Government should have the power to assign these broadcasting frequencies among the applicants.

Mr. Springer. There is no doubt about that.

Senator Ervin. I also believe there is no doubt that any freedoms people have, whether it is freedom of speech of an individual, freedom of speech in debate of a Member of Congress, the use of the printed word, or the use of the telecast, freedoms are abused. But it seems to me that the question is how to stop the abuses of freedoms without curtailing the freedoms themselves.

Mr. Springer. Mr. Chairman, let me show you exactly what took place. They called everybody—there was never a lobbying job—I have been in Congress 22 years, and there was never a lobbying job on the House side like CBS did in this instance. They not only were calling every Congressman—I am talking about Frank Stanton himself, he called all my friends around, they told me that he did—but every station was doing it. But the important thing, Mr. Chairman, was, we got the regulation changed at CBS. And that is what got them off the hook when the vote came.

Now, let me just show you. It is good once in awhile to take a look at these media. What did they do? They changed it. It isn't possible for them to produce "The Selling of the Pentagon" or anything like it again and do what they did in that documentary. They changed their rules so that they can't transpose answers to questions and put them over to other questions, and consolidate answers and put them over, where this is a question and answer documentary. This is what I am talking about, the surveillance of the Congress and the public interest is good. We didn't find out how this fraud is committed because we didn't get the citation. But the important thing of it was, it was the surveillance of Congress that got the change made in the public interest. And that was in the public interest. And that is why

CBS made the change in their regulations. So what they did can't be done again.

Now, that is important, Mr. Chairman.

Senator ERVIN. I will certainly have to concur with the view that sometimes the news is not covered in the way it should be. I happen to be a southerner and I have opposed many so-called Civil Rights bills. I stood on the floor of the Senate with other people who entertained similar views and pointed out that some of these bills were very foolish because they took an act which was perfectly moral externally and made a man's guilt depend on something hidden inside of his mind. We pointed out that man didn't have the capacity to do a very good job of judging people's intents and a law that made a man's actions, perfectly legal in every respect, become illegal on the basis of intent was a very unwise law. We pointed out that many of these laws, by their nature difficult to enforce, held out false hopes that resulted in the frustration of the minority race. I also pointed out that, under the old interpretation of the Constitution, a law which made the right of a man to use his own property for a lawful purpose dependant upon the will of others deprived him of his property without due process of the law under the fifth amendment. We pointed out that a man who stakes his capital and invests his talents in a business should have a right to say who he hires and who he fires to make his business a success. I thought we had made some reasonable arguments. But I never did see many of them reported in the press, on television or radio. In other words, it sometimes appears that the news media adopts a common policy and a common program, and they ignore what is said on the other side. So there can be no doubt that these great powers are abused.

But the thing that bothers me is who is going to do the supervising? Personally, I would rather trust the news media than the Government. Consider the following illustration: In my own State we have thousands of people who grow tobacco, and thousands of them engaged in the manufacture of tobacco. The Surgeon General, the political doctor, began to make war on tobacco, notwithstanding the fact that many medical doctors discount his claims and say that what he says is not accurate. Well, in spite of the fairness doctrine, the FCC says that the political doctors, whose views have been adopted by the FCC, are in complete possession of all of the truth on that subject, and all those who have the complete truth on the subject can present spot announcements, but to those who disagree with them, the fairness doctrine doesn't compel that they be given time to present opposing information. In other words, you turned this over to the government, and the government said, we have the complete truth on this subject, and those who disagree with us have none, and therefore they shan't be heard under the fairness doctrine. That is rather a tyrannous power.

In addition, the fact that a broadcaster has the constant threat hanging over him that he may lose his license if he displeases a substantial part of the community, or the government. I think that impedes the freedom of speech. However, I am not sure I know what the remedy is. But you as a member of the Commerce Committee which has jurisdiction of this subject, and have given a great deal of study to the subject, and you have expressed yourself here in a most lucid and forceful manner. I understand from your testimony that in your judgment the bills which undertake to give the broadcast media the same unrestricted right to freedom of speech and freedom of the press that is enjoyed by citizens generally, the spoken word and the printed word of the newspaper, could not possibly pass Congress.

Mr. Springer. You have to say it this way, I think, judge. Anyone can say anything on radio or TV that he wants to. But if he does it he must be brought within these principles which I have outlined of operating in the public interest, the fairness doctrine, section 315 principally. Now, if he violates those three, then he is subject to some kind of a citation or some kind of correction or some kind of a penalty from the FCC for violating those three principles which have been enunciated and have been declared valid by the Supreme Court of the United States.

That is my answer. And I think that is just exactly where they are today. I would say that if you took a lawyer for any one of the networks he would tell you exactly, we can't stop people from saying whatever they want to say, the question is, do they violate any one of those three. There isn't any restrictions on them getting on there and saying it. But there are certain penalties that can be applied if and when they do violate those three things.

Senator Ervin. One of which is, they can be silenced as far as the use of the airways are concerned.

Mr. Springer. They could be. For instance, the radio station in Mississippi was put off the air.

Senator Ervin. I wonder whether, if the station had jumped on the white citizens council as they did on the minority race, it would have ever been taken off.

Mr. Springer. You have me there, judge. I can only stay within what I have here, these three principles, that—315 is in the law, and the fairness doctrine has been developed over the years by a combination of FCC regulations plus the decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court. Now, operating in the public interest, that is gradually being cleared up. But, judge, I think the most important thing that I found coming out of "The Selling of the Pentagon" is that it is the constant surveillance of the Congress that has helped. If you want to look at them and go back to what I call biased reports of 2 or 3 years ago and take them today, they have improved tremendously, even since "The Selling of the Pentagon" I can tell you. I watch these every night. They are tremendously improved insofar as getting balance into this thing and getting bias out of it. And it is the constant surveillance by the Congress which has brought this about. It has brought balance and objectivity and more fairness in my opinion in the newsbroadcast than we had 3, 4 or 5 years ago.

Senator Ervin. I just wonder, though, if Congress doesn't imperil the freedom of the press and the freedom of speech when Congress says, we are going to reserve to ourselves the right to conduct an investigation and see whether the broadcast media or the radio media or even the press—of course they have never done it on the press—have presented the truth as the truth should have been presented.

Mr. Springer. Let me say this. I think CBS would have been much better to let that citation go and then take it to the Supreme Court of the United States and get a decision. I would be happy to have that decision as to whether or not we have this power which we said we had to investigate "The Selling of the Pentagon" under the circumstances. Now, I think it is the Supreme Court of the United States that has to determine whether or not this is the thing that is going to be done. But we have been following these decisions as they have been issued by the U.S. Supreme Court. And those, may I say, affect us just as much as they did CBS. If we don't have this power we certainly don't want to exercise it. If we do have this power, which we do believe we have, then we ought to have a right to exercise it. And we ought to continue this surveillance which we have given to radio and the TV to be sure that we do not get falsifications and fraud and deceit which we have proved happened in "The Selling of the Pentagon." But I do believe that the influences of the Congress has had a constructive influence upon broadcasting. And I think it has been good that we have had that kind of influence.

And I think in turn, Judge, that it is a good idea for you to have these kinds of hearings to sort of determine in the area of the first amendment just exactly what their rights are.

Senator Ervin. I agree, and I think it is a good thing for you to present your views, especially since they don't harmonize with the views of some other persons. For example, they don't harmonize with the views of Walter Cronkite or the views of Frank Stanton, and their views aren't in harmony with those of David Brinkley. But certainly they are all entitled to their opinions.

I think it would be a very serious thing if the Government would undertake to control in any way the contents of a news broadcast. I hear much complaining that the large networks are selecting news, but I have noticed that when the President of the United States comes down to deliver the State of the Union message he selects what he is going to talk about and he leaves out a lot of things I think he ought to talk about.

Mr. Springer. Certainly we have no authority that I know of, judge, over any news broadcast. And we have never made any protest. What we did say in "The Selling of the Pentagon" was that here was a question and answer documentary, and they falsified the questions and the answers. Now, that is not in the public interest. Now, if they had taken this and consolidated in it a new documentary which was the opinion of the broadcasters themselves and for which they selected the items that they wanted, we would have had no jurisdiction over it whatever. Our subcommittee fully understood this. But it was an entirely different situation in "The Selling of the Pentagon" with the questions and answers as is. And that is the reason we got into it, and only for that reason. We said that what we wanted to find out, and felt the public wanted to know—and we had all these letters and inquiries—was, how did this falsification and deceit take place. We believe it is in the public interest to know how this fraud and deceit took place. That is our only interest in it, not that they did it.

And may I repeat to you again, we have no jurisdiction over news broadcasts that I know of. This is their pure right, to select the news. But I think it is this constant surveillance that we have, and talking about it—and may I say that the schools of communication in this country are developing activists, there is no doubt about it—I can go through it and name you a whole group of them—the schools of communications are coming out with activists in the field. And this presents us with a serious problem in the future. When you talk about activism—and this is the big discussion in journalism schools today, shall we be activists or shall we not? To be an activist means you take one side of a situation. In other words, you try to develop social issues. You see what I mean? Now, that has never been the theory of journalism at all up until this time. But this is one of the big issues in my opinion that is coming on in this country, is activism in journalism and communications schools. I don't take any position on it, I am just saying that it is coming. And practically every dean of a school of journalism will tell you that is true today, that that is what is happening.

Senator Ervin. I certainly agree. I see some newspapers that slant the news so as to fit their views as expressed on the editorial page and I also hear that some Senators occasionally lift things out of context. Therefore, I certainly recognize that there is a very strong argument that can be made for the necessity of having the fairness doctrine so as to require such powerful instrumentalities as broadcasters to present in a fair manner both sides of a controversy.

Mr. Springer. Judge, let me say this to you here. Back some months ago, the Washington Post in their editorial page discussed this very thing that you are talking about. And Wiggins, who used to be the publisher of the Washington Post, made a speech before the Washington Society of New Jersey. And it was a corker. I wish I could put it in this record. But the gist of it was somewhat droll, and with a sense of humor. He said: You know, I have been wondering about the Vietnam war. Suppose in the Revolution we could have had a newsman there with a microphone that he could have put under the GI's nose as he walked up to the Delaware River bank and said, what are you doing out on a snowy night like this with 12 inches of snow? Is this good tactics? And get an opinion from him like many of these people have. And then when they got on the other side of the river he could ask, why are you going up to Trenton? Don't you realize that if you go up there and bombard Trenton you will kill an awful lot of civilians, they will be running back and forth on the street—and then get the GI's opinion on this. And then, what is this all about, what is this thing you are talking about, taxation without representation? What does that mean?

Now, Mr. Wiggins in his rather eccentric way was trying to determine, if you had the Revolution today and you had a news media going out and getting an opinion from the GI's as to the strategy that was developed—I am talking about George Washington's Army—and then you broadcast this to the people in that vein, without any qualification, as you are taking these things and doing, what kind of reporting would that be—this was the point he was trying to make—without getting some kind of serious balance into it, such as the opinion of the commander, or something like that, as to exactly what the Army was doing?

But this raises immediate problems. Now, in those days nobody knew for months what happened. By 6 o'clock tonight everybody will know what has happened in Vietnam. And that is all right.

But I think he is coming back to the question of how you report the news and whether or not you get this news in balance and it makes some kind of sense. I think he was criticizing, but what he was trying to do is in a backhand sort of way to get at this question of what your judgment is in reporting the news.

Senator Ervin. I think the crucial question—which I think was asked about 2,000 years ago by Pontius Pilate—comes down to what is truth? And then the subsidiary question is, who is going to determine what is truth? I am very reluctant to let government make that determination, or the news media, or the broadcasters. Even though comments may be lifted out of context, even though they may be reported incorrectly in some cases, and even though they may be distorted in others, I believe it is better to leave it to the people to pass on that question, rather than the FCC, for example, or any other government agency.

Mr. Springer. If I could just comment on that, I don't know that the news is presented necessarily true—it may not be untrue. But as one broadcaster well known in this country said, the news is the unusual. Now, my point to this is, is this all of the news? Now, I would guess that that broadcaster was probably brought up by some newspaper, and that has been the purpose of newspapers, as you well know, back through the years, that you present the unusual. The ordinary thing, somebody acclaimed, some student that has done well, some fellow that has served the community well, that is not news. The news is the unusual, when somebody gets killed, something unusual. And that is the nature of the news. Now, when they come on with the international news I take it that the unusual is what they put on. And this is the way the newscasters explained it to me. It is the unusual. You are not going to get anyplace by talking about news that isn't unusual.

Senator Ervin. That expresses the old adage, when a dog bites a man, that is not news, but when a man bites a dog it is news.

Mr. Springer. Exactly. And that is what we are thrown into in this. And I don't think we can do anything about that, even though the newsman selects something that may not be of very much importance to some people, it is an eye-catcher, it is a lead item on news.

Senator Ervin. I want to thank you for a most interesting and illuminating discussion.

I take it you think it is essential to preserve the fairness doctrine in respect to the broadcast media. The doctrine, as you interpret it, would not give any governmental agency the right or the power to control the contents of what is presented as news, but it would require an objective presentation of both sides of the controversy and an opportunity for a man who feels he has been personally attacked to present his side of the story.

Mr. Springer. That is right. I think the fairness doctrine has worked well. In section 315 it has certainly worked well through the years. And it ought to be retained. And I think the whole thing of what is happening should in the public interest be presented.

Senator Hruska. Mr. Springer, in the last year more or less there has been a good deal of discussion before this subcommittee on the place of the press and how it is to operate. And some efforts have been made to judge it. And among the reactions, at least of some of the segments of the press, has been the observation that there is a conspiracy, a conspiracy against freedom of the press. Now, then, would you consider the constant surveillance by the Congress, which you advocate, as a form of conspiracy, or do you see any conspiracy against the media in the sense that has been charged from time to time?

Mr. SPRINGER. Are you talking about the written press, Senator?

Senator HRUSKA. Generally the press, most of it in the vocal press, the pictorial press.

Mr. SPRINGER. The written press I am convinced that we have no jurisdiction whatever over. The First Amendment applies completely to the written press. I don't think that there is any control or surveillance of any kind that we would have over the written press.

Senator HRUSKA. That would be separate and apart.

And the written press has also suggested that this criticism of them is a part of a conspiracy. Do you think there is such a conspiracy, either in the written press or the other press?

Mr. SPRINGER. Senator, I don't know of any conspiracy, I have never even heard of a conspiracy against the written press, I think it is ridiculous. I don't know of anyone who wants to do anything about the written press. That has been free during all of our history. There is a long history going back—almost every State court in this country has interpreted it, and it has been interpreted by the supreme court, and there is a line of decisions that there isn't any control over the written press. And my discussion here, as the judge well knows, completely has to do with the media of radio and TV.

Senator HRUSKA. I understand that. And we are all aware of it. And that is why I am asking this question, do you think there is a conspiracy? Is there any ground for saying this—notwithstanding the common knowledge as to the freedom of the press and taking for granted that the First Amendment is an absolute guarantee of the freedom of the written press. There have been suggestions that in some of the criticisms of the press there is a conspiracy to try to impinge upon that right and upon that constitutional privilege. Do you think there is any such conspiracy?

Mr. SPRINGER. Senator, Harold Anderson, president of the Omaha World Herald, couldn't have said it any better—I couldn't say it as well when he said: "I have serious reservations about the proposition that a heavily regulated licensed industry like broadcasting has automatically and inevitably the first amendment protection afforded to the Nation's newspapers. I fail to understand the almost hysterical reaction to these criticisms in some quarters." And he pointed out that Mr. Agnew hasn't dismantled a single TV network or cost a single TV commentator his job, and at the last report the New York Times was still publishing daily. It is absolutely ridiculous. There hasn't been any effort that I know of by anyone—I think I have talked to everybody on the Judiciary Committee of any consequence on the House side. There hasn't been any suggestion of any kind, even to them, and they haven't even come to any conclusion that this is the kind of thing—I just don't believe that as to the press, I am talking about the written press.

Senator Hruska. And yet you were resisted in the other body in an effort to obtain certain sources of information. And I imagine even there the assertion was made that those efforts were a part of a conspiracy, a part of an effort to try to whittle down the freedom of the press. Were such assertions made?

Mr. Springer. Senator, let me say this—and the judge probably knows this as well as I do—from your early law school days you know this, that as far as I know at this point—I haven't been a student of this in recent years, but I did know something about libel in my earlier days, because I was with a firm where we had this kind of case.

Senator Hruska. Since that time they have repealed most of your knowledge of libel.

Mr. Springer. Let me just say this to you, Senator. If you will recall from your law school days, there was only one privilege, I mean secret information, the sources of information, only one, and that was the lawyer. And why? Only because a lawyer had to retain the confidence of his client in order to defend him. Nobody else has ever had that right. And the only reason the lawyer ever had it—they wouldn't even have given it to him except that he couldn't defend his clients if he had to go into the grand jury and divulge the information, it would make it impossible for him to have any defense. This is a question of the public interest when you are talking about sources of news, sources of information. There has to be a reason in the public interest why that person would fail to give it up. Now, if somebody has killed somebody, the grand jury has a right to subpena anyone. It hasn't to do with just newsmen, but anyone else. There is only one privilege that I know anything about in all my law school days, and subsequent to that, is the lawyer himself and he has it only for one reason. And the only reason they gave it to him is because it is in the public interest, you couldn't have justice otherwise. There is no reason for anybody else—if somebody has been killed, murdered, or raped, and if you have some kind of a violent act, and somebody knows about it, they should be required to testify about, unless it is in the public interest that they not do it. If I am mistaking my law, I think the judge can tell you that that is the law on the question at the present time.

Senator Hruska. You have told us what many witnesses have told us; namely, that there is a freedom of the press under that right of a free press, including the right to be wrong. We cannot restrain anybody from saying anything he wants to say. Now, do I understand further that this freedom, in the light of your testimony particularly about "The Selling of the Pentagon," and that this freedom of the press is also extended to include a right to engage in fraud and distortion and falsity in the content of the disclosures that are made pursuant to this right?

Mr. Springer. I said, and I think I am right, there is not any restriction we have on the right of any person to say anything on radio or TV that he wants to. That is his judgment, as to whether he wants to do it. What I did say is that he was subject to the penalties of these three things if he did it. Now, that is subject to two things: First, a hearing by the FCC as to whether or not he has violated any one of these three things. I am talking about operating in the public interest, the fairness doctrine, or section 315. Now, if he takes that risk when he broadcasts that he violates that. And that is a risk he takes. But there isn't anything in the law that I know of that keeps him from getting on there and saying anything.

Senator Hruska. And what are the other two things, the FCC and what else?

Mr. Springer. He is subject to the FCC jurisdiction. If he is not satisfied that this is fair, he may take an appeal to the court. And Senator, can there be anything fairer than that? If he is attacked as violating one of those three things that I have mentioned, if he has been, and the FCC finds against him, he can take an appeal to the courts. There isn't anything in this thing that keeps anybody from having all the rights that he is entitled to. He isn't cut off down at the FCC just with a hearing.

Senator Hruska. And I presume that as an elected official you would believe that you are at least as qualified as any medium of the press, including the networks, to judge which issues are in the public interest and which are not; would that be a safe assumption?

Mr. Springer. Take "The Selling of the Pentagon." They didn't give us outtakes. On "Projects Nassau" and the "Invasion of Haiti" they gave us every single outtake we wanted, which we asked for, last year. They gave it to us on "Project Nassau" and the "Invasion of Haiti," and they didn't give us on "The Selling of the Pentagon." Why? Because there is a serious question in "Project Nassau" and the "Invasion of Haiti" that they violated a section of the statute with reference to conspiracy, and they also violated the Logan Act, there is a serious question. And the lawyers advised them, and they coughed up everything.

You want to know how much it was? If you put in single boxes 14 inches high, 20 inches square, it would go from this railing all the way around to there. They gave us all of it in the "Invasion of Haiti." They didn't stand on this principle in that, did they? They said there was a principle involved there. The principle involved there was that they might go to jail, and that is the reason they didn't stand on their principle in "Invasion of Haiti" and "Project Nassau," which was the preparation of people down in Florida, to which CBS contributed somewhere around $85,000 to $115,000.

Now, I give you this: when you stand on principle once, you ought to stand on principle all the time.

Senator Hruska. Thank you for coming here. It is very evident that you have given this a lot of study and a lot of review.

Senator Ervin. During my time in Congress I received two especially intriguing letters from constituents. One of them was back in 1946 when President Truman vetoed the OPA bill and made an appeal to the country to contact their Senators and Representatives and ask for a strong OPA bill. The letter I received from one of my constituents proposed a solution that would have been satisfactory to everybody if it could have been made administratively possible. He said: "I am in the electrical business. I want you to get an OPA law that will take the controls off of everything I have to sell, but keep them on the things I have to buy."

The other day I received a letter from a constituent on what Congress should do with respect to freedom of the press. He said: "Nobody in his right mind would ask Congress to suppress the freedom of the press, but Congress certainly ought to do something about all these lies and distortions."

I want to thank you again for your very illuminating and very enlightening discussion.

Mr. Springer. Thank you very kindly.

Senator Ervin. Counsel will call the next witness.

Mr. Baskir. Mr. Chairman, our next witness this morning is Mr. David Brinkley from NBC News.

Senator Ervin. We are delighted to welcome you to the subcommittee, and wish to express to you our appreciation for your willingness to come and express your views with respect to a matter on which you are most knowledgeable and have had vast experience.

STATEMENT OF DAVID BRINKLEY, NEWSMAN, NATIONAL BROADCASTING CO., INC.

Mr. Brinkley. Thank you, Senator. And I would like to thank the subcommittee first for inviting me to come. And I want to say that I think what you are doing here is a most useful work certainly to all of us in journalism, and I trust to the Congress and to the American people.

You have had a great many other witnesses here who have discussed in some detail the legislation that is pending on this subject, including S. 1311 by Senator Pearson and Representative Whalen. And on this score, and to avoid repetitious testimony, I would say only that I agree entirely and totally with what you the chairman said at the opening of these hearings.

And instead of covering ground that has already been covered expertly and even eloquently, I would like instead, with your permission, to offer a few thoughts on the nature and cause of the difficult relationships these days between the press and the public officials and the public. And with your indulgence I will try to do that, in the hope that it might help in some small way to understand why these difficulties exist.

Television news arrived on the scene and achieved some kind of maturity only in about the last 15 years. And because of its speed, immediacy, pervasiveness and very wide circulation, it has by now had a substantial effect on how the American people, the public officials, and private citizens view the performance of journalism.

And the first point I think is that television news every night reaches people who are not reached by any other news media, and never have been. It reaches vast numbers of people who may buy a daily newspaper, but who often only read the sports pages or the comics, who may skim the front page lightly, and who almost never read the editorial pages, and people who therefore do not fully understand what the function of journalism is.

I have learned this over a number of years, all my working life, in fact, by a careful reading, very often between the lines, of vast quantities of mail from the millions of people at the other end of the tube. And what I have found are profound misconceptions about journalism in general and television news broadcasts in particular. Great numbers of people, public officials and private citizens, resent the fact that a great deal of what we put on the air is unattractive, disturbing, depressing, and even ugly. And a great many somehow have the idea that we put this on the air because we like it—campus riots, urban riots, violent demonstrations, and so on—that we put it on because we approve it, endorse it, or advocate it.

Any time there is any kind of ugly or depressing public event, say a spasm of urban arson, looting and so on, I get letters by the hundreds or by the thousands saying in effect, why do you glorify and dignify this kind of unspeakable conduct?

The answer of course is so obvious it is almost embarrassing to have to give it. It is of course that we put it on because we think the audience would like to know about it or ought to know about it, certainly not because we like it or approve it or advocate it.

Nevertheless, the question keeps coming up day after day, year after year. And I suspect the questions come mainly from listeners who never until recent years have ever been exposed to anything like serious journalism. And so they therefore don't really understand what it is, don't understand what its purpose is.

And this has led to a fairly widespread public anger directed mainly at television news, and now reflected in the public statements of political figures who have detected this anger and hostility, and have made a public issue of it.

Political figures make sensational attacks against the news media, and in the act of doing that they reinforce and further encourage the public hostility. And it is a repetition of cause and effect. And this is a process we have seen now for the last two or three or 4 years.

In the mail people who are angry at us—and they are fairly numerous—people who are angry at us still make precisely the same charges and precisely the same complaints they were making before. But now invariably they add one additional line at the bottom. And the line is: "Agnew was right."

That is one point, that we have reached people not previously exposed to serious journalism and who don't really understand what its purpose is.

The second is that on television journalism takes on a personal dimension. On a newspaper of course a reporter is not seen, his work is there in the form of type on paper, whereas on television he is there in living color complete with haircut and necktie.

And people who want to can always detect or think they can detect a raised eyebrow or something equally silly. But that happens only when they don't like what he is saying. If they do like what he is saying, then he can laugh and cry and light a cigar and stand on his head and nobody minds. There are never any complaints about bias and slanting when the news is good. They appear only when the news is bad. And to the regret of all of us nowadays, it quite often is.

And a third point is that a television news broadcaster comes out of the same tube, the same box, as a succession of entertainers, comedians, actors, jugglers, and so on. And after all of that, much of it junk, when another face appears that is not wearing a toothpaste smile, comes on and says, there has been another riot, and more war casualties, and taxes are going up, and so, pouring out a stream of depressing news, well, it looks even worse by comparison with what came before it and by comparison with what came after it.

Now, I don't say all this to complain about how misunderstood we are and how put upon we are, and how hard life is for people in journalism. I say it only in the hope that it will help to explain some of the current controversy and help all of us to look at it in a realistic way.

As for intimidation by our critics, there is none that I know of. Anyone who can't stand criticism should not go into journalism, as I say, and I think you would agree that anyone who can't stand criticism should not go into politics. The two professions——

Senator Ervin. I think Harry Truman expressed that same truth when he said, if you can't stand heat, stay out of the kitchen.

Mr. Brinkley. Precisely. Our two professions are closely related in many ways. Those in both fields are exposed to public scrutiny, attacks, criticism, and second guessing. And some stand for reelection every 2 years, and some every four and some every six. We have to stand every night—and they can vote us out any time simply by turning a knob, they don't even have to go out of the house to do it. And if enough people did so, very soon everyone now on the air would be off the air, or, so to speak, out of office.

So intimidation by critics is not a serious problem.

I think the other problems being discussed here are serious—the increasing flood of subpenas, the demands to produce notes, films, tapes, and so on, second guessing a month or a year or more after the fact. I think those indeed are dangerous to freedom of the press—the press meaning all of us—and in my view they ought to be stopped. And I believe S. 1311 would be a good way to start.

There are of course other questions and problems, such as the so-called Fairness Doctrine, the Skelly-Wright decision about advertised products, but those have not yet, at least, been applied particularly to the part of television I am involved in and know very much about, which is the news programs. And there have been other witnesses here who know more about that than I do.

But finally on the general subject of how well television news does its job and how much it merits the criticism it now gets, I think the network news programs, which are the only ones I am familiar with, are pretty good. Their limitations are quite severe, imposed as they are by the nature of the medium itself. Obviously they are not comprehensive. A great deal of selectivity is required. Much of what we do is excessively brief. But a half-hour is a half-hour, and there is no way to stretch it. While a newspaper can add pages, we can't.

I do believe them to be honest, and I know there is no conspiracy or plot to undermine or to be unfair to the right or the left. And I think the proof of that is that our bitterest critics are the far right and the far left. The far right generally thinks we are radicals, while the far left thinks we are conservative members of the establishment.

We have, needless to say, been guilty of some sins and made our share of mistakes, and I certainly would not attempt to defend them. This particularly was true in the earlier years of television news when we had an entirely new kind of American history being made and reported by new people using an entirely new medium. And we still have a number of faults. But the rampant political bias charged by our critics simply does not exist. What happens mainly is that people project their own political bias on us. A biased opinion simply is an opinion you do not agree with. And if we are accused of bias by both sides, the far right and the far left, we must be doing something right.

Thank you.

Senator ERVIN. I think that you put your finger squarely on what causes controversy in the field of speaking—and I'm using that word speaking in the broadest terms—on page 4 of your statement where you said in effect that if people don't like what a broadcaster is saying, they can detect, or think they can detect, a raised eyebrow, but if they do like what he is saying, then the broadcaster can laugh and cry and light a cigar and stand on his head and nobody minds.

Mr. BRINKLEY. It is true, Senator.

Senator ERVIN. And I think that what you say on page 6 explains why there is some criticism of broadcasting because it has to limit news and select news, and you say that "their limitations are quite severe, imposed as they are by the nature of the medium itself."

Mr. BRINKLEY. I had better add one point there, Senator. You mentioned while Mr. Springer was on the stand that some of your own thoughts and your own words during one of the civil rights debates were not reported or not widely reported. Covering the Senate and the House is a terrible problem for us. You know, of course, we can't make any film inside the Senate Chamber. And what we quite often do—and as I recall, I don't know what particular bill you were referring to, but what we have often done with great difficulty is have an artist go in the Senate Chamber and draw a picture of you, or whoever it may have been, and then we use that on the air, which is not very satisfactory. But it is the best we can do. They won't even allow him to draw in there, he has to go and look at it and go outside and draw. And this is a very slow process. It is quite difficult. And we are on at 6:30 rain or shine, regardless of what the Senate does. So difficulties like that affect us, and they do not affect the printed press. They can sit in there and take notes and carry the entire proceeding if they want to.

Senator ERVIN. My criticism is that there was a tendency on the part of the news media to overlook those persons who were opposing these bills. I really thought that what we were saying in opposition to them was more sensible than what was being said in support of them. But most of the media printed what was said in support of them, except for those beknighted television stations or newspapers that reported what we said.

So in spite of the fact that I didn't like the way they functioned, I don't know any way, as I said, that you can have freedom and it won't be abused on occasions. Fortunately over the longrun the abuses have been minor in consequences.

I am a great believer in freedom of speech. I am not speaking with respect to any media, but as to all the media. I think that the Founding Fathers wrote the First Amendment to cover all media of communications for two reasons: The first was philosophical in nature, they recognized that there must be freedom of speech and freedom of the press if the people of this Nation were going to be free from the worst kind of tyranny there is, that is, tyranny over the mind of man, secondly, they wrote the First Amendment because they recognized that the kind of a governmental institution they created could not function properly without freedom of speech and freedom of the press. I think it is accurate to say that the first amendment gives the freedoms to all peoples within our borders, regardless of whether they be wise men or foolish men, profound men or shallow men, learned men or ignorant men, or devout men or ungodly men, it even gives it to people who hate America as well as to those who love it. Those who created the First Amendment staked the very existence of this nation on the proposition that our country in the long run has nothing to fear from freedom of speech or freedom of the press as long as it leaves truth free to combat error. I believe that one of the greatest tragedies that could ever befall this country would be for Government to undertake to arrogate to itself the power of Pontius Pilate to question, what is truth.

Senator Hruska.

Senator Hruska. Mr. Brinkley, you heard the testimony of Congressman Springer and his statement that it is wholesome to have congressional inquiry and surveillance more or less on a constant basis, just as a sort of levening process, and for all the other reasons that he suggested. Would you have any thoughts on that which you would like to share with us?

Mr. Brinkley. Well, I certainly wouldn't have any objection to Congress taking a continuing interest in what we do, along with anyone else taking a continuing interest in what we do.

I did have one thought while Mr. Springer was talking. First, let me say that I am not intimately familiar with the Pentagon documentary he was talking about. We didn't make it. And not only that, I never even saw it, to be honest with you. But I did wonder—and perhaps it is not fair to bring up the question after he has left—I did wonder why if, as he described, this fraud was proved, established and admitted beyond doubt, why was any further action called for? Why was it then necessary to subpena the film and tape and notes and whatever it was if the fraud as he described was no longer in question? I don't really see anything further that needed to be known about it.

Senator Ervin. If I may interject myself, my information, which I do guarantee to be correct, is that the FCC had a complaint on this subject about "The Selling of the Pentagon," and that the FCC decided that fraud was not apparent in the broadcast.

Mr. Brinkley. But after it was over, and after it was, as he described it, established and admitted, or confessed, or whatever word he used, it did seem to me that that must have settled it; I didn't see any point in pursuing it further. I don't know what could have been gained by pursuing it further. Obviously any broadcaster who wants to have his license renewed—and as Mr. Springer was saying, if he has not performed in, I think, the public convenience and necessity at the end of his license period, that then he could lose it, as I think the station in Mississippi did.

To answer your question, Senator Hruska, I could certainly have no objection to it.

Senator HRUSKA. The FCC has responsibilities as a supervisor in the area of radio and TV. What is your opinion as to how they discharge those responsibilities and these duties generally speaking?

Mr. BRINKLEY. I can't give you a very informed answer, because candidly I really never have had anything to do with the FCC. I am not a network lawyer, I am not a lobbyist, and have never had anything to do with the corporate or business aspects of television, and I really know nothing about them. And to be honest, care nothing about them. And as to relationships with the FCC, I have never had any, direct or indirect. And I really don't know much about it. They have never bothered me and I have never bothered them. And I am very happy to leave it that way.

As for the other departments of NBC, the lawyers and the executives and so on, I am sure they have strong feelings on the subject. But I am really not qualified to speak about it. I don't know anything about it. I regard myself as what I am, I am a journalist, and I do my job the best I can. The FCC has never bothered me. They have had a lot of mail over the years complaining about things I have done. And I trust they will get more. But they have never bothered me in any way.

Senator HRUSKA. I suppose on that score the status quo is a very happy condition, and you would like to see it perpetuated.

Mr. BRINKLEY. It suits me fine, yes.

Senator HRUSKA. I imagine, however, that if someone suggested that the FCC powers and responsibilities be extended to networks, and that they should look into that aspect of it, perhaps your interest would become sharpened and more than academic, wouldn't it?

Mr. BRINKLEY. I dare say it would, Senator.

Senator HRUSKA. I think a good many people would share that same experience.

Mr. BRINKLEY. The fairness doctrine is so beautifully named that it is very hard to speak against it. But the fact of the matter is, as we all know, fairness is quite often in the eye of the beholder. If it were possible to precisely, objectively, and scientifically determine the public interest, then I would assume that every vote on every issue in the Senate would then be unanimous. Needless to say, it is not. It is impossible to say with any precision in all cases what fairness is. One example that has often been used is, if I, for example, said something unflattering about Jimmy Hoffa, as in fact I often have, am I then obligated to run a television camera from here to the Federal prison and allow him to answer? Well, I don't know. What would the fairness doctrine say about that? As I say, fairness is so universally admired by all of us that it is very hard to raise any question about it. But when it comes down to the practical matter of applying it in everyday work, it is not always so obvious, and not always so easy.

Senator HRUSKA. Well, perhaps there would be no occasion to run over to Jimmy Hoffa's cell and put a camera in his face and have him answer. But what about a situation where a witness is in the chair that you now occupy, and very vigorous charges are made and questions are asked and conclusions and judgments are pronounced by the man who is interrogating him or subjecting him to that kind of inquisition? Then the camera stops, although the witness is there and proceeds to answer those charges, and no part of the answer is presented to the public. Is the fairness doctrine involved in that situation? Would it require too much imagination to suggest that some people think that this is not only unfair but highly unbalanced?

Mr. BRINKLEY. I would agree with you on that score. I think, however, that the idea of fairness did not originate with the fairness doctrine. It simply originated with the——

Senator HRUSKA. I understand. But we do talk about balance in journalism. Would you like to put it on that basis and suggest whether or not—of course you can't get more than 30 minutes in a half-hour, but at the same time there is a percentage—if you are going to devote 5 of that 30 minutes to the particular hearing, or whatever it is, don't you think that it would be unfair for all of it to be taken on one side of an issue and none or very little on the other?

Mr. BRINKLEY. I couldn't agree more, Senator. The situation you describe would be a quite unfair presentation of what happened here, or in whatever committee it might be. But if we did that, we certainly would be guilty of bad journalism if nothing more. And I think beyond that we would be guilty of unfairness. I would not say that has not happened. Obviously I don't see everything put on the air by everyone. I do know that we try not to do it. As I said here, we make no pretense of being comprehensive, because we simply can't; we just can't. It is impossible. But we do try to be fair with what we do put on. And I confess we don't always succeed. And in the presumably hypothetical situation you have described, if it happened as you said, it would indeed be unfair, and it should not be done.

Senator HRUSKA. Well, it does happen quite often, and it has happened right in this committee room within the last 90 days.

Mr. BRINKLEY. Has it?

Senator HRUSKA. Oh, yes.

Mr. BRINKLEY. I trust it has not been done by——

Senator HRUSKA. I have consistently watched the TV, and it is not an unusual occurrence; it is quite frequent.

Mr. BRINKLEY. I think what happens is, if you have in a committee a prolonged series of questions, and then a prolonged answer, we simply don't have room for both at times. And so what then might happen would be to have me or Cronkite, or whoever it might be, say, Senator Hruska asked the witness this and this and this, paraphrasing the questions, and then giving the witness' answers, or on the contrary, using the question and paraphrasing the answers. It is sometimes necessary to do that simply for reasons of time, not often, but that does happen.

Senator Hruska. The incident that I refer to did not involve this Senator, but it did involve a high official in the administration and one of my colleagues. No reference was made at all to the high official in the administration, and no coverage was given, nor even an intimation that the charges and the questions were answered or commented upon. And it was quite unfair, because the occasion didn't call for that kind of treatment. There are other examples as well. I presume, however, the right to do that is one of those things that Senator Ervin frequently refers to that is included in the right of freedom of the press, and if they want to proceed in that way, I suppose they can.

There is no way that we can say, and certainly it would be hard to envision any process by which we would say that this must not be done, and there is going to be a law to enforce it; that is totally impractical, and all of us know it.

Thank you very much for your appearance here.

Mr. Brinkley. Thank you, sir.

Senator Ervin. In the final analysis, don't you believe that the cause of good government is preserved by the fact that the news media reports on the actions of government and public officials, and on occasion criticizes them?

Mr. Brinkley. Senator, I think a fact not often thought about which is terribly important on this score is that if we don't do it there is no one else.

Senator Ervin. And is it not also true that criticism by public officials and criticism by the people of the news media does have a tendency to be helpful to the news media?

Mr. Brinkley. Oh, yes. As I say, if you can't stand criticism you shouldn't go into journalism or politics.

Senator Ervin. That is the reason the Founding Fathers believed in the freedom of speech and the freedom of the press.

Mr. Brinkley. Yes.

Senator Ervin. Although it might be uncomfortable to individuals at times, it serves the highest public interest in the long run.

Mr. Brinkley. I couldn't agree more.

Senator Hruska. May I ask unanimous consent that an article from the Stanford Observer of October 31, 1971, written by Prof. Robert A. Horn, professor of political science, be incorporated in the record in a suitable place. It bears on some of the matters just discussed, inasmuch as it is entitled "How Free Should the Press Be."

Senator Ervin. That will be included in the record.

(The article referred to follows:)

[From the Stanford Observer, October 1971]

HOW FREE SHOULD THE FREE PRESS BE?

(By Prof. Robert A. Horn, Prof. of Political Science)

Although the publication of the Pentagon Papers and the United States Supreme Court's ultimate judgment in the cases brought by the government to restrain further publication have made more people more aware of some of the questions about a "free and responsible press," these decisions are but the latest of a number of cases since 1957 in which the Supreme Court has opened up new freedoms for the press. "The press" of today is the "media of mass communication" for it embraces not only the printing press but those gifts of electronic technology, the movies, radio, and television.

Beginning with the Roth case in 1957, the Court has freed the press from legal restraints previously assumed to exist in three major respects. The Roth case and its numerous progeny have made a new constitutional law of obscenity, the results of which all can see and hear.

The Court's unanimous decision in New York Times v. Sullivan in 1964 held that a public official can recover damages for libel only if a publication concerning his official conduct, no matter how false and defamatory, was made with knowledge of its falsity or with a "reckless disregard" for the truth. In practical effect this decision has stripped public officials of almost any legal recourse, and its progeny have similarly affected "public figures" like college football coaches and retired major generals, at least if they are sufficiently notorious. A democratic form of government, the Court reasoned, requires nothing less, although any hard evidence that this new constitutional law of libel has contributed to honest discussion of public affairs is difficult to come by.

Finally, in the recent New York Times and Washington Post cases a badly divided Court held—but what did it hold?

The three paragraph per curiam (unsigned) opinion is such a model of opacity that it is not surprising no member of the majority wished to be credited with its authorship. In a case of such notoriety and gravity this puny opinion justified the Chief Justice's denunciation of the "unseemly" and "frenetic haste" and "precipitous action" of his Court. No member of the Court was unaware of this weakness; not only each of the three dissenters but all six of the Justice in the majority proceeded to "do his own thing" in an individual opinion! About all one can confidently say is that the majority concluded the government should not have its injunction.

Otherwise it is easier to understand what the Court did not hold than what it did. Most importantly the Court did not hold these three things.

First, it did not hold that further publication would not endanger significant national interest and even the national security. Indeed, given the admissions of Justices Stewart and White, who were in the majority, it seems fair to say that a majority of the Court conceded that publication of some material instanced by the government could and even would endanger the interests and security of the nation.

Second, the Court did not hold that the First Amendment bars all "prior restraints" in cases involving national security. Its principal (though unexplained) citation of authority was Chief Justice Hughes's 1931 opinion in Near v. Minnesota. There that great Chief Justice, with the experience of distinguished prior service as Secretary of State behind him, had expressly recognized that particularly in cases involving national security "the prohibition even as to previous restraint is not absolutely unlimited."

Third, the Court did not hold that Congress is without constitutional power to provide by statute for the kind of action the Department of Justice had sought to bring. In fact, half of the majority of six, Justices Stewart, White, and Marshall, leaned heavily on their belief that Congress had by implication refused to authorize a proceeding such as the one before them.

The upshot of what must be ranked as one of the strangest cases in the annals of the Court is that at least until Congress acts or a future Court majority has second thoughts, anyone who can obtain much of the information (whether trivial or of the gravest import) classified by the government and stolen from it may do what he likes with it subject only to the rather cloudy possibility of a criminal prosecution after the damage is done. Can any prudent citizen regard this as a satisfactory state of the law?

How did we arrive at this state of the law? It is worth emphasizing that these recent decisions have made a new First Amendment, although as courts typically do when they make innovations, our Court has sometimes suggested it is merely finding the law which has always been inherent in the Amendment. Obviously, however, we cannot derive the holdings of these cases simply from the brief language: "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech or of the press. . . ."

Absolutists and literalists like Mr. Justice Black lovingly emphasize the word "no" in that phrase. But if we would be literally literal, we should also take note of the words "Congress" and "the freedom."

When the framers of the First Amendment wanted to say "the government of the United States" they knew how to do so, as the Tenth Amendment, part of the same Bill of Rights, shows. It is Congress, not the President, not the federal judiciary, to which the Amendment literally addresses itself. Moreover, Madison's original draft of the Amendment used language that would have limited the executive and the courts as well as the legislature. There is no reason to suppose that the change of language was mere accident. Members of the First Congress, which proposed the Amendment, had the need for executive authority in emergencies which they had observed in the Revolution as part of their own experience.

As for the judicial power over the press, their use of the definite article. "the freedom of speech and the press" is suggestive. Again, it would have been easy to say simply "freedom of speech and of the press," and leave definition of freedom to the creative imagination of future interpreters. But they did not do that; they said "the freedom."

The function of the definite article is to define, to limit, to specify. What definite, limited specific freedom could they have had in mind? The most obvious answer to lawyers, as most of them were, was freedom of speech and press at the common law, then so recently summed up by Blackstone.

Obscenity was not within that freedom, as our Court still agrees it is not, whenever a majority of the Justices can agree that anything is obscene. Nor was libel, as our Court still agrees it is mostly not, since Mr. Justice Black was never able to persuade a majority of his colleagues that the First Amendment ought to bar all libel actions. Most notably criminal prosecutions for "seditious libel" against government and officials were permissible at the common law.

Thus common law courts could without any statutory authorization deal with the press in all such cases. And until the Supreme Court finally ruled otherwise in 1813 many lawyers claimed that the federal courts possessed a common law criminal jurisdiction and some federal judges had exercised it as inherent in "the judicial power of the United States."

Thus the constitutional law of press freedom in the United States is not an ineluctable consequence either of the intent of those who adopted the First Amendment or of its language. Nor is it "ancient law." The first case of any consequence in the Supreme Court interpreting the freedom of speech and press" was the famous case of Schenck v. United States, in which Justice Holmes set forth the "clear and present danger" test. The Schenck case was decided in 1919.

The constitutional law of speech and press is thus almost entirely a development of the past fifty and predominantly the last twenty years.

Why this massive body of new constitutional law, not simply of press freedom but of civil liberties generally, has developed so explosively in the twentieth century is an intriguing topic for speculation. Surely it can be shown to be an illustration of the general link between social change and legal change found in all societies at all times.

This new law has come in an era marked by several major currents of social change in America. Among the most important in relation to this civil liberties law have been scientific and technological development, urbanization, secularization, growing national cultural uniformity, the changing positions of ethnic groups, affluence, and the rising level of formal education. To trace out in detail the relationships between these ongoing social changes and literally hundreds of Supreme Court civil liberties cases in the last half century is beyond our present scope. All that can be said here is that these decisions are the Court's response—and sometimes stimulus—to social change.

It has been the "felt necessities of the time", in Justice Holmes's famous phrase, and not past history of the blackletter constitutional document which account for them.

But we must not from this recognition step into the trap of some vague notion of sociological determinism. In many, indeed most, of these decisions not all members of the Court have felt the same necessities. Indeed they have frequently divided five to four in their appraisal. These legal questions have been controversial, and since the social conditions which made them so persist, they remain controversial—and the answers therefore subject to change.

But as the answers stand today, the overall import of these decisions is to lessen—not to say weaken—legal restraints, specifically and not least those on the press.

Recognition of this cutting down of legal restraints on the press should lead us to contemplate two paradoxes.

The first of these is that legal restraints on the press have only limited effectiveness and have never been our chief reliance. The more important paradox is that some very great restraints are indispensable to effective communication, through either the spoken or the printed word. The first of these paradoxes is more obvious though less important.

Legal restraints on the press historically have taken only two forms, and given the frequent and not entirely groundless anxiety of governments over the press, if the wit of lawyers could have devised any others, we should probably have discovered them by now. Legal controls are either "prior restraint" or "prior censorship" on the one hand, or on the other, "subsequent punishment," that is, criminal prosecution.

The difficulty is apparent. If obscene publications can endanger those exposed to them, or if defamatory publications damage reputations, or if publication of secrets of state threatens the security of a nation's people, subsequent punishment can only lock the barn door too late. Only prior censorship can certainly prevent the damage publication may do. Yet even by Blackstone's time Anglo-American freedom of the press meant that government ordinarily should have no power of prior censorship.

Of course governments which have used censorship even in earlier times could never entirely prevent evasions. But when John Milton in the Areopagitica (unsuccessfully) prayed Parliament to end prior censorship of the press, a literate Englishman could probably have read each day everything published in English on that day. Prior censorship then was at least physically easy. But imagine anyone now trying in a day to read, listen to and watch everything printed, broadcast, filmed, and televised in English on that day.

A thorough system of governmental censorship today would require us to choose between only two alternatives, or possibly a mixture of the two: either to choke the torrent of mass communication to the trickle a few censors could monitor in advance, or to create another swollen bureaucracy.

Science and technology have given the press a protection from governmental censorship Milton could not accomplish or even envision.

Today Communist and other authoritarian regimes must rely largely on the deterrent effects of severe subsequent punishment rather than prior censorship to control their presses. Where the protections of criminal defendants traditional in our law are unavailable, such deterrence can be quite powerful.

To embrace such a system would force us to surrender most of what we regard as essential to a free society. Since we have never been willing to do so, legal restraints on our press even earlier but especially now can have only limited although significant effect.

The notion of an "absolute" freedom of speech and press is a delusion however, even if there were no legal restraints whatever.

Paradoxically, the very possibility of effective communication depends upon some observance of restraints. Effectiveness of spoken communication requires at least that not everyone talk at once, as the shouting down of Ambassador Lodge at Stanford well demonstrates. Radio and television broadcasts would be hopelessly jumbled if each station did not confine itself to its channel and proper power output.

But, you may say, the printed word is different. Not so. Suppose there were no "rules" of grammar, syntax, punctuation, and spelling that we could follow, even that there were no agreed ways of making the letters of the alphabet. We would then have an absolutely free and absolutely unreadable press. The price of such freedom would in effect be universal illiteracy. Finnegan's Wake and the writings of Vladimir Nabokov offer us a tantalizing vision of what such a world of printing would be like. So, occasionally, does a student's examination paper.

In communication as in other aspects of social life, of which communication is not simply a large but the one indispensable part, the terms freedom and restraint are each in isolation or "absoluteness" meaningless.

Freedom and restraint are polar terms. We really can conceive no explicable meaning whatever for either term without reference to the other. You may say that is self-evident, but it needs repeating in an age and a culture in which to many it is no longer self-evident.

Objection may be made—anyone who knows today's students knows it will be made—that the need for restraints in communication concerns only procedures, the ways in which we communicate, and that no restraint on the substance of what is said or written is needed or tolerable. Such an argument is equivalent to asserting that the written or spoken word can produce no evil consequences, or as Justice Holmes put it, no "substantive evils that" society "has a right to prevent."

That argument cannot bear analysis. In starkest terms if two or more people carry out an assassination, arson, or a bombing they will have perfected their plans through the written or spoken word. All the other examples that come to mind are simply more complex illustrations of the same fact. There can, in short, be no organized crime without the word. To revise Max Lerner's phrase, communicated "ideas have consequences."

Unless one stubbornly and sullenly rejects this truth, one must concede that society needs some restraints on what is published. Restraints can take a number of forms, but basically they are either self-imposed, internalized as the psychologists say, or they are imposed upon the individual by some agency of the society. The law is one but not the only form of imposed social restraint.

On what forms of restraint should we or can we rely for appropriate control of what the press publishes? This is the question in its gravest form which the decision in the Pentagon Papers case has thrust to the foreground. For the substantive evil such publication can bring about is to the life and fortune and security of every person in the country.

Surely we must put aside reliance solely on the self-discipline of the individual reporter, editor, publisher or newscaster. We must do so not because self-restraint is unimportant; it is, one suspects, a sine qua non of real effectiveness of any imposed social restraints. We cannot trust simply to the individual's sense of restraint because the contemporary press is rarely an individual enterprise, if it could be so described even in the time of John Wilkes. Benjamin Franklin or Thomas Paine. The publication of news and opinion today in print or electronically is an organized social task engaging the coordinated effort of many hands and brains.

Moreover in our culture and economy it is not only a social task, it is a competitive enterprise. Unfortunately we have too familiar a record of sensationalism in the press not to see a kind of Gresham's law at work by which the irresponsible journalist can profit from the self-restraint of his competitors. It is scarcely exaggeration to say great publishing empires have been built upon that law.

When competitors rush to peddle secrets of state in the "free market of ideas" to gossip-hungry consumers, only such a spoof as William Buckley's fictitious set of Pentagon Papers in the National Review can adequately satirize the situation.

When we turn from self-restraint to forms of imposed social restraint, the kind closest to self-discipline is that flowing from adherence to the tenets of a religious organization. The relevant religious injunction which comes first to mind is: "Tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Askelon." Interestingly enough, the secret King David warned against revealing was news of a military defeat which he feared would damage national morale. Perhaps their religion's tenets would be a sufficient guide for those responsible for religious publications, but overwhelmingly our contemporary press has a secular orientation. We must look elsewhere.

Aside from legal restraints by far the most significant possibility of adequate control of the press lies in a set of rules and standards formulated and adopted by the great social and economic organizations which are the press and imposed by them upon all persons who in turn make up the organizations. This may be thought of as self-discipline but it is quite different from the restraint an autonomous individual chooses to observe for himself. This is the kind of self-government which Alfred North Whitehead considered the hallmark of a profession.

Physicians have their Hippocratic Oath and organized ways of elaborating its meaning and enforcing it. Similarly lawyers have their Canons of Ethics. The ultimate sanction in either profession for violation of its standards is revocation of the license to practice the profession. Organized society through government has devolved upon these two of our oldest professions definite legal status and legal powers and responsibilities. Of course the press has no such comparable position, nor should it. To require a license to practice journalism would be a virulent form of prior consorship.

Closer to the situation of the press is the scientific or scholarly community. James Bryant Conant has described the professionalization of the scientists.

Though there is not such formal legal devolution of authority and responsibility for self-government upon scientists (or academicians generally), there is professionally imposed restraint on scientific publication. The scientist who is even negligently inaccurate in publishing his research operations and findings, let alone one who would purposely report them falsely, will almost certainly suffer severe sanctions: loss of recognition, prestige, and future opportunities, even his job and income, by the judgment of his peers.

It must be acknowledged that the press has not yet imposed upon its members even these standards. Anyone even moderately familiar with the journalistic world knows that there has for many years been a continuing consideration and discussion of the problem of establishing a code of professional ethics and means of enforcing it by many conscientious members of the press. Since these men are writers, the reports of conferences, books, and articles on the subject issue in a constant stream. The fact remains that their goal has not been reached and is perhaps not even attainable.

To say so is not to suggest that the gentlemen of the press are less honorable in their intentions, less competent, or more self-seeking or intransigent than lawyers, physicians or scientists. The trouble is that their task of setting professional standards is harder.

It is not enough, like the scientists, simply to have sanctions for not telling the truth. The very qualities of industry and ability to dig out information and of truthfulness in reporting it which rightfully evoke professional and public admiration may be the cause of substantive evils, even threats to the security of an entire nation.

There is no easy way out of this dilemma. If there were, the efforts to establish a professional code of ethics for the press would probably not have languished so long.

Difficulties in professionalizing the press also stem from the roots from which it has grown. Our newspaper press comes out of a tradition of fierce political partisanship. It has not entirely outgrown this condition, but cynics might say that it has arrived at a rough politcal balance in which generally conservative publishers are checkmated by a predominantly left-of-center liberal working journalistic corps. More likely it has been the secular decline of the strong partisanship engendered by the Civil War and Reconstruction among the newspaper-reading electorate which has led the newspaper press to conclude that greater political neutrality is more profitable for it.

In contrast, radio and now television journalists must function in a fundamentally apolitical medium. For radio and television are, like the movies, basically a medium for entertainment rather than information.

No one can watch a day's commercial television without recognizing that the medium is "show-biz," however different an image the top network executives try to convey in their public pronouncements. Surely there is nothing shameful about trying to entertain people, but both the critics of television and its corporate spokesmen seem to be in implicit agreement that there is.

But the show-biz orientation of the television industry cannot make the task of its enclave of newsmen easy. They cannot, they obviously do not entirely escape the drive of their medium to dramatize. With all respect to the Vice President, the tragic flaw of electronic journalism lies more in its penchant for drama than for propaganda. If news photographers became the newspaper editors, newspapers would be under the same though not so severe a temptation.

"The public's right to know" has become a popular slogan for many journalists in recent years. In a democracy it is hard to quarrel with this slogan as a general proposition. But "general propositions do not decide concrete cases." Any satisfactory journalistic canon of ethics will have to come to grips with this slogan.

Why, for example, does the public have a right to know all the details, factual, alleged, and rumored, about some lurid crime before a defendant charged with it is brought to trial? Significantly, the Supreme Court's recent decisions on the problem of "pre-trial publicity," especially in the notorious case of Dr. Sam Sheppard in 1966, have limited rather than extended press freedom, quite contrary to the general direction of other press cases.

When the public's right to know collides with a defendant's right to a fair trial by unprejudiced jurors, the public must give way. So also it must, as the Billy Sol Estes case in 1965 held, when televising a trial will disrupt, as it surely will, orderly procedure in court.

Trials are not held as entertainments, no matter how dramatic they may be. Immediately familiar with the problems, the Court has not hesitated to protect the integrity of the judicial process.

But is the integrity of the Executive branch and the possibility of orderly procedure in the administrative process less important? True, what publication may damage the fate of a nation is a more imponderable question than what may prejudice a criminal defendant. But is it less important?

Probably those who use the slogan really mean "the American public's right to know." But Twentieth Century technological development of the press makes the American public's right to know equivalent to the world's right to know, just as fully and just as speedily.

Failure to recognize the great change which this technological revolution has wrought in the conditions under which the nation's diplomacy and defense must be conducted can lead one to some rather quixotic conclusion.

Suppose that the New York Times and the Washington Post, a week before President Nixon's August 14 announcement of the new economic program, had been able to obtain a stolen classified document which detailed these policies.

Would the public's right to know have justified immediate publication of the document? No threat to national security in any military sense would seem to be involved. Yet the disclosure would have subverted orderly establishment of the program, especially the international monetary measures.

Our suspects that the Post and the Times would not have published. But can one be as confident all other publishers, including the "underground press," would have abstained if they had the document?

More importantly, should the decision to publish with impunity or abstain rest in the absolute discretion of anyone who manages to come into possession of such classified material?

The press in its efforts to build a code of professional standards has not been able to announce any consensus in principle on the question, although its record in actual practice has been on the whole quite responsible. But "on the whole" may not always be good enough, and the possibility of publishers dedicated to using press freedom to "destroy the system" may not be quite as remote as one hopes.

So we return to the question of needed legal restraints raised by the Pentagon Papers decision. To postulate them here would be presumptuous. The most careful study of all facets of the problem and only then the most painstaking draftsmanship of new law and thorough debate over its adoption are the minimal requirements for a wise public policy in this field. Moreover, any such effort should include some restraints on undeniable bureaucratic excesses in classifying and failing to declassify information.

But does prudence demand anything less than a serious effort to deal with the problem "with all deliberate speed?"

Senator ERVIN. The subcommittee will be in recess until 2:30 this afternoon.

(Whereupon, at 11:30 a.m., the subcommittee was recessed until 3:55 p.m. of the same day.)

AFTERNOON SESSION

Senator ERVIN. I want to apologize to everybody concerned. Although we scheduled these hearings a long time ago, the Senate sets its agenda about 1 day in advance and like time and tide, it waits on no man. I had to remain on the floor for the vote on a measure I had proposed.

The subcommittee will come to order.

Will counsel call the next witness.

Mr. BASKIR. Mr. Chairman, our first witness is Mr. C. A. McKnight, editor, the Charlotte Observer, and president of the American Society of Newspaper Editors.

Senator ERVIN. Mr. McKnight is well known to me. When he was just starting out as a newspaper reporter he used to, among other tasks, cover the superior court in Mecklenburg County.

We are delighted to have you here. We appreciate your willingness to appear and I regret the delay you have had. There are few people who have had more experience over the years than you have had in the newspaper field, and you are still comparatively young.

STATEMENT OF C. A. McKNIGHT, EDITOR, THE CHARLOTTE OBSERVER; AND PRESIDENT, AMERICAN SOCIETY OF NEWSPAPER EDITORS; ACCOMPANIED BY RICHARD M. SCHMIDT, JR., COUNSEL

Mr. McKnight. Thank you, Senator Ervin.

Mr. Chairman, I appear here today with the general counsel of the American Society of Newspaper Editors, Mr. Richard Schmidt.

Senator Ervin. We are delighted to have Mr. Schmidt present.

Mr. Schmidt. Thank you.

Mr. McKnight.There is a reason for that. Although I learned a good deal of law when I was covering the superior court when you were a judge in North Carolina, I think you will realize as I go through this document today that Mr. Schmidt had a hand in at least the original draft. He is a pretty good lawyer, and I have him here just in case you start asking any questions that get beyond my legal depth.

I would like to add one other thing, that not until Friday of last week did I have the opportunity to read the full text of your statement opening these hearings, in the Congressional Record of October 5.

I would like to say that if you ever decide to retire from the Senate and return to North Carolina, I would invite you to become a regular contributor to my editorial page, because I think you make a good deal more sense than some of my editorial writers.

Mr. Chairman, the American Society of Newspaper Editors was founded 50 years ago. The first two paragraphs of our constitution set forth its purposes in these words:

> Although the art of journalism has flourished in America for more than 200 years, the editors of the greater American newspapers have not hitherto banded themselves together in association for the consideration of their common problems and the promotion of their professional ideas. Theirs is a great and honorable profession, yet in the past there have been no facilities for those interchanges of thought and experience that are so helpful in promoting the general interest of any profession or craft, no means of defending their profession from unjust assault, no avenue by which professional co-operation can be reached.
> It is with the purpose of remedying to some degree these conditions that this society is established. Its purpose shall be to promote acquaintance among its members, to develop a stronger professional esprit de corps, to maintain the dignity and rights of the profession, to consider and perhaps establish ethical standards of professional conduct, to interchange ideas for the advancement of professional ideals and for the more effective application of professional labors and to work collectively for the solution of common problems.

Today the society has 749 members representing 495 daily newspapers. Ours is an amorphous association of highly independent and individualistic editors, with opinions of their own, usually strong ones. on any given issue. And though I appear here today with the knowledge and approval of the board of director, I do not profess to speak for the entire membership. The statement that follows is my own.

Mr. Chairman, I welcome the opportunity to testify before this subcommittee which is examining the application of First Amendment principles to the press and analyzing the relationship between the press and Government. You state in your invitation to testify: We will be seeking to create a better appreciation of the First Amendment's purpose and its crucial importance to a free society.

That the first amendment protection of free speech and a free press is the very foundation of free government by free men is not a cliche, though it has been said so often that it may sound like one. Our Supreme Court has said: A free press stands as one of the great interpreters between the Government and the people. To allow it to be fettered is to fetter ourselves.[1]

The Court has also said: It is the purpose of the first amendment to preserve an uninhibited marketplace of ideas in which truth will ultimately prevail. * * *[2]

The primacy of press freedom was set forth in the 1945 U.S. Supreme Court decision of Associated Press v. U.S. (326 U.S. 1, 20):

> (The First) Amendment rests on the assumption that the widest possible discrimination of information from diverse and antagonistic sources is essential to the welfare of the public, that a free press is a condition of a free society.

"The First Amendment," said Judge Learned Hand, "presupposes that right conclusions are more likely to be gathered out of a multitude of tongues than through any kind of authoritative selection. To many this is, and always will be, folly; but we have staked upon it our all." (United States v. Associated Press, (52 F. Supp. 362, 372 D. C. S. D. N. Y. 1943).)

Today this becomes more important than ever, for in our increasingly complex and interrelated society, in which the average American citizen cannot possibly, on his own, find out about the events which will directly affect his life, the role of the free press is even more essential to the maintenance of American democracy than in the past. Unless the First Amendment guarantee of press freedom is protected to the fullest extent, the role which it has played will inevitably be diminished. Let me emphasize that if this happens, the public, and not merely the press, will be the loser.

I am deeply concerned about certain recent trends.

First, the desire of the executive branch of our Government to impose prior restraint of publication. This came about earlier this year when the Department of Justice sought and obtained temporary restraining orders against the New York Times and the Washington Post.

I said publicly at the time:

> I am appalled at this exercise of "prior restraint" censorship by the government. At the same time, I agree with the decision of the New York Times to obey the temporary federal court restraining order.
> I have great faith in our federal courts and I am confident that this unprecedented effort at governmental censorship will ultimately clarify still further the responsibility of a free press in a free society.

[1] Grosjean v. American Press Co. (297 U.S. 233, 250 (1936)).

[2] Red Lion v. Federal Communications Commission (395 U.S. 367, 390 (1969)).

I may have been overly optimistic. While the Supreme Court's per curiam opinion referred to the heavy burden of showing justification for prior restraint of free speech and a free press, nonetheless some of the opinions by the individual Justices gave us small comfort.

Other than the absolute statement by the late Justice Hugo Black, the several concurring and dissenting opinions left open the possibility of future action by the Government to impose prior restraint. This deeply concerns me.

To complete the record, after having cleared the text with each member of the ASNE board of directors, I submitted an affidavit in the New York Times case which said in part:

> I submit this affidavit on behalf of the Board of Directors of the American Society of Newspaper Editors in opposition to the action by the Government of the United States to prohibit the New York Times from continuing to publish articles with respect to the Vietnam War, such as those contained in the issues of June 13, 14, and 15, 1971, which are the subject of this litigation.
> In my view and the view of the Board of ASNE, the freedom to publish without prior restraint is a cornerstone of the American people's right to know and any order to the contrary destroys a basic constitutional right of the people under a democratic government.

Later, on June 25, 1971, the vice president of our society, J. Edward Murray, associate editor of the Detroit Free Press, appeared before the Subcommittee on Foreign Operations and Government Information of the U.S. House of Representatives. I have a copy of his statement in the event this committee would like to have it in its files.

You have had before you Senator Pearson testifying on S. 1311, the so-called Newsmen's Privilege bill. I think this is a misnomer. I do not claim a privilege for newsmen, nor do I feel that the protection guaranteed by the First Amendment can properly be called a privilege. The right under the First Amendment is not just to protect newspapers. It is the right of any citizen, be he editor or pamphleteer, to print and distribute information and ideas, and it is the right of all citizens to receive information and ideas—or to reject them if they wish.

The membership of ASNE at its annual convention held in April of 1971, and by subsequent action of its board of directors, endorsed the principle of a Federal shield law.

We are well aware that there are three cases currently pending before the U.S. Supreme Court concerning this matter, and ASNE has filed a brief as amicus curiae in the case of the United States of America v. Earl Caldwell. I will not comment directly on the facts in that case, but our position is that there is a constitutional right of protection for a newsman's sources. In the event that the Supreme Court should not concur with this view, we will have a deep and urgent interest in the passage of Federal legislation to supplement existing State statutes.

That the wholesale issuance of subpenas and the protracted legal proceedings which often follow have had a chilling effect (even in those instances where the subpenas were later withdrawn or quashed) has been amply demonstrated to ASNE by the experience of its various members.

For example, over the past 3 years, more than 30 subpenas have been served on newspapers published by Field Enterprises, Inc. of Chicago, two-thirds of which were issued on behalf of the Government. One Chicago Sun-Times reporter (Duane Hall) was subpenaed to testify in 11 separate proceedings in the space of 18 months. Incidentally, if the committee would like a copy of our brief and the accompanying affidavits from ASNE members all over the country, our counsel, Mr. Schmidt, will provide it.

Senator ERVIN. Is that the brief in the Caldwell case?

Mr. MCKNIGHT. Right.

Senator ERVIN. I am sure the committee would like to have a copy of the brief and also of the statement of J. Edward Murray, mentioned on page 3 of your statement. (Material referred to will appear in appendix.)

Mr. MCKNIGHT. The experience of our members indicate that the rights of journalists and the concomitant right of the public to a free press can be bartered piecemeal in frenzied negotiations between prosecutors, newspapers, and newspapermen in an atmosphere of broadly drawn subpenas, contempt citation threats, and hastily convened legal proceedings seeking protective orders.

The tyranny of time, the press of other matters, and the depth of the commitment to a free press of the particular participants involved, have all combined to create a chaotically inconsistent nationwide pattern of response.

In some cases, the government attorneys have voluntarily withdrawn such subpenas if resistance is encountered from either the newspaper or the journalist. In other cases, newspapermen have arrived at an accommodation with the government, voluntarily yielding certain information in return for the government's dropping other demands. On still other occasions, journalists who did not have the resources or the time to combat subpenas, have acceded to such demands, often much against their will, and to the detriment to their future ability to gather and report news.

All of these events have taken place in a legal framework which lacks specific direction, either from an authoritative opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States or from proper legislation at the Federal level indicating the limits of the government's power.

Again let me emphasize that the ultimate loser in such contests is the public, whose right to a free flow of information is involved.

Unless newsmen are free to obtain background information it is difficult, if not impossible, for them to report events accurately.

Unless the reporter can get such information, and unless he is free to meet and talk confidentially with members of dissident groups who espouse unpopular ideas, the public may never have the opportunity of hearing these ideas set forth fairly and objectively, and this will be unable to evaluate their merit or lack of merit.

We are gratified that the Attorney General has adopted guidelines which impose some checks on federal district attorneys. However, the difficulty with the guidelines is that they have no binding validity on State courts or, indeed, upon any investigative body, Federal or State, other than those supervised by the Department of Justice.

Moreover, the Attorney General's guidelines contain an escape clause reserving to the Attorney General the right to violate the guidelines in a specific instance, if emergencies and other unusual situations develop. This caveat reintroduces the very uncertainty and ambiguity which has plagued newspapermen during the recent past.

I am well aware that our stand may bring into conflict two basic rights, the first being that of the people's right to know and the second being the oft quoted admonition that the law is entitled to every man's evidence. In general, of course, both propositions are correct, but as with most generalities, they cannot be taken literally.

The U.S. Supreme Court, in the case of Blair v. United States, 250 U.S. 273, 281, in 1919 stated:

> It is clearly recognized that the giving of testimony and the attendance upon court or grand jury in order to testify are public duties which every person within the jurisdiction of the government is bound to perform upon being properly summoned. The duty * * * is subject to mitigation in exceptional circumstances; there is a constitutional exception from being compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against one's self * * *; some confidential matters are shielded from considerations of policy, and perhaps in other cases for special reasons a witness may be excused from telling all that he knows.

This case is often cited as having cemented into law the proposition that the law is entitled to every man's evidence, and that reporters have no special dispensation to avoid the requirement of testifying in judicial proceedings. However, this same case made it clear that there were significant exceptions to this rule which have been crafted out of recognition that the transcendental requirements of justice make it necessary to protect certain relationships from compulsory process.

You are familiar with some of the recognized exceptions, those of the so-called evidentary privileges, such as the client-attorney, or the patient-physician relationships. Also the courts have recognized the necessity of an informer privilege, whereby the government need not ordinarily reveal the source of an informant's testimony, even in a criminal prosecution.[1]

The law has recognized that the administration of justice, and the protection of the rights of individuals, are better served by protecting confidentiality in these cases, rather than granting the short term and fleeting advantage which the disclosure of such confidences may have.

But the so-called evidentary privileges do not by any means exhaust the area of exception to compulsory process. The courts have long excluded otherwise relevant and material evidence obtained through illegal search and seizure. And, of course, the most extensive exclusionary rule ever to be devised is the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which deprives not only courts, but every governmental agency of testimony from the most potentially fruitful source of information. The drafters of the Constitution deemed the right to remain silent more important than the ability of the government to administer justice through self-incrimination.

I believe that protection of journalists from compulsory disclosure of information is of enduring importance to the preservation of our democratic system. And I do not believe that any of the privileges or the exclusionary rules to which I have referred stand on a broader base of legality or logic than the fulfillment of the journalist's constitutional role.

[1] See Rovairo v. United States, 353 U.S. 53 (1957).

That First Amendment freedoms are delicate and precious rights which need breathing space to survive, strong medicine for protection, is now well established in constitutional law. The court in New York v. Sullivan said, "The general proposition that freedom of expression upon public questions is secured by the first amendment has long been settled by our decisions.

Another recognition of the need to protect the source of journalists' information is the fact that a number of States—I believe the number now stands at 19—have enacted statutory bars to compulsory process against newsmen. Some of these State shield laws are absolute and some conditional. The New York Law Revision Commission's 1949 report made it clear that the existence of this so-called privilege has not impeded law enforcement and may have aided it. The fact that the number of States enacting shield laws has steadily increased over the years indicates a growing recognition that protection of journalistic confidences has a long-range beneficial effect on the administration of justice which far transcends any fleeting short-term gain which may appear possible in a particular prosecution.

We may well ask why the increase in the numbers of subpenas of newsmen. To me it is no accident or coincidence. This recent spate of investigatory subpenas came during a period of social turmoil when many groups in our society felt the need to protest and to challenge what, in other times, have been almost universally accepted ideas and values. It is precisely at such times of crisis that governments feel their security most threatened, and are most likely to over-react through open-end investigations, broad range subpenas, electronic and other types of surveillance. It is also at such times that deviate or aggressive political action is apt to be characterized by prosecutors as a threat to national security. Dilution of the public's right to know through erosion of newspapermen's protection limits the public's ability to comprehend affairs, precisely at the time when such ability is most needed.

It is precisely in these times when the public must have the fullest access to the views of dissident groups so that their claims and their tactics can be understood and evaluated. It does no service to the cause of democracy to silence these groups or drive them underground.

As I have stated, it is the ASNE position and my sincere hope that the highest court of this land will ultimately recognize a constitutional right of protection of newsmen's sources, but in the event that the Supreme Court should not concur with this viewpoint, I reiterate that ASNE, at its annual convention held in April of 1971 and by subsequent action of the board of directors, overwhelmingly endorsed the principle of a Federal shield law.

Like other witnesses who have appeared before you, we have some serious questions relating to S. 1311, and its related bills introduced in the House by Congressman Whalen, Koch, and others. Briefly, we feel that sections 2 and 3 should include photographers. Along with the photographer and his photographic output, we feel that the materials of the reportorial trade—notes, tapes, correspondence, and other similar matters—should be included. Also we feel all notes and materials should be exempt—not just those obtained on a confidential basis.

We recognize that when it comes to drafting legislation of this kind, it may possibly create new problems. For example, one member of our society has raised a question about the implication of the phrase contained in the last section of the bill—to prevent a threat to human life.

He writes:

> This phrase is extremely vague and capable of a wide range of interpretations. Murder or kidnap plots and even disclosures involving the manufacture of unsafe vehicles or other products, air pollution, water pollution, political demonstrations posing threats of violence, abortion, and a host of other imaginable threats to human life, could, again, make the privilege illusory.

I welcome these hearings. They will serve to re-educate the people of the United States about the basic reasons for the sacred rights protected by the first and other amendments of the Bill of Rights. Several public opinion polls in the last few years show that many of our people are willing to accept prior restraint on publication and complete censorship and control of the news media.

And I must regretfully say that this attitude is made respectable by those in high governmental positions who utilize the very media they criticize to engender suspicion and hostility toward the mass media.

I thank you, Senator Ervin, for the opportunity to meet with you today.

Senator Ervin. Can it not be said that in our Nation today we live in an era that may be characterized as an era of doubt and fear? In other words, many of us feel our country is threatened from abroad by potential enemies, and we know that violent crime stalks our land and threatens our daily lives, therefore we all tend to fear for our national security as well as for our personal security.

And it seems to me that it is in such times as these that we are in the greatest danger of losing the fundamental freedoms. As you suggest in the closing portion of your statement, people are more inclined to accept a curtailment of some of our basic freedoms, or the Bill of Rights, in order to enforce the criminal law.

The danger in people expressing ideas that are inconsistent with the established order of things, inclines others to accept limitations on their freedoms at such times. Therefore, aren't public officials tempted to try to curtail those freedoms for what they consider to be very broad purposes, namely, the security of the country, and the security of the individual?

Mr. McKnight. In October of 1969 I read a very perceptive article in Fortune magazine by Max Ways. I don't think I will ever forget it. I can't quote him word for word, but he said, you know in 1492 there was no great stir in Europe, no fast horses raced from city to city spreading the news that Columbus had sailed west for 70 days and found a land occupied by naked people. And he said it was years really before the rest of the people in Europe vaguely became aware of the fact that Columbus had discovered a new country. And he said, you contrast this with—he was writing in 1969 when one fifth of mankind simultaneously shared the experience of watching the astronauts walking on the moon, and heard commentators writing and explaining in very lucid terms about the meaning and significance of this.

And just a few months ago a sociologist, speaking to the Inland Press Association, made this same kind of comment. He wasn't quoting Max Ways, but in a sense he was saying the same thing. Even the language is getting more difficult today.

It was easy for people in 1492 to understand 70 days, and sailing, and land and naked. But when you get into some of the complex terms used in trying to report the news today, even the editors have trouble keeping up with the language, much less the readers. The sociologist went on to say, that he had just made a jet flight from Chicago to Los Angeles, and he was waiting on his baggage. And he said to the attendant, "the Rams really creamed them yesterday."

And the attendant said, "Yes, sir. Did you see that interior line play?"

And just on Wednesday night, last week, not just one fifth, but probably one half of mankind, saw two rookies, Rison and Mays, for Pittsburgh whose names did not take as long as Agnew's to become household words around the world.

The instantaneous sharing of experiences by people thousands of miles apart is to me the most significant thing about a period involving a totality and a velocity of change beyond anything in the recorded history of mankind.

And it is this, Senator Ervin, rather than the manifestations of it, I think it is the speed and the totality of change that has so unnerved and unsettled our people today that they are beginning to challenge every value, every institution. This is an age of accountability. The press is being held accountable. The Congress is being held accountable. The executive branch, our churches, our universities, our systems of communications and transportation. And this is the reason, as you say, that this thing comes to the surface more at a time like this.

And this is why I think we have to fight harder, because the pace of change is not going to slow down. It is going to accelerate. And I think we are going to have to fight even harder in the next 10 years to preserve the basic freedoms we are talking about here today.

Senator ERVIN. It is in a time like this that the people need these freedoms, the most, and need to exercise them fully, as free from restraint as the general welfare will permit.

You point out very well in your statement that the freedom of speech and the freedom of the press are not given for the benefit of the media, they are really given for the benefit of the people, so that the people may be informed. In other words, those great freedoms were put in the Constitution in order that the people might know the truth, is that not so?

Mr. MCKNIGHT. And also that the individual citizen who wants to print up one pamphlet and go out and hold it up on the street corner and express his ideas may do so. He may hand print it with the crayons belonging to his child. And this is just one step away from the printing press. But in my opinion this right belongs to him just as much as to a newspaper editor. We just haven't had the machinery and the distribution system.

Senator Ervin. The First Amendment doesn't attempt to limit the right to any particular group of people. As I said this morning in a colloquy with a witness, the First Amendment extends this right to all men regardless of whether they are wise or foolish, regardless of whether they are learned or ignorant, regardless of whether they are profound or shallow, and regardless of whether they are right or wrong, and even regardless of whether they love our country or its institutions or hate them.

Mr. McKnight. I couldn't agree with you more.

Senator Ervin. It seems to me that the founding fathers wrote the First Amendment, and especially the right of freedom of the press and freedom of speech for two reasons. In the first place, I have always loved the expression of Thomas Jefferson when he said, "I have sworn upon the alter of God eternal hostility to all forms of tyranny over the mind of man." So it seems to me that they put this first amendment in the Constitution to make it as certain as humanly possible that people will be able to escape tyranny over their minds and to be enlightened. In the second place, I think they recognized that our institutions of Government, which the Constitution created, cannot possibly work in the absence of free speech and freedom of the press.

Mr. McKnight. We wouldn't have a free Nation.

Instruments of Government would work.

I spent 19 days in the Soviet Union in 1969. And we talked with a lot of Russian newspaper editors. And I will never forget the time in Leningrad when one of the high officials of the Communist Party was explaining to us how they select newspaper editors to run—I have forgotten, I think something like 8,000 newspapers published all over the Soviet Union, many of them with a common wire that prints all the news from Moscow.

And I dared to ask the question—maybe I had a drink of vodka at the time—I said, "what do your guys do if one of your editors gets out of line and doesn't reflect the communist party line?"

He gave me a very bland smile and he said, "we don't select editors who get out of line"—which was his complete answer, the differences in the two systems.

Senator Ervin. Human freedom is gained by people who do get out of line, I think we can agree on that. Freedom of the press and freedom of speech distinguish a totalitarian government from a free society, and they are certainly the freedom which distinguish us from other societies the most.

Now, I am interested in your very fine statement with respect to the fact that despite the desirability of obtaining truth under all circumstances, that there are limitations upon the government, and upon the courts in particular, in their search for truth. You cite one limitation with which I think we are familiar—the Fifth Amendment. We have heard the Fifth Amendment pleaded before Congressional investigating committees very frequently.

However you say that the Fifth Amendment's protection prevents access to the most potentially informed source of truth, the individual's knowledge about his own conduct. Now, there was a time, of course, back in the days of the Star Chamber that they used a man's own self— incriminating statements to convict him. But our people were so opposed to that procedure that they put a protection against it in the Fifth Amendment, and absolutely prohibited every agency of Government from requiring a man to divulge incriminating information.

You also point out the confidential relationships that exist between attorney and client, and physician and patient, and I would add husband and wife in many circumstances, which are founded on confidence. I would assume that the standard would be the promotion of public knowledge rather than protecting the confidence of the informant.

Mr. McKnight. I am not sure my counsel will agree on this completely, but let me just say two things about that. First of all, I think I would say that in the normal pursuit of the average reporter's duties, when he is going out to write a feature story about some Girl Scout troop which has done something brave, or maybe a success story of a small businessman, or maybe a wreck on the corner, or a fire, or this, that and the other, I think on this question of divulging information which he might have gotten in the process, presumably in these cases he would print everything that he thought was pertinent, and there would be no unpublished notes or this, that, and the other.

But when the newspaperman who is conducting a serious investigation, whether it is investigating a Member of Congress or a city council or purchasing agent of the city hall who may be taking bribes on the side, he of necessity has to at some stage of this information, get some confidential information from people whose jobs will not only be impaired but might be abolished if the source of this information were ever divulged, or if he is looking into gangsterism and crooks in the community.

And he has got to depend on informers just like the government, because the culprits are not going to open up and tell him; he has got to get his information otherwise. And I think this investigative process of the free press, and trying to account to the public for government, for crime, and whatever may be wrong with our society—it may be the Black Panther group—is an extremely important part of our function. And without it I think the first amendment would be relatively meaningless if we are just going to feed them pap all the time.

And it is in these situations where the power of the government subpena frightens me, that a reporter can be compelled to go behind the closed door of a grand jury and divulge to the jurors the information he got from them. Because the minute he does, the minute that this gets out, this guy is washed out as a useful reporter in this field. And I think this is a tremendously important function of journalism in our country today, and has been for a long time.

Senator Ervin. Of course you do not argue or contend, and the Association of Newspaper Editors does not contend, that if a newspaperman was an eyewitness to a crime or had personal knowledge of a crime, that he should be granted any greater exemption than any other witness receives.

Mr. McKnight. I think other than the restrictions of prejudicial publicity, he not only would tell a grand jury about it, but I think he would put it in the paper if he is a good reporter.

Senator Ervin. Yes. What you object to is the situation in which a newspaper reporter, in the interests of getting the truth, has to go to other sources of information rather than himself. You feel that if he is called upon to act as an arm of the government that his confidential sources of information in many cases will dry up. The necessity to inform the public about many aspects of our society require that he be allowed to protect his sources of information and not be forced to divulge them.

Mr. McKnight. I think he has to if he and his newspaper and the profession in general are going to continue its important role to trying to ferret out wrongdoing, whether it is in public office, crime, or with the effect, I presume this is one of our functions. It is not the only one by any means.

Senator Ervin. Judge Williamson, a former chief justice of the Supreme Court of Maine, and a very knowledgeable man in the field of law, testified last week and advocated something somewhat similar. He didn't express it exactly like the bill the subcommittee is considering. He also pointed out that there were four or five different ways to approach this problem. I am glad to note that you are not as fully convinced that it ought to be done by legislation, but—if I interpret your statement correctly——

Mr. McKnight. Once again, this is not in my script. And I am speaking personally and not with the advice of counsel. But in my own opinion the passage of such statutes to protect what I believe to be a constitutional right implies that at some later date the statute could be repealed. Now, I contend this is a constitutional right. And I hope, and I believe, that the Supreme Court will so declare, but only in the event it doesn't would I then become interested in some kind of Federal statute which would go beyond the existing State statutes and give a sort of blanket protection involving Federal agencies over which State statute may not have jurisdiction.

Senator Ervin. I have an open but somewhat confused mind on the question of the phraseology of this particular statute, because, since the First Amendment is rather broad in scope, I am inclined to——

Mr. McKnight. I like that umbrella better, as soon as the Supreme Court opens it up.

Senator Ervin. In other words, I have more confidence in the linguistic ability of the Founding Fathers than I do in my own and that of my associates in Congress.

Mr. McKnight. I agree.

Senator Ervin. But I take your position that there is a constitutional right in this field which is based upon the desirability of the people knowing the truth, and you would prefer it to be worked out by the Supreme Court on a constitutional basis rather than by legislation.

Mr. McKnight. Yes, sir.

Senator Ervin. I am sure you are familiar with the decision in the Caldwell case, which to my mind is one of the truly great judicial opinions. We all recognize that sometimes two public needs, both of which have a basis in the Constitution, seem to conflict. In this case, the conflicting needs are the need of society to know the truth for the purpose of enforcing the law, and the need of society to know the truth in order that society may exercise its rights with respect to legislation, and so on. It would seem to me that the opinion of the court of appeals in the Caldwell case does an excellent job of recognizing both of these interests in saying that in this particular case the right of the public to know took precedence over the other. Personally, if the Supreme Court goes along with a decision of that character, I would prefer to rely on it rather than an act of Congress. But we don't know, of course, what the Supreme Court is going to say.

Mr. McKnight. I have spent a good part of my life, including a period in the firing line, in the South, and I have gone along with the Supreme Court at times when it wasn't really popular. And I will continue to do so, sir, until I find some reason to do otherwise.

Senator Ervin. You speak of the fact that today we have so many challenges to the validity of established law. Some people do not like the status quo. So they agitate for change by demonstrating, which creates quite a clamor at times, and I am sure tends to annoy all of us occasionally.

But I think it is very fortunate that the First Amendment usually compels us to put up with their noise. If their dissent, provoked by their dissatisfaction over certain policies of Government, is valid, we can always hope that society will recognize it and change the conditions which give rise to the dissent.

Furthermore, the right to dissent, even in a way which proves annoying to the public, or when it is not based on sound ground, has a therapeutic value to society. It does, as the psychiatrists say, enable the protestors to get rid of some of their tensions, for the time being. So I believe that these observations demonstrate why we have these great freedoms.

I always like what Judge Oliver Wendell Holmes said:

"The validity of a thought should be measured by its ability to get itself accepted in the market place of ideas."

In my opinion, he put his finger right squarely on the purpose of the First Amendment, that it was designed to allow people to express ideas as distinguished from action, and that if the idea is valid it will be accepted in the market place for ideas, and if not, it will be rejected there. Therefore I think it comes to the proposition that our country really has nothing to fear from freedom of speech if it just leaves truth free to combat error, and that those who should determine the truth in the long run are the people, not the Government, and not the news media. We should have the freest possible flow of information so that all of the people might be able to judge what is true for themselves.

Mr. McKnight. I agree with you, sir. And I congratulate you once again on these hearings. They are long overdue. And they are very interesting.

Senator Ervin. Thank you. These hearings reinforce two propositions which I think are undoubtedly true: eternal vigilance is the price of all liberty; and liberty is always imperiled, but it is mostly imperiled in times of crisis. We put something in the North Carolina Constitution back in 1776, which says the frequent recurrence to fundamental principles is absolutely essential to the preservation of liberty. And I think it is very well to reassert these fundamental principles because we tend to lose sight of them and lose sight of the reasons for them.

I want to thank you for the excellence of your statement both in the content and in the manner in which it was presented.

Mr. McKNIGHT. Thank you, sir.

Senator ERVIN. Do you have anything you would like to add, Mr. Schmidt.

Mr. SCHMIDT. No thank you, Senator.

Senator ERVIN. Thank you. I am sorry we had this long delay.

Mr. BASKIR. Our final witness today is Mr. Kenneth McCormick, who is appearing on behalf of the American Association of American Publishers.

Senator ERVIN. Mr. McCormick, I am delighted to welcome you to the subcommittee. And I appreciate very much your willingness to appear and present your views and those of the organization you represent on this very important matter.

STATEMENT OF KENNETH McCORMICK, CHAIRMAN, FREEDOM TO READ COMMITTEE, ASSOCIATION OF AMERICAN PUBLISHERS, ACCOMPANIED BY ROBERT W. FRASE, VICE PRESIDENT AND ECONOMIST

Mr. McCORMICK. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

My name is Kenneth McCormick, and I am chairman of the Freedom to Read Committee of the Association of American Publishers. I have with me Robert W. Frase, vice president and economist of the association, who is also in charge of our Washington office. The 260 members of the AAP publish more than two-thirds of the annual U.S. book production in this country. The United States is the leading book publishing nation, both in domestic sales and in exports. Our per capita consumption of books is also the highest of any major publishing nation.

We appreciate the opportunity to appear in these hearings representing an important and distinctive part of the press and related media protected by the first amendment.

The title of my remarks today are "Price Control as an Abridgement of the Freedom of the Press."

I have within the last few days completely reordered the priority of my remarks to your subcommittee. I have not omitted any of the three major subjects to be covered, but I have moved to the top of the list the subject which is reflected in the title of this statement "Price control as an abridgement of freedom of the press."

It has become increasingly clear that if price controls of the magnitude being discussed are applied to book publishing many older book titles first published 1, 2, 3, or even 10 or 20 years ago which need to go back to press because publishers' stocks have become exhausted will not be reprinted.

The cost of reprinting new stocks of these older books may increase from 20 to 100 percent, especially in the case of small reprintings of a few hundred copies of specialized and scholarly books.

In addition to the matter of reprints, two additional problems should be mentioned. One deals with the need for flexibility in order to provide elementary and secondary textbooks to American school systems, on which fixed prices frequently must be guaranteed by publishers over a period of 4 to 8 years. Another concerns the fact that there is free trade in books in 90 percent of the world market and the reduction of American titles available for sale abroad would adversely affect the present 2 to 1 favorable balance of trade in books between the United States and the rest of the world.

It seems clear to us, and we hope to others who are prepared to examine the facts of the case, that book prices should not be controlled following the end of the first 90-day price freeze on November 13. Such a policy is justified not only in terms of the freedom of the press and the First Amendment, but also in purely economic terms. Because of the highly competitive situation in book publishing with scores of competing firms, classical economics still works. The average per copy price of the principal categories of books, such as elementary and secondary textbooks, college textbooks, and general books, has increased far less in the last 3 years than the consumer price index. Looked at from another dimension, the book component in the consumer price index—that is in the total consumer market basket that the CPI attempts to measure—is a small fraction of 1 percent. Clearly, book prices are not a significant influence in causing inflation, but rather increases in book prices are the result of inflation originating in other areas and for other reasons. Thus the exemption of books from price ceilings would have no adverse general economic effects, and would prevent price control from taking books off the market, both domestically and internationally, which otherwise would be available to serve educational, cultural, political and professional purposes under the normal working of the competitive economic system.

We would hope, therefore, that the administration and the Price Commission will at an early date provide an exemption for the press in Phase II. If not, we shall appear before Congressional committees to present our case for another statutory exemption in hearings on the renewal and modification of the Economic Stabilization Act of 1970.

THE PRESS EXEMPTIONS DURING WORLD WAR II AND KOREA

In World War II the Congress exempted the press and related media from price ceilings by exclusion from the definition of commodities subject to price control in the following language in Public Law 421, 77th Congress:

"The term 'commodity' means commodities, articles, products, and materials (except materials furnished for publication by any press association or feature service, books, magazines, motion pictures, periodicals and newspapers, other than waste or scrap) * * *"

This precedent was followed in the Korean War when similar language was adopted. Thus there were no ceiling prices for books, magazines and newspapers during World War II and the Korean War, and there is no evidence that such an exemption for the press interfered in any practical way with the successful stabilization of prices on those two previous occasions.

In the current situation the Economic Stabilization Act of 1970 contains no exemptions for the press. In reviewing the legislative history of the Economic Stabilization Act it seems that there was no active role taken in the House hearings on this question by private groups. Specifically, there was no participation by the press associations—newspapers, magazines, books or the electronic media. The Senate had no hearings on powers to control prices and wages. Therefore, we think it can fairly be said that the committees and the Congress did not have an opportunity to focus on the question as to whether an exemption for the press should again be mandated in the current authorization legislation for price and wage control instead of being left to executive discretion.

The Association of American Publishers on September 27, 1971 made a written proposal to the Administration, and specifically to the members of the Cost of Living Council that in Phase II, after November 13, specific exemption from price control for the press be provided. We have had several acknowledgments of our proposal, but no specific press exemption has thus far developed in Phase II, although the proposed Price Commission could so provide. Meanwhile, it has become clear from Secretary Connally's news conference on October 8 that the absolute freeze on prices will continue until the Price Commission, not yet appointed, has an opportunity to get into operation.

THE SEVERAL COMPONENTS OF THE PRESS

I resume now with my original plan for this statement, which deals with three major subjects. The first is the inter-relationship of the various segments of the press, using that term broadly, and the importance of each one of them in serving public needs. The second is to amplify on the particular strength of the book. The third is to discuss various general measures in addition to price control taken by the Government which are not specifically directed at the press, but can have a very large influence on whether the press remains vigorous and can perform its true role in our society.

Each segment of the press or the communications media has its special strengths. The electronic media are extremely rapid and can have a great immediate visual and dramatic impact. On the other hand they are not as effective as print in permitting very careful, detailed and precise analysis; and they cannot easily be recalled and further studied. In addition they are not available to the viewer on his timetable, and the viewer is required to take what may be available from a limited menu at a particular hour on any one day.

The newspaper press is also quite rapid, and has much more space available. Some large city newspapers can and do cover almost the entire gamut of human interests. The same is true on a somewhat slower time scale with national news magazines. Various specialized magazines, usually on an even slower time schedule, can go into greater detail and explore complicated subjects in more depth.

All of these relatively "fast" media are dependent economically on advertising and this may affect what they place before their audiences to a greater or lesser degree. In addition the electronic media are subject to the control of the Federal Communications Commission, imposed because of the limitations on the number of channels available.

The book is the slowest of the great media of expression, although we have seen that in special circumstances this may not necessarily be the case. Some of the great public documents of our time such as the Warren Commission Report and the Pentagon papers have been made available in millions of copies in paperback editions within a matter of days. Generally, however, the book is slow. But it is also thorough and the amount of space available for detailed treatment of a complicated subject is almost unlimited compared with any of the other media.

The book is also the most free of economic restrictions. This is true for two principal reasons: the book is not dependent financially on advertising and the unit of production which is economically viable is very small. As compared with newspapers and radio stations with their heavy capital investment and their need to appeal to mass audiences for advertising reasons the typical book publisher has no capital investment in printing facilities. He buys his printing and binding from any number of specialist book manufacturers. He is not concerned with advertising. He need not serve a mass audience although he welcomes best sellers when they occur.

An individual general book title can be produced and distributed at a small fraction of the cost of operating one of the other media. The ideas and information developed by an author can be placed before ten thousand readers in book form in an economically viable way and on a national basis for $25,000 of initial outlay. Among the several score competing publishers one can almost always be found to finance a worthwhile title. In publishing an individual "controversial" book the book publisher does not endanger a multimillion dollar enterprise tailored to a group of regular readers or listeners. He is only looking for a few thousand readers for the intellectually honest ideas in the book. He may also be publishing an honest presentation of the other side of the same question, either for the same or differing group of readers. In the relatively low cost of the individual title, and the freedom from advertising the book resembles very much the pamphlet familiar to those Americans who drew up our Constitution and the First Amendment.

All of the above generalizations apply more to general books than to textbooks and multi-volume reference works, for which the capital investment in development and editorial costs may be very heavy.

GOVERNMENT AND THE PRESS

I resume now my third subject touched upon earlier in connection with price control: the myriad ways in which the government, and especially the Federal Government, impinges on the press. The First Amendment is, of course, a fundamental protection in preventing direct Government censorship. However, even in this area experience has shown that "eternal vigilence is the price of freedom." A few recent examples on the Federal level will serve to illustrate this point; some of these have been discussed by witnesses who have preceded me. We have the action of the Federal Government in attempting to impose prior censorship on the New York Times and the Washington Post in the case of the Pentagon papers. We have the case of a committee of the House of Representatives attempting to cite CBS and Frank Stanton for contempt of Congress for refusing to turn over to a congressional committee material not used in broadcasting "The Selling of the Pentagon." In both of these cases I am happy to say the Association of American Publishers came to the defense of the other media involved.

We have almost every year one or more bills which get to the stage of approval by one or both Houses of the Congress which attempt to limit the freedom of the press under the guise of protecting either the sexual or political morality of the American public, under the Federal power to control interstate and foreign commerce or the Federal monopoly of the Post Office. In addition there are scores of problems great and small at the State and local level.

I proceed now to a few examples of less direct but very important kinds of government activity which impinge on the press. One of these is the power of the Federal Government to establish on a national basis copyright laws pursuant to section 8 of article I of the Constitution which gives the Congress power:

> To promote the Progress of Science and useful arts, by securing for limited Times to Authors and Inventors the exclusive Right to their respective Writings and Discoveries.

PRESS FREEDOM AND COPYRIGHT

Copyright is probably just as important to certain segments of the press, and this includes book publishing, as the first amendment.

The copyright laws give to the author and to the publisher title to a salable commodity, providing them an economic status based on their ability to sell to the American and world public materials which that public is willing to pay for. Without this title in intellectual property the author and the publisher would need to find some other source of economic support. Prior to the evolution of the copyright law and the development of the publishing industry, based on copyright in the 19th century, authors and other artists were dependent on the patronage of kings, princes, cardinals, and other politically or economically powerful men. In the absence of copyright they would now be dependent on such individuals plus their modern counterparts: governments, corporations, and other types of powerful economic organizations.

Because of technological changes, copyright laws must be kept current either by court decisions which apply old principles to new technology or by actual changes in the statutes. We are now in midstream of a several-year effort to modernize the U.S. copyright law. The continued vigor of a considerable part of the press, especially books, will depend on the extent to which this revision effort is successful in continuing to give authors and publishers effective title to their works and a viable base of economic and therefore political independence.

THE ROLE OF THE POSTAL SERVICE

Another example of special current interest is the matter of postage rates and conditions of mailing. The post office in all countries is either a legal or practical monopoly for distributing many products of the press, especially certain types of newspapers, most magazines, and a very heavy proportion of book production of all types. We are facing critical decisions in this area in the United States within the next few months. The Congress, by the Postal Reorganization Act of 1970, turned the matter of setting postal rates, postal classifications and conditions of mailing over to the Board of Governors of the U.S. Postal Service, subject to review by a five-man Postal Rate Commission appointed by the President but not requiring confirmation by the Senate. That Postal Rate Commission has closed the record after 7 months of hearings on proposals by the Postal Service to raise postage rates on the average far more than they have ever been raised by congressional action. For example the Postal Service has proposed, over a span of 5 years, to increase the postage rates for second-class newspapers and magazines by 143 percent on the average and has proposed for the same 5-year period to increase the postage rates on books and educational and cultural materials by 83 percent, It remains to be seen whether these massive proposed rate increases will be moderated in line with the Administration's goal of restricting the rate of inflation by 2–3 percent by the end of 1972.

In closing, I repeat our thanks to the subcommittee for scheduling these important hearings and for inviting us to participate.

Senator ERVIN. Mr. McCormick, I wish to say that you have made a very substantial contribution to the completeness of this study and these hearings. You have given us information and views which I don't believe have been presented by any other witness.

You point out, I think, in a very graphic way the fundamental differences in the operations of the various media of communications.

You point out the virtues and weaknesses of the electronic media, newspapers, and also books.

You state that each of these methods of communicating ideas and information has great value, and each of them has certain limitations.

You point out very effectively that the limitation on the publishing of books arises out of the fact that it doesn't deal with advertisements, that its only method of obtaining the necessary funds to finance publication is from the prices which are obtained for the books.

You also make a very graphic case for the fact that a constant revision and modernization of the copyright laws is necessary to enable the book publishing company to continue to flourish and fulfill its role in our society.

Of course, I think that of all the opinions the Supreme Court has ever handed down which recognize the importance of books in the dissemination of ideas, and you might say the effort to influence the minds of men, which ultimately influence society, the most important is the Rumly case.

You are familiar, I am certain, with the Grosjean case from Louisiana, where the Court recognized that it is inconsistent with the first amendment for government to take steps, although not expressly undertaken to limit the freedom of the press as in the area of taxation.

which in effect inhibit the exercise of the freedom of the press. As you point out, in order for the book publishing medium to discharge its special role in our society, it is necessary for it to have a viable economic existence.

As I interpret your position, you say the price control of books could very seriously damage the ability of book publishers to perform their special role in the dissemination of ideas.

Mr. McCormick. Mr. Chairman, we feel in the book business that we are really the last stronghold of a free press, because we don't have advertisers and we don't have subscribers.

But here is a limitation that is very serious, and many worthwhile books would disappear.

Senator Ervin. And the State school book commissions, which control the award of contracts for the purchasing of school books, have a firmly established habit of compelling the book publishers to contract for years in advance the price that they will offer those books to the school children for.

With the increase which we have seen that has characterized everything in recent years, that practice presents a very serious threat to the continuation of the book publishing company as a viable economic force insofar as school textbooks are concerned, and I imagine that there are a great many companies that specialize and concentrate all their activities in that field, aren't there?

Mr. McCormick. Many of them do.

Senator Ervin. So that poses a very serious economic threat to them.

Mr. McCormick. Many of us work in both fields, the so-called trade books that you get in the book shops and school books. There are enormous school book companies—which this would hurt materially.

Senator Ervin. You discussed one matter, but not in any great detail, therefore, I would just like to state for your information that we propose to have some witness testify in the future as to the impact of postage rates on publishers of magazines and publishers of books. In order to get people to exercise the right of freedom of press through any kind of media of communication, which includes the publishing of books, it is absolutely essential that those who engage in these enterprises should receive sufficient recompense to enable them to discharge their functions under the first amendment.

After all, while communications media may be a way of making a living for the people, the overall purpose of the amendment in the field is to make all kinds of information available to the people. They exercise a function of the highest importance in our Nation.

Mr. McCormick. I am glad to hear you say that.

Thank you for letting us come to testify.

Senator Ervin. I think of the statement, "Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free." To my mind the First Amendment is designed to make it possible for the people at least to have an opportunity to know the truth. This is based upon the theory that I mentioned a while ago that Justice Holmes stated so well, that our country rests on the foundation that in the long run sound conclusions will be reached by the people because the validity of an idea or thought depends upon whether it is able to sell itself in the market place of ideas.

Mr. McCormick. Very well quoted.

Senator Ervin. I appreciate very much your contribution to our hearings.

We will investigate further into the postal rate aspect.

Mr. Frase. I will be glad to come back when you have further hearings on this subject.

Senator Ervin. In other words, your thesis is that it is possible for the government to price freedom of speech out of existence.

Mr. McCormick. Exactly.

Senator Ervin. And that can pose just as real a threat in the long run as an actual overt attempt by government to limit the exercising of the freedom.

Mr. Frase. It achieves the same result.

Senator Ervin. Counsel.

Mr. Baskir. Have you in the publishing field had any contact with the subpena problem that has been mentioned with respect to the press and broadcasting?

Mr. McCormick. I understand the question. Not seriously.

Mr. Baskir. I mention this because we did have a witness earlier in the hearings who suggested that there is one area of book publishing, sometimes called public policy studies, which has in recent times run up against this kind of problem. I wonder if you have any thoughts on whether or not a shield law, or what has been called the newsman's privilege, ought to be extended beyond those of the working daily press to cover persons in the longer term press, that is to say, book publishing. I don't know if you have given it any thought.

Mr. McCormick. Our lists are filled with many controversial books, some of which are almost explosive. And I do feel that that privilege should be extended in some cases. But the fact that we are not such a rapid media makes it sometimes even more serious. And I can think of one or two authors who have very definitely been harassed and had serious problems.

Mr. Baskir. I wonder if it would be asking too much for the association to address itself to the problem of a shield law and the extension of its coverage to book publishing, whether you approve it or not, and at least discuss the problem.

Mr. McCormick. We would be glad to.

Mr. Baskir. It would be very helpful if you would address to this question.

Mr. Frase. We would be glad to.

Senator Ervin. I might state at this point that that is something akin to the issue involved in the Rumly case. In that case the congressional committee ordered a book publishing company, the Gandy Co., as I recall it, to provide the committee with names of all the persons in the United States who bought in bulk the books it published. A lot of times people think it is only the left wing press or the underground press that is harassed by government, but in this case this was a very conservative publishing company, a little too conservative for the views of the majority of the congressional committee. The company was cited for contempt of Congress, as I recall, for failing to produce to the committee the list of those who had bought their publications in bulk quantities.

The Supreme Court reversed the conviction holding that the committee had violated the First Amendment rights of the company, and that it had the same right to sell their books and have their books compete for the minds of men as anyone else did.

And I thought that was one of the most wholesome decisions ever handed down by a court.

Mr. McCormick. I certainly agree with you.

Senator Ervin. I cite it because of counsel's questions about the subpenas issued. This situation is very much akin to the subpena issue, and it also represents an assault on the First Amendment rights of a conservative organization. We are all familiar with assaults on the First Amendment rights of very radical organizations, such as the underground press, so it behooves all of us, regardless of whether we are conservatives, reactionaries, liberals, or radicals, to unite together to fight for the preservation of the first amendment, because it protects us all.

Mr. McCormick. I agree.

Senator Ervin. Thank you very much.

The subcommittee is adjourned until 10 a.m. tomorrow.

(Whereupon, the subcommittee was adjourned.)

S. 1311—FREEDOM OF THE PRESS

U.S. SENATE,
OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to recess, at 10 a.m., in room 2228, New Senate Office Building, Senator Sam J. Ervin, Jr. (chairman of the subcommittee) presiding.

Present: Senators Ervin (presiding), Hruska, and Thurmond.

Also present: Lawrence M. Baskir, chief counsel; Bill Pursley, counsel; and Stanley Ebner, minority counsel.

Senator ERVIN. The subcommittee will come to order.

The subcommittee concludes its first series of hearings on the state of freedom of the press today. As I have previously announced, we intend to schedule a second series of this important subject in early 1972.

This second series of hearings is necessary because there are several critical issues which need further exploration and because there are knowledgeable individuals in this field who have important information and ideas as yet not presented to the subcommittee. Between now and this second series of hearings, the subcommittee will be studying the excellent testimony already presented with a view toward refining the issues for the second set of hearings.

Today's three witnesses are all involved in one way or another with the broadcast media. In the course of our hearings we have heard many questions raised as to the validity and scope of government regulation of broadcasting. Some witnesses have asserted that present statutes and administrative regulations and procedures have seriously undermined the impact of the first amendment on broadcasting. Others have called for even greater government control to insure fairness in news coverage or to secure a right to access.

Today we shall hear from the chairman and another member of the Federal Communications Commission address themselves to these and other questions concerning the government's regulation of broadcasting. In addition, we shall hear from the North Carolina Broadcasters Association representing hundreds of individuals in one of our States.

Counsel will call the first witness.

Mr. BASKIR. Mr. Chairman, our first witness this morning is Mr. Dean Burch, Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission.

Senator ERVIN. I want to welcome you to the subcommittee and express to you our great appreciation of your willingness to come and give us the benefit of your observations and experience in the very important field of electronic communications.

STATEMENT OF DEAN BURCH, CHAIRMAN, FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION; ACCOMPANIED BY RICHARD E. WILEY, GENERAL COUNSEL

Mr. BURCH. Thank you very much, Senator. I am delighted to be here. And I commend your committee for the scope of these hearings and the desirability for them at this particular time.

I am accompanied this morning by the general counsel of the Commission, Mr. Dick Wiley.

Senator ERVIN. We are delighted to have you with us.

Mr. WILEY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BURCH. The Commission appreciates the opportunity to present its views on the important subject of FCC policies relating to broadcast journalism. I think the best way for me to proceed is to describe first the general statutory scheme for regulating broadcasting. Then I will review the way in which the Commission has applied this statutory scheme with respect to broadcast journalism. I shall necessarily paint with a broad brush, but I shall be glad to supply additional details in answer to questions today or by letter if you wish.

Broadcast stations are licensed by the government. In contrast, newspapers are not. Government licensing of newspapers has been and continues to be abhorred in this Nation because the power to license carries with it the threat of government control of news, a circumstance well-known to totalitarian nations. While it is undoubtedly old hat to all of you, I think it is essential to repeat here the reason for this distinction between newspapers and broadcasting stations—why the Government must license broadcast stations.

The Supreme Court stated the reason 28 years ago:

> Unlike other modes of expression, radio inherently is not available to all. That is its unique characteristic, and that is why, unlike other modes of expression, it is subject to government regulation.

Conflicting demands for many uses of radio, both broadcast and nonbroadcast, require that the frequencies which comprise the radio spectrum must be allocated to various uses or services. Once segments of the spectrum have been allocated for a service—here broadcast service—the frequencies within that segment must be assigned to specific users in a way that prevents destructive interference. Otherwise, interference could effectively preclude the public from hearing any broadcast. Once television broadcast channel 4 has been licensed to one person in Washington, for example, no one else can be licensed to use that channel. The Commission accomplishes this result in the broadcast field by following the licensing scheme embodied in the Communications Act of 1934, as amended.

Congress clearly stated the purpose of the act—"[T]o maintain the control of the United States over all the channels of interstate and foreign radio transmission; and to provide for the use of such channels, but not the ownership thereof, by persons for limited periods of time, under licenses granted by Federal authority. * * *" The standard Congress established to govern such licensing is the public convenience, interest, and necessity.

It is by now beyond dispute that the act's comprehensive scheme for regulating the use of radio in the larger interest of the public is not inconsistent with the First Amendment. This is not because the First Amendment is inapplicable to radio—the protections of the First Amendment certainly do apply to broadcasting. The Supreme Court has so stated on several occasions; Section 326 of the Communications Act so states. Rather Government regulation is permissible because different standards are appropriate for different media of expression in light of their differing natures.

Thus, since radio is inherently not available to all, regulation of the use of radio in the public interest does not violate the First Amendment. That is the holding of NBC v. United States in 1943, and it was repeated only 2 years ago in the landmark decision, Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC.

I believe this decision to be so important to the subject of this hearing that I have attached a copy of the unanimous opinion to this statement.

Mr. Chairman, you may hear the argument that there are far more broadcast stations than newspapers of daily circulation—that it is much more difficult to start a newspaper than it is a broadcast operation: this is true. But no one will stop you from putting out a newspaper. Only one person can operate on channel 4 here in Washington, and all others will be prevented from doing so.

In short, despite the argument as to numbers of stations, the vital consideration is that the radio spectrum remains a precious, scarce resource. In view of the demands pressed upon us by those applying for spectrum space, I can assure you that this is so. And when we revoke or deny a station license, we find eight, 10, sometimes as many as 16 applicants for the frequency. The Supreme Court recognized the limits on spectrum space and rejected this no scarcity argument in Red Lion, which I have cited previously.

I might say, Mr. Chairman, that particular argument in Red Lion meets very squarely the position that was presented to you by Walter Cronkite in his testimony before this subcommittee.

Chief Justice Burger, in his last opinion as an appeals court judge, said:

> A broadcaster has much in common with a newspaper publisher, but he is not in the same category in terms of public obligations imposed by law. A broadcaster seeks and is granted the free and exclusive use of a limited and valuable part of the public domain; when he accepts the franchise it is burdened by an enforceable public obligation. A newspaper can be operated at the whim or caprice of its owner, a broadcast station cannot.

What, then, is the public obligation imposed upon broadcast journalism?

The first obligation of the broadcaster is to engage in broadcast journalism—to devote a reasonable amount of time to informing the public on controversial issues of public importance. A democracy cannot function without an informed electorate. Because of the contribution broadcasting can make to an informed electorate, we have allocated a relatively large amount of spectrum space to this service. To justify that allocation of scarce radio frequencies, broadcasters must act (in the words of the Red Lion case) "as proxies for the entire community, obligated to give suitable time and attention to matters of great public concern. * * * "

The Commission has also stressed the need for the licensee to discharge this obligation by presenting partisan voices, rather than always itself presenting views in a bland, inoffensive manner. For, such a licensee policy, we noted, "would run counter to the 'profound national commitment that debate on public issues be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open debate'." The case I am quoting from is New York Times v. Sullivan.

In line with that objective, the Commission believes that the broadcaster cannot properly present only one side of the debate—the side with which he agrees. The Commission therefore early developed the fairness doctrine as a necessary corollary of the public interest standard of the Communications Act. The doctrine emerged in a series of early cases and then was enunciated in considerable detail as the result of a proceeding initiated by the Commission to clarify its position with respect to the obligation of licensees in the field of broadcasting news commentary, and opinion. That proceeding culminated in the issuance of the 1949 Report on Editorializing by Broadcast Licensees. Simply stated, the fairness doctrine requires that where a broadcaster has covered one side of a controversial issue of public importance, he must afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of contrasting viewpoints. He cannot sit back and wait for someone to knock on his door and offer to present the other side. He must affirmatively encourage and implement the presentation of other sides—by making offers over-the-air or to specific groups or persons representing other viewpoints. In presenting other viewpoints the broadcaster has considerable leeway to make good faith, reasonable judgments as to the viewpoints to be presented, the appropriate spokesmen, the format of the program, and many other similar programing decisions. Thus, fairness—that is, affording reasonable opportunity—does not mean the mathematical precision of equal opportunities, a concept which is applicable only to broadcasts by legally qualified political candidates, which is set forth in section 315 of the act.

The Commission's role in enforcing the fairness doctrine is limited. The Commission determines, upon appropriate complaint, whether the broadcaster's judgment can be said to be unreasonable. The Commission does not, I stress, determine whether it is a wise journalistic judgment or one with which this agency would agree.

That is a thumbnail sketch of the Commission's fairness doctrine. It was expressly codified in the 1959 amendments to the Communications Act. Section 315(a) now imposes upon broadcast licensees the obligation " * * * to afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting viewpoints on issues of public importance."

In the 1960's the Commission adopted two specific rules within the fairness doctrine field—the rules applicable to personal attacks and to political editorials. I have attached these rules as appendix B. Under these rules, the Commission requires the broadcaster to give timely notification to a person or group attacked and to the candidate opposed or not supported and to make an offer of comparable time for a response.

These rules and the general fairness doctrine were challenged in litigation culminating in the Supreme Court's 1969 decision in Red Lion. Mr. Chairman, their invalidity was urged principally on first amendment grounds. The Court affirmed the Commission. I believe the Red Lion opinion is therefore of special interest to the subcommittee. I shall quote here only one portion of it:

> . . . There is nothing in the First Amendment which prevents the Government from requiring a licensee to share his frequency with others and to conduct himself as a proxy or fiduciary with obligations to present those views and voices which are representative of his community and which would otherwise, by necessity, be barred from the airwaves.
> This is not to say that the First Amendment is irrelevant to public broadcasting. On the contrary, it has a major role to play as the Congress itself recognized in 326, which forbids FCC interference with the "right of free speech by means of radio communications." Because of the scarcity of radio frequencies, the Government is permitted to put restraints on licensees in favor of others whose views should be expressed on this unique medium. But the people as a whole retain their interest in free speech by radio and their collective right to have the medium function consistently with the ends and purposes of the First Amendment. It is the right of the viewers and listeners, not the right of the broadcasters, which is paramount [cases omitted]. It is the purpose of the First Amendment to preserve an uninhibited marketplace of ideas in which truth will ultimately prevail, rather than to countenance monopolization of that market, whether it be the Government itself or a private licensee [citations omitted]. "[S]peech concerning public affairs is more than self-expression; it is the essence of self-government" [citations omitted]. It is the right of the public to receive suitable access to social, political, esthetic, moral, and other ideas and experiences which is crucial here. That right may not constitutionally be abridged either by Congress or by the FCC.

Except for the two rules on personal attacks and political editorials, the Commission has implemented the fairness doctrine by ad hoc rulings on complaints. These rulings have resulted at times in important policy declarations. The Cullman ruling, for example, established that the broadcaster must present the other side free, if the American public would otherwise be left uninformed. Rather than discuss these many other important ad hoc rulings, I should like to submit for the record our "Fairness Primer", which contains a compilation of the more important rulings up to 1964.

There are advantages to acting only in concrete factual cases—the equivalent of the "case or controversy" requirement for the judiciary. Thus, this ad hoc way of proceeding should not be disparaged. But there are also disadvantages. In an ad hoc proceeding, we have before us only the few parties involved in the case, and we do not receive the comments of all persons interested in the underlying principle. Further, the problem may be treated only within its narrow adjudicatory context rather than on an overall basis. The agency may thus not foresee the twists and turns of the road it is going down.

An administrative agency may therefore opt for an overall view of a subject in a general rulemaking or inquiry. In the fairness area, we have just recently opted for such an inquiry—the first since 1949.

Our reasons for initiating an inquiry into our fairness doctrine are stated in some detail in the notice—a copy of which I also offer for the record. I will not go over all of them but rather will focus on the general concern of the inquiry. As I have already explained, the purpose of the doctrine is to promote robust debate, not stifle it. As stated by the court of appeals in a recent case, "the fairness doctrine must be administered by the Commission to enhance, not inhibit, the rights secured by the First Amendment."

The critical issue of our inquiry is whether our administration of the doctrine, since its inception over two decades ago, has enhanced these rights, or whether we need to make minor or major revisions. Just as one example of the problems the Commission must resolve. I should like to call the subcommittee's attention to the recent ESSO ruling and particularly the concurring and dissenting statements. Again, I have copies for the subcommittee's study.

I am not now prepared to indicate where our inquiry will lead. The comments on this phase of the inquiry are not yet in. But I stress that we view this matter most seriously. We plan to allocate special staff resources, employ special procedures, and devote a number of Commission meetings to the subject.

There is no retreating from the fairness doctrine. The doctrine is the law and indeed may well be constitutionally required in light of the Red Lion holding. Rather, the Commission must consider and determine those policies and procedures under the fairness doctrine which effectively advance the first amendment goal of robust, wide-open debate.

Other important Commission policies directly concern broadcast journalism. First, there is the matter of deliberate distortion or staging of the news. I am not referring to mistakes, which, while regrettable, are bound to occur at times. I mean actions that are deliberate. Evidence that a licensee directed his newsman to slant the news would raise a grave issue as to the licensee's character qualifications. Such an issue would have to be thoroughly explored by the Commission; and it would be contrary to the public interest for the Commission to renew the station's license until and unless the issues were resolved favorably to the licensee.

I point out, Mr. Chairman, that that question does not go to the truth or falsity of what the newsman said on the air. The question is whether the licensee ordered him to deliberately distort the news. which goes to the licensee's character qualifications.

A charge of distortion or staging of the news raises a most important question: When should the Commission conduct an investigation or hold a hearing? For example, we may get a complaint of news distortion based on the claim that the facts of some matter are different from those presented over the air. We have absolutely refused to act there. Very simply stated, deliberate distortion cannot be established by determining what is true and then comparing it with what was broadcast. The Commission is not the national arbiter of truth. Similarly, when a person quoted on a news program complains that he very clearly said something else, the Commission cannot investigate and weigh the credibility of the newsman and the interviewed party. We refer the matter to the licensee for its own investigation and appropriate handling.

Having now given you these two examples in which the Commission will not act, I should like to stress two points. First, I am not saying that the press is above criticism and critical analysis on how it fulfills its journalistic functions. On the contrary, the Commission has stressed that the press, like all other institutions—including of course Government—can benefit from critical analysis.

Second, I am in no way diminishing the gravity of the issue. Staging or slanting the news is flagrantly contrary to the public interest—indeed, it is difficult to imagine a more effective way to destroy the public's ability to understand, and participate in public affairs, and thus to destroy the very essence of democracy. The integrity of the press is a linchpin of the republic. Every act of deliberate distortion—in some senseless race for ratings—not only diminishes the profession of journalism or broadcasting, but also impoverishes the Nation.

In every case where we may appropriately do so—where there is, for example, extrinsic evidence that a newsman has been directed to slant the news—and where, Mr. Chairman, the answer to a question is changed from no to yes—we shall act to protect the public interest in a responsible press. But in this democracy, no government agency can, or should try, to authenticate the news. Therefore, in a series of recent cases we have consistently and repeatedly stated that we will shun the censor's role and will not try to establish news distortion in situations where government intervention would constitute a worse danger than the possible rigging itself.

Mr. Chairman, I have brought with me copies of these recent rulings. I do not want to overburden your record, and I shall therefore leave them with your counsel, so that you may consider whether you want to have them placed in the record at this point.

There is one other area which directly concerns broadcast programs dealing with controversial issues. We have at times received complaints that such programming has, for example, presented patently anti-Semitic material and requests that the Commission should take action against the licensee on the ground that the carriage of such material is inconsistent with the public interest standard. The lead case is Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith v. Radio Station KTYM. In refusing to take action, the Commission stated that "its function is not to judge the merit, wisdom or accuracy of any broadcast discussion or commentary" but rather to insure that reasonable opportunity is afforded for the presentation of contrasting viewpoints on controversial issues of public importance. The Commission further stated:

> It is the judgment of the Commission, as it has been the judgment of those who drafted our Constitution and of the overwhelming majority of our legislators and judges over the years, that the public interest is best served by permitting the expression of any views that do not involve "a clear and present danger of serious substantive evil that rises far above public inconvenience, annoyance or unrest." [citation omitted] This most assuredly does not mean that those who uphold this principle approve of the opinions that are expressed under its protection. On the contrary, this principle insures that the most diverse and opposing opinions will be expressed, many of which may be even highly offensive to those officials who thus protect the rights of others to free speech. If there is to be free speech, it must be free for speech that we abhor and hate as well as for speech that we find tolerable or congenial.

And in this same case, the Commission refused to impose a verification process which would be inconsistent with the fundemental goal of robust, wide-open debate. The Commission's position was supported by several precedents in the courts. The court of appeals affirmed the Commission decision and the Supreme Court did not grant certiorari.

I should like merely to mention some Commission actions which are pertinent although tangential to broadcast journalism. I will not develop these subjects here but, as I mentioned before, I will be glad to supply additional information or answer questions concerning them.

First, for many years we have had rules to prevent undue concentration of ownership of broadcast facilities either locally or on a national basis. These rules obviously pertain to the first amendment issue under consideration because their basic purpose is to diversify the sources of information broadcast to the American people.

Second, we have rules that assure the right of network affiliates to substitute local programing; prohibit restraints on taking programing from nonnetwork sources; and indeed require that at least one quarter of the time period, 7-11 p.m., so-called prime time, be of a nonnetwork nature. These rules also seek to diversify the sources of material broadast to the American people.

In addition we have applied the fairness doctrine to the advertising of one product—cigarettes. In 1967 the Commission issued a ruling that required licensees carrying cigarette commercials to inform their listeners to some significant extent of the hazards of cigarette smoking. In doing so, the Commission stressed the unique nature of cigarettes as a health hazard authenticated by the Congress and other governmental entities. The court of appeals, however, in a recent decision, Friends of the Earth v. FCC extended this ruling to ordinary commercials on behalf of high-powered cars and leaded gasoline. The court's decision raises the issues of whether virtually all commercials are included and whether such a result would undermine the commercial broadcasting system and the contribution which it makes to an informed electorate on matters of great public concern. We are now studying these questions particularly in the overall fairness inquiry. Again, I cannot tell you at this time what course we will follow—I can say only that we recognize the need for both expeditious and careful action that will best serve the public interest.

Other court developments are also pertinent in relation to the object of the fairness doctrine that the people be informed. I refer to the court's recent decision in Democratic National Committee v. FCC. The case concerns editorial advertising and the court of appeals decision postulates a First Amendment right of access by some individuals or groups to some time on broadcast stations. The opinion opens a host of issues, and we are considering requesting review by the Supreme Court.

I will stop here in my list. I hope that I have indicated that some of our policies in the broadcast field are in a state of flux. Our goal, however, is firm. We seek to promote robust debate to the end "that the American public must not be left uninformed." We must reach this goal with procedures that do not interfere improperly with the freedom of broadcast journalism. That may be a difficult task, but we must meet it, if we are to discharge our responsibilities under the Communications Act.

(The complete prepared statement of Mr. Burch follows:)

STATEMENT OF CHAIRMAN BURCH, FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION, BEFORE THE SENATE SUBCOMMITTEE ON CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS

October 20, 1971

The Commission appreciates the opportunity to present its views on the important subject of FCC policies relating to broadcast journalism. I think the best way for me to proceed is to describe first the general statutory scheme for regulating broadcasting. Then I will review the way in which the Commission has applied this statutory scheme with respect to broadcast journalism. I shall necessarily paint with a broad brush, but I shall be glad to supply additional details in answer to questions today or by letter if you wish.

THE GENERAL REGULATORY SCHEME

Broadcast stations are licensed by the government. In contrast, newspapers are not. Government licensing of newspapers has been and continues to be abhorred in this nation because the power to license carried with it the threat of government control of news, a circumstance well-known to totalitarian nations. While it is undoubtedly "old hat" to all of you, I think it is essential to repeat here the reason for this distinction between newspapers and broadcasting stations—why the government must license broadcast stations.

The Supreme Court stated the reason 28 years ago: "Unlike other modes of expression, radio inherently is not available to all. That is its unique characteristic, and that is why, unlike other modes of expression, it is subject to government regulation.[1] Conflicting demands for many uses of radio, both broadcast and nonbroadcast, require that the frequencies which comprise the radio spectrum must be allocated to various uses or services. Once segments of the spectrum have been allocated for a service—here broadcast service—the frequencies within that segment must be assigned to specific users in a way that prevents destructive interference. Otherwise, interference could effectively preclude the public from hearing any broadcast. Once television broadcast channel 4 has been licensed to one person in Washington, for example, no one else can be licensed to use that channel. The Commission accomplishes this result in the broadcast field by following the licensing scheme embodied in the Communications Act of 1934, as amended.[2]

Congress clearly stated the purpose of the Act—"[T]o maintain the control of the United States over all the channels of interstate and foreign radio transmission; and to provide for the use of such channels, but not the ownership thereof, by persons for limited periods of time, under licenses granted by Federal authority. * * *"[3] The standard Congress established to govern such licensing is the "public convenience, interest, and necessity."[4]

It is by now beyond dispute that the Act's comprehensive scheme for regulating the use of radio in the larger interest of the public is not inconsistent with the First Amendment. This is not because the First Amendment is inapplicable to radio—the protections of the First Amendments certainly do apply to broadcasting. The Supreme Court has so stated on several occasions;[5] Section 326 of the Communications Act so states.[6] Rather government regulation is permissible because different standards are appropriate for different media of expression in light of their differing natures.[7]

Thus, since radio is inherently not available to all, regulation of the use of radio in the public interest does not violate the First Amendment. That is the holding of NBC v. United States in 1943,[8] and it was repeated only two years ago in the landmark decision, Red Lion Bctg Co. v. FCC.[9]

[8] The Court there stated (319 U.S. at 227):

> * * * The right of free speech does not include, however, the right to use the facilities of radio without a license. The licensing system established by Congress in the Communications Act of 1934 was a proper exercise of its power over commerce. The standard it provided for the licensing of stations was the "public interest, convenience, or necessity." Denial of a station license on that ground, if valid under the Act, is not a denial of free speech.

[9] 395 U.S. 367, 389 (1969).

I believe this decision to be so important to the subject of this hearing that I have attached a copy of the unanimous opinion to this Statement.

Mr. Chairman, you may hear the argument that there are far more broadcast stations than newspapers of daily circulation—that it is much more difficult to start a newspaper than it is a broadcast operation: This is true. But no one will stop you from putting out a newspaper. Only one person can operate on Channel 4 here in Washington, and all others will be prevented from doing so.

In short, despite the argument as to numbers of stations, the vital consideration is that the radio spectrum remains a precious, scarce resource. In view of the demands pressed upon us by those applying for spectrum space, I can assure you that this is so. And when we revoke or deny a station license, we find eight, ten, sometimes as many as 16 applicants for the frequency. The Supreme Court recognized the limits on spectrum space and rejected this "no scarcity" argument in Red Lion.[10]

Chief Justice Burger, in his last opinion as an Appeals Court judge,[11] said:

> A broadcaster has much in common with a newspaper publisher, but he is not in the same category in terms of public obligations imposed by law. A broadcaster seeks and is granted the free and exclusive use of a limited and valuable part of the public domain; when he accepts the franchise it is burdened by an enforceable public obligation. A newspaper can be operated at the whim or caprice of its owner, a broadcast station cannot.

What, then, is the "public obligation" imposed upon broadcast journalism?

The public interest standard and broadcast journalism—the fairness doctrine

The first obligation of the broadcaster is to engage in broadcast journalism —to devote a reasonable amount of time to informing the public on controversial issues of public importance. A democracy cannot function without an informed electorate. Because of the contribution broadcasting can make to an informed electorate,[12] we have allocated a relatively large amount of spectrum space to this service. To justify that allocation of scarce radio frequencies, broadcasters must act (in the words of the Red Lion case) "as proxies for the entire community, obligated to give suitable time and attention to matters of great public concern. * * *"[13]

The Commission has also stressed the need for the licensee to discharge this obligation by presenting partisan voices, rather than "always itself presenting views in a bland, inoffensive manner."[14] For, such a licensee policy, we noted, "would run counter to the 'profound national commitment that debate on public issues be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open debate'."[15]

In line with that objective, the Commission believes that the broadcaster cannot properly present only one side of the debate—the side with which he agrees. The Commission therefore early developed the fairness doctrine as a necessary corollary of the public interest standard of the Communications Act. The doctrine emerged in a series of early cases and then was enunciated in considerable detail as the result of a proceeding initiated by the Commission to clarify its position with respect to the obligation of licensees in the field of broadcasting news commentary, and opinion. That proceeding culminated in the issuance of the 1949 Report on Editorializing by Broadcast Licensees.[16] Simply stated, the fairness doctrine requires that where a broadcaster has covered one side of a controversial issue of public importance, he must afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of contrasting viewpoints. He cannot sit back and wait for someone to knock on his door and offer to present the other side. He must affirmatively encourage and implement the presentation of other sides —by making offers over-the-air or to specific groups or persons representing other viewpoints. In presenting other viewpoints the broadcaster has considerable leeway to make good faith, reasonable judgments as to the viewpoints to be presented, the appropriate spokesmen, the format of the program, and many other similar programming decisions. Thus, fairness, that is, affording "reasonable" opportunity does not mean the mathematical precision of "equal" opportunities—a concept which is applicable only to broadcasts by legally qualified candidates.

The Commission's role in enforcing the fairness doctrine is limited. The Commission determines, upon appropriate complaint, whether the broadcaster's judgment can be said to be unreasonable. The Commission does not, I stress, determine whether it is a wise journalistic judgment or one with which this agency would agree.

That is a thumbnail sketch of the Commission's fairness doctrine. It was expressly codified in the 1959 amendments to the Communications Act. Section 315(a) now imposes upon broadcast licensees the obligation "* * * to afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting viewpoints on issues of public importance."[17]

In the 60's the Commission adopted two specific rules within the fairness doctrine field—the rules applicable to personal attacks and to political editorials. I have attached these rules as Appendix B. Under these rules, the Commission requires the broadcaster to give timely notification to a person or group attacked and to the candidate opposed or not supported and to make an offer of comparable time for a response.

These rules and the general fairness doctrine were challenged in litigation culminating in the Supreme Court's 1969 decision in Red Lion. Mr. Chairman, their invalidity was urged principally on First Amendment grounds. The Court affirmed the Commission. I believe the Red Lion opinion is therefore of special interest to the Subcommittee. I shall quote here only one portion of it:[18]

> * * * There is nothing in the First Amendment which prevents the Government from requiring a licensee to share his frequency with others and to conduct himself as a proxy or fiduciary with obligations to present those views and voices which are representative of his community and which would otherwise, by necessity, be barred from the airwaves.
> This is not to say that the First Amendment is irrelevant to public broadcasting. On the contrary, it has a major role to play as the Congress itself recognized in § 326, which forbids FCC interference with "the right of free speech by means of radio communications." Because of the scarcity of radio frequencies, the Government is permitted to put restraints on licensees in favor of others whose views should be expressed on this unique medium. But the people as a whole retain their interest in free speech by radio and their collective right to have the medium function consistently with the ends and purposes of the First Amendment. It is the right of the viewers and listeners, not the right of the broadcasters, which is paramount [cases omitted]. It is the purpose of the First Amendment to preserve an uninhibited marketplace of ideas in which truth will ultimately prevail, rather than to countenance monopolization of that market, whether it be the Government itself or a private licensee [citations omitted]. "[S]peech concerning public affairs is more than self-expression; it is the essence of self-government." [Citations omitted]. It is the right of the public to receive suitable access to social, political, esthetic, moral, and other ideas and experiences which is crucial here. That right may not constitutionally be abridged either by Congress or by the FCC.

Except for the two rules on personal attacks and political editorial, the Commission has implemented the fairness doctrine by ad hoc rulings on complaints. These rulings have resulted at times in important policy declarations. The Cullman ruling,[19] for example, established that the broadcaster must present the other side free, if the American public would otherwise be left uninformed. Rather than discuss these many other important ad hoc rulings, I should like to submit for the record our Fairness Primer, which contains a compilation of the more important rulings up to 1964.[20]

There are advantages to acting only in concrete factual cases—the equivalent of the "case or controversy" requirement for the judiciary. Thus, this ad hoc way of proceeding should not be disparaged. But there are also disadvantages. In an ad hoc proceeding, we have before us only the few parties involved in the case, and we do not receive the comments of all persons interested in the underlying principle. Further, the problem may be treated only within its narrow adjudicatory context rather than on an over-all basis. The agency may thus not foresee the twists and turns of the road it is going down.

An administrative agency may therefore opt for an over-all view of a subject in a general rule making or inquiry. In the fairness area, we have just recently opted for such an inquiry [21]—the first since 1949.

Our reasons for initiating an inquiry into our fairness doctrine are stated in some detail in the Notice—a copy of which I also offer for the record. I will not go over all of them but rather will focus on the general concern of the inquiry. As I have already explained, the purpose of the doctrine is to promote robust debate, not stifle it. As stated by the Court of Appeals in a recent case,[22] "the fairness doctrine must be administered by the Commission to enhance, not inhibit, the rights secured by the First Amendment."

The critical issue of our inquiry is whether our administration of the doctrine, since its inception over two decades ago, has enhanced these rights, or whether we need to make minor or major revisions. Just as one example of the problems the Commission must resolve, I should like to call the Subcommittee's attention to the recent ESSO ruling [23] and particularly the concurring and dissenting statements. Again, I have copies for the Subcommittee's study.

These is no retreating from the fairness doctrine. The doctrine is the law and indeed may well be constitutionally required in light of the Red Lion holding. Rather, the Commission must consider and determine those policies and procedures under the fairness doctrine which effectively advance the First Amendment goal of robust, wide-open debate.

Other Commission policies in the field of broadcast journalism

Other important Commission policies directly concern broadcast journalism. First, there is the matter of deliberate distortion or staging of the news. I am not referring to mistakes, which, while regrettable, are bound to occur at times. I mean actions that are deliberate. Evidence that a licensee directed his newsman to slant the news would raise a grave issue as to the licensee's character qualifications.[24] Such an issue would have to be thoroughly explored by the Commission; and it would be contrary to the public interest for the Commission to renew the station's license until and unless the issue were resolved favorably to the licensee.

A charge of distortion or staging of the news raises a most important question: When should the Commission conduct an investigation or hold a hearing? For example, we may get a complaint of news distortion based on the claim that the facts of some matter are different from those presented over the air. We have absolutely refused to act there. Very simply stated, deliberate distortion cannot be established by determining what is "true" and then comparing it with what was broadcast. The Commission is not the national arbiter of "truth." Similarly, when a person quoted on a news program complains that he very clearly said something else, the Commission cannot investigate and weigh the credibility of the newsman and the interviewed party. We refer the matter to the licensee for its own investigation and appropriate handling.

Having now given you these two examples in which the Commission will not act, I should like to stress two points. First, I am not saying that the press is above criticism and critical analysis on how it fulfills its journalistic functions. On the contrary, the Commission has stressed that the press, like all other institutions—including of course Government—can benefit from critical analysis.

There is one other area which directly concerns broadcast programs dealing with controversial issues. We have at times received complaints that such programming has, for example, presented patently anti-Semitic material and requests that the Commission should take action against the licensee on the ground that the carriage of such material is inconsistent with the public interest standard. The lead case is Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith v. Radio Station KTYM.[26] In refusing to take action, the Commission stated that "its function is not to judge the merit, wisdom or accuracy of any broadcast discussion or commentary"[27] but rather to insure that reasonable opportunity is afforded for the presentation of contrasting viewpoints on controversial issues of public importance. The Commission further stated:[28]

> It is the judgment of the Commission, as it has been the judgment of those who drafted our Constitution and of the overwhelming majority of our legislators and judges over the years, that the public interest is best served by permitting the expression of any views that do not involve "a clear and present danger of serious substantive evil that rises far above public inconvenience, annoyance or unrest." I refer to the Court's recent decision in Democratic National Committee v. FCC.[35] The case concerns editorial advertising and the Court of Appeals decision postulates a First Amendment right of access by some individuals or groups to some time on broadcast stations. The opinion opens a host of issues, and we are considering requesting review by the Supreme Court.

I will stop here in my list. I hope that I have indicated that some of our policies in the broadcast field are in a state of flux. Our goal, however, is firm. We seek to promote robust debate to the end "that the American public must not be left uninformed."[36] We must reach this goal with procedures that do not interfere improperly with the freedom of broadcast journalism. That may be a difficult task, but we must meet it, if we are to discharge our responsibilities under the Communications Act.

Mr. BURCH. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator ERVIN. You say in your statement that government licensing of newspapers has been and continues to be abhorred in this Nation because the power to license carries with it the threat of government control of news. How can the government license broadcasters without raising exactly the same threat of government control of his news.

Mr. BURCH. I think, Mr. Chairman, the only answer I can give you to that is the one the Supreme Court has given, and that is, the first amendment applies differently to different media of expression. The government, in 1927 and again in 1934, decided that it would license broadcast facilities. And I think that is the basic distinction.

Senator ERVIN. You say, "Staging or slanting the news is flagrantly contrary to the public interest." How is it possible to give the government the authority to prevent the staging or slanting of the news without giving the government the power to censor it?

Mr. BURCH. Senator Ervin, I don't think anybody would disagree with the abstract proposition that slanting news is not in the highest standards of journalism and is not a good thing to do. What I said in my statement is that although we abhor slanting of the news, we do not attempt to verify the truth or falsity of the news, and do not constitute ourselves as national arbiters of the truth. I think the word is arbiters more than anything else.

[32] Applicability of the Fairness Doctrine to Cigarette Advertising, 9 FCC 2d 921 (1967).

[33] No. 24, 556 (D.C. Cir., August 16, 1971).

[34] Notice of Inquiry on the Handling of Public Issues under the Fairness Doctrine, supra note 21.

[35] No. 24, 537 (D.C. Cir., August 3, 1971).

[36] Green v. F.C.C., No. 24,470 (D.C. Cir., June 18, 1971) (emphasis added).

Senator Ervin. I have a little difficulty in comprehending the concept that you can determine whether the news is being slanted without determining the truth or falsity of what is being said.

Mr. Burch. I think in our statement, Senator, we made it quite clear that we do not attempt to determine whether news has been slanted unless we have extrinsic evidence that does not require us to determine the truth or falsity of the statement. If, for example, an employee of a broadcast station comes to the Commission and says, my boss, the licensee of station XYZ, ordered me to do a job on Senator Smith, in other words, to always present him in a good or bad light, whatever the case may be, we would then look into that allegation, not so much as to whether or not the statements about Senator Smith were true or false, but the fact is that a licensee of the Commission ordered a newsman to slant the news.

A second example: If in answer to a question, are you a Communist, I said no, and through an editing technique the answer to that question came out yes, and it was quite obvious by examination of extrinsic material that that was the case, we would probably take action.

Senator Ervin. You think that is essentially telling a falsehood?

Mr. Burch. Yes.

Senator Ervin. And in order to ascertain the truth, you have to determine if the charge is true.

I still have difficulty in understanding what——

Senator Hruska. Would the chairman yield on that?

Senator Ervin. If you can enlighten me I would appreciate it.

Senator Hruska. You speak in your statement of the deliberate distortion or staging of the news, and at another point of news distortion. You talk about balancing and also the danger of government intervention. Now, then, in line with the observation made by the Chairman on that point, what position did the FCC take regarding the "Pentagon" program, where certainly there seems to be, from the testimony we received the other day, a very, very bad case of almost outright falsity and distortion?

Mr. Burch. Senator Hruska, let me answer that in this way. First of all, I would like if I may to give you a copy of our decision on "The Selling of the Pentagon" for your information.

We received complaints on "The Selling of the Pentagon" from Chairman Hebert and Chairman Staggers of the House of Representatives. The complaints basically were two:

One, that a Colonel McNeil was photographed in such a way that it appeared he was making a statement when in fact he was reading a quotation from Souvanna Phouma.

The second objection was that a Mr. Hingan, who is in the Defense Department, was introduced. He was asked certain questions and he gave certain answers. But when the show was put on the air, the questions were the same, but the answers were a compilation of various answers that he had given to questions which had then been edited and tightened, so that he in effect appeared to give different answers to the questions than he had actually given. We did not have to conduct a hearing to find that out, we had excerpts which were admitted by both CBS and Mr. Hingan to be true which showed that to be a fact. We set all that out in our opinion. We stated in the case of Souvanna Phouma: That it was somewhat difficult, looking at the material, to tell whether he was quoting or whether it was his own information, and we said that whether or not it was a distortion was so close that we were not going to proceed further.

In the case of Mr. Hingan, we said that we felt that this raised a very fundamental question, because I think the average person, seeing a question and answer format on a television screen, assumes that the answer that is given is to the question that was asked. Nevertheless, we said that in this case we would not interfere because we felt that the interference of the government in that practice was really more dangerous than the practice itself. We did commend to the network self-action in cleaning up this procedure. As a matter of fact, since "The Selling of the Pentagon," Dr. Stanton has changed the rules of the road for CBS. And I don't think that that particular situation can exist again.

Now, if someone wants to characterize that as a deliberate distortion or a deliberate staging, that perhaps is their privilege. We did not go that far in our decision, and we did not choose to take further action.

Senator Hruska. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Incidentally, I would want the record to be clear that when I referred to the Pentagon situation I meant the CBS film on "The Selling of the Pentagon," not another incident involving that very ornamental structure across the river.

Mr. Burch. Yes, sir.

Senator Ervin. I had hoped that you could unscrew the unscrewable and enable me to understand the difference between passing on the truth and passing on whether the news is slanted.

Senator Hruska. Well, I passed that one over to the Chairman of the Commission, and he has cited the authority and the results of their investigation.

Mr. Burch. I think perhaps "The Selling of the Pentagon" is the classic case in which I tried to make the distinction. First of all, we did not have to ask anybody what Mr. Hingan actually said in his interview, we did not have to go out and hold a hearing, there was a transcript of that that was taken at the time he made the statement. We also had a transcript of that which was broadcast. And obviously there was a difference between those two things. Extrinsic evidence indicated that what he had said was not what was broadcast. We didn't have to go hold a hearing as to what he actually said. What he said and they said he said were something different. Nevertheless, despite that we did not interfere in that particular proceeding.

I hope that clears it up somewhat.

Senator Ervin. As I understand from your statement, you declined to take action with respect to "The Selling of the Pentagon" on the basic ground that for the government to undertake to determine what is truth would do more injury to the freedom of the press than attempting to set the record right in that particular case.

Mr. Burch. Yes, sir; that is exactly what we say.

Senator Ervin. That is what worries me. Being from a tobacco growing State and a cigarette manufacturing State, I think that is precisely what the FCC undertook to do and did do in respect to the application of the fairness doctrine in denying the cigarette manufacturer an opportunity to reply to spot announcements injurious to tobacco.

Mr. Burch. Senator, I think you are talking about perhaps the so-called second cigarette ruling.

Senator Ervin. Yes, I complained about it.

Mr. Burch. After the Congress had ordered cigarette commercials off the air, is that correct?

Senator Ervin. Yes. I complained of the action of Congress in the first place, and then I complained even more strenuously of the action of the FCC.

Mr. Burch. There is nothing I can say to you about the action of the Congress.

Senator Ervin. I can say it myself; I don't think it is within the constitutional power of Congress to forbid advertising of something which it is legal to sell to the general public.

Mr. Burch. Well, Senator, that question is being raised in a number of contexts now. There are those who would take all over the counter drug commercials off the air on the ground that they are questionable, too.

Senator Ervin. Well, it is illegal to sell drugs to the general public.

Mr. Burch. No, sir; I am talking about aspirin, and Anacin and Alka-Seltzer.

Senator Ervin. Aspirin?

Mr. Burch. Yes, sir. There is a school of opinion which would take that off the air on the ground that it helps with the drug problem.

Senator Ervin. I think if Congress can pass a law forbidding the advertising of one item, it can pass a law forbidding advertising of any other item.

Mr. Burch. I would like to, if I may——

Senator Ervin. And I think that Congress has no more right to usurp the function of answering Pontius Pilate's question, what is truth, than the FCC has.

Mr. Burch. Perhaps I could say just a word about our ruling which you criticize.

First of all, we did not say to the broadcasters that they could not allow the tobacco industries to put on prosmoking commercials or prosmoking discussion. First of all, we weren't asked that. The question we were asked was whether, after cigarette commercials went off the air, and they were no longer allowed, and a station chose to run a public health type commercial which knocked cigarettes, whether that raised a controversial issue. We held that based upon the actions of the Congress and the Surgeon General and HEW, that if a licensee decided that it was not controversial, we would not upset his judgment. Perhaps that is begging the question somewhat, Senator, but that is actually what we decided.

Senator Ervin. On page 15 you said:

> In addition we have applied the fairness doctrine to the advertisement of one product, cigarettes. In 1967 the Commission issued a ruling that required licensees carrying cigarette commercials to inform their listeners to some significant extent of the hazards of cigarette smoking. In doing so, the Commission stressed the unique nature of cigarettes as a health hazard authenticated by the Congress and other governmental entities.

I happen to know that there are many highly reputable physicians who state in a most unequivocal manner that there is no evidence which establishes a causal relationship between cigarette smoking and poor health. Yet the government took the position of what I call the political doctors, as distinguished from medical doctors, with the FCC saying in effect that Congress and these political doctors are in complete possession of all of the truth on the subject of cigarette smoking, and that those who disagree with them have none. Therefore, since all of the truth is possessed by one side in a very controversial subject, the truth cannot be contradicted on the broadcast media. If that is not government assuming the power to say what is truth on a controversial issue I don't know what it is.

Mr. BURCH. Senator, I would only offer you one analogy. Even in a capital case the government is only required to prove its case beyond a reasonable doubt. I doubt seriously that there is any subject on which every doctor in the United States would agree, including what time it is. On the other hand, I think that the record that the Commission had before it at the time did prove beyond a reasonable doubt that there were significant hazards that had been discussed. We did not say that cigarettes caused cancer, we said that there was a hazard of cigarettes causing cancer.

Senator ERVIN. There is a hazard to anything in life. Walking across the street is a hazard, but we can't stop crossing the street on that account. Eating Irish potatoes in too large quantities is a hazard, but I don't know anything in the fairness doctrine that keeps us from advertising Irish potatoes.

Mr. BURCH. Senator, there are many people who would like to see it extended.

Senator ERVIN. I can't escape the conclusion that both Congress and the FCC and the political doctors assumed authority to say what the truth is, and said that although smoking is a very controversial subject, anybody that disagrees with their version of what they claim to be the truth will be denied the right to use the airwaves. If the government can do that in the case of tobacco, it can do it in the case of anything else, and I think it is a very dangerous trend.

I don't believe argument can alter that fact. Every journey toward a given end starts with a single step, and I think this is the single step. I think if government assumes the right to say that a certain product, even though it is permitted to be sold, should not be mentioned on the air, then by the same reasoning they can apply the same action to any political candidate for example. And they may wind up doing that.

You make a very good case for the proposition that the government has to regulate the broadcast media. You state that government regulation is permissible because different standards are appropriate for different media of expression in light of their different natures. And the question is, if the people who own the postal system can subsidize the newspapers and magazines, and the government through building streets and highways in effect subsidize the newspaper delivery trucks, and it is understood that newspapers can enjoy certain subsidies and yet be free, why is it not true for the broadcast media? Is it because everyone recognizes at once that the newspapers are the press and the broadcast media are not?

Mr. BURCH. I don't think that is the case. I think the Supreme Court has stated that the word press, the generic phrase press applies to electronic journalism just as it does to the printed page. And I can't deny the attractiveness of those suggestions that you make that newspapers are subsidized, and magazines are subsidized, and airplanes are subsidized, and all the rest. The fact is, those arguments were made in Red Lion, they were made in the cigarette doctrine, and they have been made in a number of cases, and the courts simply have not felt that those arguments were persuasive enough. I don't know that I can add anything to the court's decision in this case.

Senator ERVIN. There certainly can be no doubt of the necessity for the Government to assign frequencies, otherwise the systems would be self-destructive insofar as electronic communications are concerned.

Mr. BURCH. That is true, Senator. But we could well have operated, for example, a sale of frequencies, we could have said, we are going to sell you channel 4 for $150 million or whatever, $50, I don't care. But Congress did not decide to do that, it decided to give licenses for a certain part of time, primarily, I believe, on the first amendment ground, otherwise people would be denied their right to know things.

Senator ERVIN. I notice that someone the other night on TV said that people should have a right to reply on electronic communications systems only if they paid for it. As I understand the fairness doctrine, it requires that where time is allocated to an individual who has been subjected to a personal attack, or where time is assigned to an individual or group to reply to an editorial, that time is allocated free.

Mr. BURCH. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. And considering the cost of electronic communications, wouldn't really be a denial of the First Amendment in respect to such communications systems to require the individual or the group that is given the right to reply to pay for the time?

Mr. BURCH. That was our holding in the Cullman case. In that case the problem arose over an extended series of programs called "The Lifeline" put on by Mr. Hunt. The argument was made that he presented one side of a controversial issue and that a person or group should be allowed to come on and present the other side. The station contended that "Lifeline" is sold time, and therefore we shouldn't have to give away time to answer time that is paid for. And the Commission knocked that argument down.

Now, that question has arisen most recently, I think, in the Friends of the Earth case which I mentioned to you earlier, in which the Court of Appeals held that advertising for leaded gasoline raises a fairness issue, and that the opponents of leaded gasoline must be given time, presumably free time, if there is no money available. And the difference in those two is that in the Cullman case you were talking about a program, a 15-minute discussion program, perhaps. In the Friends of the Earth case we are talking about a 30-second commercial. So if that goes to its ultimate conclusion we may get in the situation where you put on a commercial selling gasoline, and then you put on a 30-second commercial immediately behind it knocking gasoline, which is a peculiar way to run a commercial broadcasting system, I think you will agree.

Senator Ervin. As I understand your overall views, regulations other than those respecting the issuing of licenses, should be kept at a minimum.

Mr. Burch. Yes, sir.

Senator Ervin. Therefore, ordinarily the broadcasters should be allowed to select their own programs and broadcast the news that they select. It is only in very rare circumstances that the FCC, acting as an agency for the benefit of all the people, should step in the picture.

Mr. Burch. That is correct. And I might say that with very few exceptions we do that only on the complaint of agrieved persons.

Senator Ervin. About how often is a license revoked, or a renewal denied by the FCC?

Mr. Burch. Well, first of all, categorically, not very often. And secondly, for programing reasons, not very often at all. We did recently revoke a license for violation of the fairness doctrine, I think it was probably the first one that had ever been treated in such a manner. But the critics of the FCC will argue that we don't revoke enough licenses, that there is too much bad programing, and we should step in and take licenses away.

As you can undertsand, Senator, there is a very delicate balance that has to be maintained between section 326, which prohibits our censorship, and the public interest standard, which seems to say that we have an interest in programing. And it is frankly a very difficult tightrope to walk.

Senator Ervin. I take it that the FCC recognizes that if any great number of licenses are revoked, or it fails to renew a great number of licenses, that would have quite an inhibiting effect upon freedom of speech by the broadcast media.

Mr. Burch. It would not only have an effect on it, it would also have an obvious effect on the economic viability of the system. And we are concerned about that as well.

Senator Ervin. In addition, the FCC, as I understand it, recognizes that the interests of the country are best served by a free flow of information and the presentation of conflicting viewpoints, and for that reason it is reluctant to take action, except in extreme cases, which would have an effect of suppressing a free communication.

Mr. Burch. Yes, sir. We feel that the purpose of the First Amendment is to promote debate, not to inhibit it.

Senator Ervin. I imagine you receive much criticism. I received a letter yesterday from a constituent which said, nobody in his right mind would advocate suppressing free speech, but something certainly ought to be done about these lies and distortions.

Senator Hruska.

Senator Hruska. Mr. Burch, in his formal statement to the committee Dr. Stanton of CBS indicated that as a direct result of a Federal Communications Commission ruling—I believe it was in August, or sometime last year—his network dropped its so-called Loyal Opposition program format. To make the record complete, would you like to comment on that, or clarify his reference, and give some of your own views on that subject?

Mr. Burch. Yes. I think first of all it is not in the least true that the FCC caused the dropping of the "Loyal Opposition" program. Dr. Stanton can put that program on tomorrow if he likes, and the day after tomorrow, and the day after that. We have nothing to say about what programing he puts on or does not put on. All we held in that particular decision was that the format which was adopted did raise a fairness obligation, and that if he wanted to run it that way, namely, give the Democratic National Committee 30 minutes to use as it saw fit, not to answer any particular issue of controversial importance, but to use as it saw fit, that he must then make an appropriate offer to the Republican National Committee under the fairness doctrine. Now, had Dr. Stanton, for example, in the case in question, which you will recall took place shortly after the President had made a series of speeches on television concerning the war in Indochina, had he simply instructed the Democratic National Committee that, we have selected you, the loyal opposition, if that is the phrase, to present the other side of the Vietnam war issue, and you may do it any way you want. But that is the issue you will address; this case would never has arisen. The fact was, however, that Dr. Stanton told the Democratic National Committee, you simply have 30 minutes to use as you see fit. The argument was then made, and we think properly so, that the issue that was discussed in that program was not the Indochina war, but which party should govern, which is an entirely different issue than the Vietnam war. So I think even Dr. Stanton in his testimony before the Senate Commerce Committee admitted, in answer to a question about the "Loyal Opposition," after he had been shown that if it continued the way it had in the first show he would probably have to do something about it, because it had not lived up to its expectation, or words to that effect—I simply think Dr. Stanton is rather overstating his case considerably to suggest that we caused the show to be stopped.

Senator Hruska. Well, the text of his statement before this committee says in part:

> On the complaint of the Republican National Committee, however, the FCC held that the Republicans were entitled to reply to the Democratic broadcast—a reply, in other words, to a reply. Fourteen months later that issue was still in the courts and was argued, and so on.

What you are saying, if I understand you correctly, is that the Democratic broadcast was not a reply to the President, and therefore there was not a reply to a reply, it was a reply to some new matter and something different in scope and in substance than what the President has said, is that what your position is?

Mr. Burch. That was exactly the position we took. The program itself was about 25 minutes long, of which 2 minutes were devoted to Vietnam, and 23 minutes of the program were devoted to—I think I could best characterize it as perhaps which party should govern, would be the issue. It was followed, then, by fundraising commercials which had been purchased by the Democratic National Committee. And there is nothing wrong with that. But it did tend to indicate that this was perhaps not simply a reply on the Vietnam war, it was a raising of an issue of which party should govern.

And that is why we did not accept the argument of CBS that this was simply a reply to the President.

First of all, in a series of cases, one of which I was personally involved in in 1964, the Commission has held that no one has a right of reply to the President of the United States as such. In other words, if the President speaks, whether he be a Republican or Democrat, there is no person in the United States——

Senator Hruska. No other President.

Mr. Burch. There is no other President. The issues that the President discusses in his talk are subject to the fairness doctrine. And we leave it to the licensee to determine how he will present the other side, whether he will do it in a 30-minute talk show or in his news, and who he will select to make the response.

You will recall that at the same time we made the "Loyal Opposition" decision, Senator Hruska, we denied the complaint of 14 U.S. Senators who felt that they had a right to reply to the President on the grounds that they were the sponsors of the end the war amendment, and they should be the appropriate spokesmen. In the same paper we denied the request of 11 U.S. Senators who felt that they should reply to the 14 U.S. Senators. So the cast of characters was complex, and the facts were complex in that case. What we basically held was, one, no one has a right to reply to the President as a person. The issues that are raised by the President are subject to the fairness doctrine, and the licensee has discretion in deciding how he will handle those responses.

In the case of the "Loyal Opposition" series, we held that they could not be construed as a reply to the President, since the licensee who has the responsibility for administering the fairness doctrine had abdicated any responsibility for what was covered by the Democratic National Committee; they had no way of knowing what was even going to be on the show. So it was a little hard to show that they were complying with the fairness doctrine. So it was their obligation, not the Democratic National Committee's obligation.

Senator Hruska. In another part of his testimony Dr. Stanton made some quite severe allegations about the FCC's independence, and in fact its integrity. This is what he said, and I am quoting from the record:

> When you recognize the FCC as the controller of our license, it is human nature to believe that men serving on the Commission look to the second highest office in the land, that is to say, to the Vice President, to get a clue as to how they conduct themselves.

Would you like to comment on that, Mr. Burch?

Mr. Burch. Yes; I would like to comment on that.

Dr. Stanton has promulgated the so-called conspiracy theory ever since the Vice President made his original statement on the networks in November of 1969. It has become a bit of folklore now which is highly prized by some of the broadcasters. And it goes like this: The Vice President said something. Then the FCC will move in and do the dirty work by taking away licenses or whatever. The only thing wrong with the theory is that it is false, and Dr. Stanton knows that it is false. And he can cite absolutely no evidence of any action on the part of the FCC which coincides with that particular theory. It just does not happen. The only action we have taken as a matter of fact with regard to the Vice President's speech was to write a letter to Mrs. Paul—and I would like to enclose a copy of that for the record—in which we stated that the FCC cannot interfere in questions of bias or slanting of the news, and that it is no function of ours to determine whether there will be instant analysis or not. In other words, we simply checked out of that particular debate. And I really am a bit disgusted that Stanton keeps bringing up this conspiracy theory, because it simply will not wash. There is no conspiracy, and there is no fact to base a conspiracy on.

Senator HRUSKA. Recently I have read reviews and some excerpts from Edith Efron's book, The Newscasters. Do you believe that it is a fair analysis of the network news coverage in the area it seeks to deal with?

Mr. BURCH. Senator, I have made no analysis of Edith Efron's book. I was sent a copy by the publisher. I glanced through it. I don't know whether it is correct, incorrect, partially correct, or whatever.

I have also read Mr. Salant's response on behalf of CBS to that particular book. Neither do I know whether his response is correct or incorrect. Basically the issue is not one that we should get involved in.

I would only point out one thing in regard to that book, and that is that in "The Selling of the Pentagon" case we asked that broadcasters accept criticism, examine it, and if applicable, try to profit from it.

There does seem to be a certain natural reluctance on the part of a broadcaster, particularly involving news, to concede that there could be anything wrong about any presentation that they make. And the fact is, we think that books or attacks or criticism should be taken seriously, and not always simply washed away as the efforts of the radical right or the radical left or the radical whatever.

So I don't know if her book is right or wrong. I would hope, however, that if it is true, that the networks will profit from it. If it is false, I think they should and will say that it is false.

Senator HRUSKA. I take it, then, that your knowledge of the book itself is not sufficiently comprehensive and detailed to be able to form an opinion of your own at this time.

Mr. BURCH. No. And I think in candor, Senator, the book contains a lot of methodology—one of the questions about the book is the methodology which was used. And it would take a great deal of independent study for me or anyone else to verify or refute the charges that are made.

Senator HRUSKA.. Well, it is a provocative thing.

And it is my hope, Mr. Chairman, that sometime in due course the author of the book could occupy the chair that is now occupied by the Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission.

Senator ERVIN. I hope so.

Senator HRUSKA. And give us in words what she has given in print.

Senator ERVIN. Of course I will have to admit that I am inclined to think that people twist the news when they don't state it the same way that I would state it.

Senator HRUSKA. I had a professor in logic one time who said, I make it a point never to say that the other man used bad judgment. I simply say, it is a judgment which I would not have exercised. And he being a professor, we took a cue from that.

Senator ERVIN. I might state, I haven't read Miss Efron's book and I don't know what its contents are, so I am not referring to her book. I hope to read it soon. I would certainly join you in inviting her to come before the subcommittee and give her views on this whole subject.

Senator HRUSKA. To appear as a witness.

Senator ERVIN. Thank you, Mr. Burch.

Mr. BURCH. Thank you, Senator.

Senator ERVIN. Counsel, I think, has a question or two.

Mr. BASKIR. From page 11 on you were talking about deliberate distortion in the staging of the news as opposed to mistakes. Apparently you say that your examination of such a case would be limited to investigating a direct order to slant the news. Do I understand that correctly?

Mr. BURCH. Well, I think there were two instances that I mentioned. One would be an act of the licensee—not the newsman, we are not talking about the newsman now. We are talking about the man who owns the station and who is our licensee. Assuming that the newsman is in authority, we would look into a statement by that employe that he had been ordered to slant the news, or distort the news, or whatever, because we feel that that is a high crime under the Communications Act.

The second situation—and we use this example in "The Selling of the Pentagon"—is that if distortion could be shown by extrinsic evidence, that the answer yes was changed to the answer no—in other words, completely invalidating the question and answer—that we would move in on a case like that. We have never had a case like that, and I sort of doubt that we would ever get a case like that. But that is the outside extremity that we mentioned.

Mr. BASKIR. With respect to that second point, we had a witness who testified as follows with respect to "The Selling of the Pentagon," and I quote from his testimony:

> Everybody knew that it was a falsification. It was deceit and fraud, that was evident from the record, they admitted on the witness stand that this is what took place. There wasn't any denial that they consolidated the answers to these questions and they put answers to other questions over in front of other questions, and they said, this is the record. They falsified the record. And we say there is a serious question in the public interest as to whether or not radio and television can falsify a documentary where it is a question and answer documentary.

This witness, Congressman Springer, had no doubt in his mind, and apparently a majority of the subcommittee and the committee had no question in their minds that this was deceit, fraud, deliberate falsification. It was the kind of case that you suggested would be in the second category of cases that would warrant the FCC intervening. Of course, when the FCC took up the issue, the FCC decided it wasn't their kind of case. Doesn't this suggest that what is truth and falsity and what is distortion or not distortion, is really in the eye of the beholder. If Congressman Springer were Chairman, and the other members of the committee were on the Commission, it would have been distortion, but since you and the other members of the FCC were there it was not, and that is the standard—the objective standard?

Mr. BURCH. I think the simple answer to that is that I know of no principle or practice that one could use so that he could say, this is in fact truth and this is in fact false. Obviously any principle that must be applied depends in great measure on who is applying it as to what are the facts. In that particular case we cited all the evidence that Congressman Springer cited in our decision. We said that there was some jiggering with the questions, that different answers were put together for the questions, but that we did not feel that based on that type of a record that we would interfere further, simply because we felt that governmental interference was more dangerous than the practice which was evident in that case, a practice which I suspect will not occur again.

Mr. BASKIR. If the majority of the members of the Commission felt this was a fact situation that fit within your principle, you did have the power to take action. It happened to be that a majority of the members of the Commission felt differently from a majority of members of the committee. The question of power was not at issue.

Mr. BURCH. I think the question of power was implicit in the whole thing. I think we have the jurisdiction to entertain the complaint and take action on it. Because if you have jurisdiction you have the jurisdiction to be wrong as well as to be right. On the other hand, I think quite clearly at some stage of the proceedings—and I suspect at the very first sage—we would have been met with the First Amendment argument which would have had to be dealt with. And how that would have come out I very candidly do not know. We did not choose, frankly, to force that issue, because we did not feel that it was a case where there was that much interest in our action.

Mr. BASKIR. This case, I think, represents a situation which demonstrates that any time a standard of truth, falsity, distortion, slantedness, is at all within the jurisdiction of the Commission, you inevitably have a first amendment question. You have the power to be wrong as well as the power to be right, you have the power to determine whether there was slanting. You just choose not to exercise it, but it is there, and you could then determine that "The Selling of the Penagon" was fraud, was distortion, and indeed penalize the station for putting it on.

Mr. BURCH. Yes. I think there is no gainsaying the fact that I am not going to sit here and suggest to you that the first amendment absolutely limits us from doing anything in the news field. I think that there is no question but what the first amendment as applied to the broadcast journalist, as the Supreme Court points out, is applied in a different way, perhaps, than it is in a newspaper. I don't know of any way of avoiding that, Mr. Baskir. It seems to me that that is just one of the dilemmas that we have to live with. And I think you are going to have to resort to the reasonable man doctrine, and that hopefully reasonable men will deal with these problems in reasonable ways.

Quite obviously, because you have FCC, if you assume a corrupt or power-mad FCC, I assume that you could hypothecate a situation which would be very, very bad. The fact is that history does not indicate that that is the case.

As a matter of history, let me make a couple of points. I read Dr. Stanton's testimony and I read Mr. Goodman's testimony about the inhibiting effect the FCC has on their news judgments and what not. It is interesting that in the entire history of the FCC there have been only three cases that were decided adversely to the networks in the fairness field. One of them was the Vietnam war case which we discussed earlier, which applied to all three of the networks. The second one was the loyal opposition series which Senator Hruska mentioned which applied only to CBS and the other was a case involving Chet Huntley some time ago on radio. He made an allegation that some of the meat inspectors in the Department of Agriculture were on the take, and it was held that that raised a fairness question. That is the extent of the fairness cases which have ever been decided adversely to networks.

The other two cases that Dr. Stanton mentioned, one involving a complaint about bullfighting, and the other involving a complaint about legalized gambling in Miami, neither of those cases was even brought to the attention of the Commission. In the first case Dr Stanton made a complaint that it took so long for the FCC to rule on that particular case. That is quite true, because all we did was receive a complaint from a man or a group in Miami, Fla., in the case of gambling. They asked for some time to submit additional information, and they got it. The staff denied the fairness request out of hand. The complainant then came back and asked for review by the Commission. Under our procedure whenever that request is made it is granted. At that point CBS was asked to reply. And they made a very short response. And the Commission denied the complaint.

In the other case the station was complained against because it had held a very hard-hitting program on the eve of an election. And again at the staff level it was held that they violated the fairness doctrine. And Dr. Stanton raised a point with which I am very sympathetic, he said that the staff counted lines to determine whether the fairness doctrine had been followed. If you will read my concurring statement in the Esso case, I really am very disturbed about how you make these decisions, do you count lines, do you count minutes, how do you decide which is proper, which is anti, which is neutral? It is a very, very difficult problem.

But unlike a philosopher in this field, we have to act. If somebody makes a complaint to us, we can't simply send it back and say, you raise very difficult issues, and we don't care to deal with it. We have to act, and we have to act the best way we know how. And thus far we haven't found any way to do it. Hence our inquiry.

Mr. BASKIR. The response to the last point you made, and the response to your earlier point that so far there has not been a FCC which was power-hungry or corrupt, and that we have to rely upon men of good will in the FCC, is perhaps in the Constitution, and the first amendment with respect to newspapers. It says, in effect, we will leave it up to the newspapers, and we won't rely on benevolent men assuring that there is robust debate, or that there is fairness or balance. We just won't take the chance. So if we have no control and leave it up to the people who are running the media, the newspapers or broadcasting, in the end it will all wash out, and we don't have to worry about making sure that we will have Dean Burches on the committee and not the people that would feel opposite.

Mr. Burch. Of course, Mr. Baskir, you can make that same comment on the court, if you assume that you have nine radicals on the Supreme Court who do not believe in the Constitution, or whatever, you can frustrate the Constitution that way. Congress can frustrate it, if you have 100 members who do not believe in it.

Mr. Baskir. Certainly it does with respect to the executive and legislative branches in the absolute sense, it says that they shall not make a law restricting the freedom of speech and the press. Yet with respect to broadcasting it is difficult, in that you can regulate and control broadcasting as long as you do it in a benevolent way, which is not what the First Amendment says with respect to the freedom of the press.

Mr. Burch. Of course, radio was an unknown quantity at the time the First Amendment was put out. The First Amendment, I think, was couched in terms of print, it authorized a man to go out and prepare a tract and distribute it to his neighbors, and that sort of thing. Perhaps it is not a real distinction, but it is a distinction.

And second, the Congress went through a period of 7 years, from 1927 to 1934, at which point the Secretary of Commerce was authorized to give licenses, to allocate frequencies, but was not authorized to enforce any of the laws. Herbert Hoover went through that period. And then in 1934, they came up with the Communications Act. And it was quite clear that Congress at that time decided, based on its knowledge and experience during that previous period, that something more had to be done than simply policing the technical aspects of the allocation policy. Now, if it is contrary to the First Amendment, it has been contrary to the First Amendment since 1934. And yet the Supreme Court has ruled in numerous cases that it is not contrary to the first amendment.

Mr. Baskir. Of course the Supreme Court could be wrong, and it could decide 5 years from now or tomorrow morning that it had been wrong, as it seems to do almost everyday. But the question is not whether it had been decided correctly, the fact remains that it has been decided.

Mr. Burch. That gets us back to where we started. If you assume that nobody believes in the Constitution and nobody wants to enforce it, then we are in trouble.

Mr. Baskir. The question of loyal opposition seems to me to raise questions as to what is an issue, whether it is the Vietnam war or which party should govern. The FCC had to determine what the issue was in that case.

Mr. Burch. Yes, sir.

Mr. Baskir. Also it had to decide, assuming that the issue was raised, the proper party to reply. The cigarette case seems to decide that when there is a controversy——

Mr. Burch. If I might interrupt, we do not normally in fairness cases say who will reply. That is up to the licensee. There is another doctrine, so-called quasi-equal opportunity doctrine which applies to political parties. For example, if on October 31, 1972, one of the networks decided to give the Democratic National Committee 30 minutes to use as it sees fit, we have held in an advisory opinion which was rendered to Senator Pastore's office that the only way that that could be counterbalanced would be by an equivalent amount of time to its counterpart, the Republican National Committee. It would seem a little silly to say, well, that is fair, all you have to do is cover that on "Today" by talking to some members of the Vegetarian Party or whatever. We simply held in that one isolated case that we would say that the only appropriate spokesman is the Republican National Committee.

The same thing is true in editorializing. If you editorialize against a candidate the candidate is the one that should come in and protect himself. It is only reasonable.

Mr. Baskir. I was referring to a discussion with Senator Hruska as to who would reply to the President on Vietnam, and who would reply to those repliers. Eventually you might have at least 100 candidates, every member of the Senate, and I can think of quite a few more.

Mr. Burch. That is why we leave it up to the licensees.

Mr. Baskir. But you can also stand a certain amount of oversight over their decisions to make sure it is adequate, and you might change their decision.

Mr. Burch. Yes. But as I told you, the basic precept of the fairness doctrine is not what we would have done had we been running the network, but, was what was done reasonable.

Mr. Baskir. Then the Commission and the courts decide, or the courts tell the Commission, that there is or is not a controversy with respect to cigarettes, and once having decided that there is no controversy, there need not be time given for a reply——

Mr. Burch. I can't believe that any American, despite his feeling about the constitutionality of the cigarette ruling, could have argued that there wasn't any controversy about it. In certain things it is quite obvious. It seems to me that there was a controversy about cigarettes in 1969.

Mr. Baskir. I am talking about the recent decision that said rebuttal time did not have to be given.

Mr. Burch. What we said was that a licensee who determined that he would not give rebuttal time would not be upset by us.

Mr. Baskir. In other words, there is no violation of the fairness doctrine, is what you are saying.

Mr. Burch. You can put it that way.

Mr. Baskir. And what you are really saying is that there is no more controversy with respect to cigarettes.

Mr. Burch. Not on that phase of it.

Mr. Baskir. And the court of appeals agreed with you.

Mr. Burch. The Court of Appeals in the Fourth Circuit.

Mr. Baskir. If I came to you and said, with respect to a coffee ad, that I think that drinking coffee raises a public issue, you don't have to give me an advisory opinion. I think that very few people would really say that coffee drinking raises a controversial issue, and yet there is a whole group of people in the United States, the Mormons, who I understand think that drinking coffee and drinking tea is very detrimental to the health. There is almost nothing you can name that isn't controversial to somebody.

Mr. Burch. That is right.

Mr. Baskir. In other words an agency, be it a court or the FCC, is in a position to say what is controversial, or what is not. Let's take for example, smoking marijuana, apparently you can't have songs on the air which seem to encourage drug taking——

Mr. Burch. I will stop you on that point too later on, but go ahead.

Mr. Baskir. In effect, when you decide whether or not there is a controversy, you are really deciding which side gets to speak over the air, which issue are up for public debate and which are not, for at least this one media.

Mr. Burch. Well, it is one of those things. If somebody says that it is 12 o'clock, and somebody else says it is 2 o'clock, and there is a requirement in the law that that decision be decided, somebody has to decide it. And that somebody is us. And you can bring out a list of horrible—and I agree with you, there are some decisions that we make that no human being ought to be called upon to make. But we have to make them. That isn't something that I applaud as the greatest role in the world. But it is a role that somebody has to play.

Now, if the suggestion is that what we ought to do is dissolve the FCC and turn all the licensees loose and give them their frequencies forever, that is something the Congress is certainly free to do.

Mr. Baskir. What I am trying to explore is whether or not the First Amendment requires that the FCC be only a traffic cop and nothing more. That suggestion has been made before to the subcommittee, and I suspect in the second series of hearings will be made again. Other people will say, as Professor Barron does, exactly the opposite.

Mr. Burch. I think the three networks and 7,000 licensees would agree with you. There are very few courts that would agree with you. That is the difference.

Senator Ervin. After all, the First Amendment is designed to keep government from abridging the freedom of speech or freedom of the press. I would say, and I don't know whether it gives the FCC any consolation or not, that I agree with their position in respect to the Pentagon program. I can't imagine anything that would do more to inhibit a free press or free broadcasts than for a congressional committee to arrogate to itself the power to say whether some broadcaster exercised his freedom of speech in a manner that met with the committee's approval. I think that the FCC correctly appraised the situation when it said that it would be injurious for the Government to make an adjudication as to whether the freedom of broadcast had been exercised wisely or foolishly in that particular case; it was a very wise decision, because government abridgement in any way to the freedom of speech is what the First Amendment is designed to prevent. Abridgement can be by a congressional committee, as well as by a very unwise decision on the part of the FCC, if it should make any such unwise decision.

I want to thank you again for your appearance here. You have made a very significant contribution to the subcommittee's study, and your testimony and the observations you have made will be of great help to the subcommittee.

Mr. BURCH. Thank you, Senator.

Mr. BASKIR. Mr. Chairman, our next witness this morning is Mr. Nicholas Johnson, member of the Federal Communications Commission.

Senator ERVIN. I wish to welcome you to the subcommittee and to express to you our deep appreciation for your willingness to come and give us the benefit of your observation and experience in a field in which you have had much experience and in which you are very knowledgeable.

STATEMENT OF NICHOLAS JOHNSON, MEMBER, FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

Mr. JOHNSON. Thank you very much, Senator.

Mr. Chairman and Senator Hruska, I cannot overemphasize my commendation of you, and enthusiasm for the task you have undertaken.

Caught up in the day-to-day business of governing, it is all too easy for those of us in the legislative and executive branches of government, and the regulatory commissions, to lose sight of the bedrock foundations of the institutions we temporarily occupy.

Ours is an exciting experiment here in America. We believe that if an entire people are well educated and fully informed they will be able to govern themselves—to identify and analyze the issues, to articulate their desires, and to carry them to fulfillment.

That proposition is at once the most conservative, and the most radical, of our distinctively American articles of faith. It is sometimes hard for us to greet with enthusiasm someone else's freedom to express the thought that we hate. And yet that is what the first amendment is all about. For there is no need to protect one's right to utter the platitudes that are widely accepted.

It is little wonder that freedom of speech is often misunderstood, ignored or abused. But it is especially unfortunate that there is often an almost inverse relationship between power (office, wealth, education, social status) and a marrow-deep commitment to the logical extensions of democracy and free speech. One need only begin to list the examples to dramatize the point—the administration's intimidation of the media and suppression of dissent, the occasional arrogance of the wealthy and educated towards the views of the working class and poor, the impediments in North and South alike to the basic rights of registration and voting, and the energetic opposition of broadcasters to the airing of sentiments they would prefer to censor. The list could go on and on.

So in the midst of hearings on ABM's, SST's, Lockheed loans, and other programs of socialism for the rich, it is refreshing to see distinguished Senators—to borrow from the language of radio and television—pause for a word on behalf of the principle that makes it all possible.

In your opening statement, Mr. Chairman, you raised a number of specific issues: (1) The subpenaing of newsmen, their notes and filmed out-takes; (2) the government's efforts to enjoin publication of newspapers, and the intimidation of the broadcast media; (3) the use of false press credentials by government investigators, and (4) regulation of the broadcasting industry.

I have written at length on some of these issues—some would say at somewhat greater length than one ought to write. In any event, rather than take up your time merely repeating statements, I am attaching some, summarizing others, and merely listing some more. In addition to this opening statement I will, of course, be pleased to try to respond to whatever questions or comments you or Senator Hruska may have.

(1) On February 12, 1970, I addressed the Nieman Fellows of Washington, D.C. ["Subpenas, Out-takes, and Freedom of the Press: An Appeal to Media Management"] urging a constitutional theory that the threat of sanctions, such as subpenaing reporters, may stem the free flow of information and news to the public. At that time management was taking what I viewed as a relatively weak position in failing to stand up on behalf of the newsman. And I tried to encourage them to take a little stronger position in that regard. That speech is attached. I have also urged the FCC to refrain from asking for newsmen's notes and filmed out-takes on a number of occasions—such as the Democratic National Convention, "Hunger in America," and "Selling of the Pentagon" cases.

(2) This administration's intimidation of the print and broadcast media should be a matter of great concern to all Americans of both parties. The full force of the administration's power can only be appreciated, however, when one reviews the sweeping range of its efforts to bend the media to its will. I tried to provide some samples of this range in a paper prepared for the International Association of Political Consultants entitled "Government by Television." That paper, as published in the March 1971, isue of Earth magazine is attached

(3)The matter of police or government use of false press credentials has never—or only rarely and tangentially—arisen before the FCC.

(4) The matter of broadcast industry regulation is, I presume, the principal reason why you have asked FCC Chairman Dean Burch and me to appear before you. I will spell out some thoughts on these issues in a moment, but first let me summarize my position:

a. There are occasions when Chairman Burch and I disagree, but this is not one of them. I fully concur in his explanation of the Commission's view as to the background and need for the fairness doctrine.

b. I also agree with Fred Friendly, who testified before you on October 12, 1971, that:

> I perceive very little FCC meddling in newsroom activities. The chilling hand that concerns me far more is the corporate concern for maximizing profits.

That is an issue that I have addressed on a number of occasions. Two chapters of my book, How to Talk Back to Your Televisin Set (Atlantic-Little, Brown/Bantam, 1970) are relevant to this problem (Chapter 2, "The Media Barons" and Chapter 3, "The Silent Screen"). "The Silent Screen" is a listing of many of the kinds of subjects which are not able to find their way onto commercial television. I should note for the record that Mr. Richard Salant of CBS answered my charges of corporate censorship in an article in TV Guide, "He Has Exercised His Right—To Be Wrong," September 20, 1969. My reply is attached. It was delivered to the Radio and Television News Directors Association Conference on September 26, 1969: "Is There a Salant in the News?" It was printed in the RTNDA Bulletin. January 1970, and the Congressional Record, and that Congressional Record reprint of the speech is attached.

c. The problems of access to the mass media were ably discussed before your committee by, among others, Prof. Jerome Barron on September 30, 1971. His early views on this subject—Barron, "Access to the Press, A New First Amendment Right"; Barron, "Access, The Only Choice for the Media"—have already gone a long way to becoming law. You are by now very familiar with the Red Lion decision as well as the more recent Business Executives Move for Vietnam Peace v. FCC decided by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit this year. I have written of these issues in a number of dissenting opinions and a recent article, which I coauthored with a brilliant young lawyer and former legal assistant. Tracy Westen: N. Johnson & T. Westen, "A Twentieth-Century Soapbox: The Right to Purchase Radio and Television Time."

That is a summary. I have some comments here in the statement which I would be happy to go on with.

I want to begin by emphasizing once again that I join in most of Chairman Burch's statement to you. He has ably outlined the premises and issues underlying the fairness doctrine as it applies to broadcasting. I fully agree with him that the leading constitutional teaching on this question is to be found in the Red Lion decision.

There are a great many people who will applaud these hearings on so vital a subject. As a former law professor, and having only seen the press reports of your sessions, I very much look forward to seeing the full printed hearing record. It should become a bestseller at law schools and journalism schools throughout our Nation.

The importance of these hearings, not only for those who participate in them, but for the entire Nation, was underscored by some comments that Senator Goldwater made on the floor of the Senate in April of 1970. In discussing a public opinion poll that CBS "Sixty Minutes" had sponsored, he said:

> The findings of the poll were extremely interesting and, to quite an extent, disturbing and frightening. What it shows is that a rather large percentage of our people think that there are amendments incorporated in the Bill of Rights which should be repealed.

On freedom of the press the poll results showed:

> [W]ell over one-half of the people (54 percent) would not give everyone the right to criticize the government, if the criticism were thought to be damaging to our national interest; and, a comparable number (55 percent) feel newspapers, radio and television should not be permitted to report some stories considered by the government to be harmful to our national interest (wartime censorship was excluded in the question).

I would share Senator Goldwater's characterization of these results as disturbing and frightening. If we truly believe that freedom of speech and press are important constitutional liberties—important to the functioning of a representative democracy—then surely we should be concerned if the general populace finds them unnecessary. I am confident that most Americans would support the guarantees of freedom of speech and press—if the issues were ever presented and considered thoughtfully.

I hope that your hearings, and the dialogue they stimulate, will encourage this thoughtful consideration. Those of us who support these great freedoms, in government, in journalism and elsewhere, need to tell the American people by words and actions why these guarantees are important—not because they protect the right of businessmen to make money, or to pour abuse on someone, but because they protect the right of the American people to know. It is ironic that the media is now suffering, in part, because it has not done this educational job as well as it might have.

It is useful quickly to sketch how the system of broadcasting was established in this country, why the system of regulation was adopted, and why the fairness doctrine was devised.

The radio spectrum and the right to broadcast were considered by the Congress a national resource, owned by the people as a whole, in much the same way that the public lands out West are owned. In deciding how that national resource was to be used, a number of alternatives were considered. A governmental broadcasting system could have been established, on the model of the French system, or a more independent public corporation like the British Broadcasting Corp. Each special interest group could have been given its own station. But neither of these alternatives were chosen. Instead, this national resource was not given to private users, nor was it sold. Under the Communications Act of 1934, Congress determined that private licensees would be chosen by the FCC to operate stations as fiduciary trustees of the American people as a whole. Private profit would be permitted, but Congress clearly contemplated that nonremunerative programing would also be required. The public was thought to be entitled to a public service in exchange for the profitable use of its property. It is essential to grasp this idea of a fiduciary trust that underlies the scheme of broadcast regulation in this country. The act expressly spells out—the first section of the Communications Act dealing with broadcasting—that a broadcaster does not own a license in the way that a newspaper company owns its right to print.

I do not mean to suggest that the regulation of broadcasting could never involve the use of unconstitutional methods. It could. That has been the issue in a number of court decisions, including Red Lion—where the industry unsuccessfully argued the unconstitutionality of the fairness doctrine. One of the series of FCC decisions of which I am proudest is our steadfast refusal to discipline the networks in any way in response to charges of distortion in news and documentaries. These decisions, most of which have been unanimous, are something for which I have worked very hard within the Commission. Chairman Burch has noted most of them in his footnote 25, and the only one that I would add is the Commission's unanimous action on complaints regarding the networks' November 3, 1969, analysis of President Nixon's Vietnam speech. He later referred to that. It is a letter to Mrs. J. R. Paul, dated November 20, 1969.

I believe it would be unconstitutional for the FCC to engage in the task of validating the news performance of licensees. But I can't help but speculate what would have happened had the Pentagon Papers story been broken by a broadcaster. What would have been the governmental reaction? What would have been urged on the FCC? What would have been the FCC reaction? I would like to think the FCC would have affirmed the right of the broadcaster to broadcast any story and viewpoint he wished, subject only to the fairness doctrine. I would like to think the actions of the FCC would have been as sound as the view Justice Black expressed, quotation from which I have used to lead this testimony.

The discussion leads me to a fundamental issue. Why should the fairness doctrine, or for that matter, the provisions on equal time in political campaigns, apply to broadcasting when they do not apply to the print media? As Chairman Burch has pointed out to you, the right to broadcast is controlled by the Government, and is not available to all. Of couse, there are technological and economic barriers to entering any of the media. It is not easy to get in the newspaper business either. But there is no comparable governmental barrier in any other field. Moreover, as a 1964 note in the "Harvard Law Review" pointed out, there is also a distinction in the way in which newspapers and broadcast stations make decisions vital to the exercise of first amendment freedoms. The point, in summary, is that a broadcaster is trying to maximize his audience every minute of the broadcast day. A newspaper, by contrast, is trying to maximize his audience in part by appealing to special interest groups with special sections of his newspaper, so that there are some people who buy the newspaper just to read the comics or just to read the sports, or just to read the woman's page, or just to do the crossword puzzle, or whatever. And the newspaper publisher hopes that by gathering together a sufficient number of these special interest groups he can build a larger circulation.

Even after you exclude advertising, news and public affairs in broadcasting are not more than 10–15 percent of the programing. Broadcasting is basically an entertainment business. In newspapers the reverse is true.

Since Red Lion the courts have continued to stress that fairness and access may be constitutionally compelled. A second circuit case decided in May of this year has received less attention than I think it deserves. This involves our so-called prime time, cutting back on the network's programing of prime time. The argument was made that this was a constitutional abridgement of a station's right to run the network program. And the court—I quote from the opinion on page 12 of my statement—dismisses that argument. I will just quote from the final paragraph:

> To argue that the freedom of networks to distribute and licensees to select programming is limited by the prime time access rule, and that the First Amendment is thereby violated, is to reverse the mandated priorities which subordinate these interests to the public's right of access. The licensee is in many ways a 'trustee' for the public in the operation of his channel.

I think this is terribly important to note here, because this point is very often either ignored or misrepresented by the broadcasting establishment. It is very important to note that no broadcaster is denied by the fairness doctrine his right to put on any person or viewpoint he chooses. I understand that the Pentagon Papers story was presented to the networks and refused by them. If that is so, it was not the fairness doctrine that prevented their breaking this story. All the fairness doctrine requires is that diverse views are also presented on controversial issues of public importance. And I think it is terribly important to distinguish between a Government commanding someone in the media, broadcast or print, that he cannot put on a particular point of view and a rule that tells him that he must put on a particular point of view to balance up something he already has put on. It may be that either or both of those are desirable or undesirable policies, but they are in any event different policies, and they must be differently addressed.

The fairness doctrine keeps no ideas or voices from the audience —quite the contrary. Recently Dr. Clay Whitehead, Director of the President's Office of Telecommunications Policy, recommended the fairness doctrine be abandoned. Even he, however, recognized the need for a statutory right of access for pay to be applied to broadcasting. I do not believe he recommends such a statute to be applied to newspapers; and thus he also finds some relevant differences between newspapers and broadcastings.

Some suggest that entry into the newspaper business is just as economically and technologically difficult as entry into broadcasting, and therefore the same governmental standards on regulation should apply to broadcasting as they do to print. That view was demolished by the Red Lion decision, and simply will not withstand scrutiny. There is no right to start a broadcast station, absent governmental permission. No governmental license is required to publish or to write. There is nothing comparable to the growth of the underground press in broadcasting, and indeed there could not be. Nor, I might note, nothing comparable to the growth of suburban newspapers which have grown up around so many major markets in the United States in the last decade. Two fellows who tried now find themselves confronting indictment. Entry into broadcasting requires governmental permission to use a public resource, and this fact totally distinguishes broadcasting from newspapers. There was another case last year, Rosenbloom v. Metromedia, written by Mr. Justice Brennan, in which he is suggesting in footnote 15 a comparison between the Red Lion concept and the right of reply on libel that the first amendment grants to individuals.

It is not difficult to conceive what the result would be without a fairness doctrine. Broadcasters, acting as public trustees of a publicly owned resource, would be free to present only their viewpoint, or viewpoints they wished to present, and could censor out all others, as many of them are trying to do today, with moderate success, depending upon court actions. In a political campaign a broadcaster would be able to present and report only one candidate—his candidate—to the exclusion of all others. He could give free time only to one; or sell time at low rates to one and at exorbitant rates to the other. And there would be no recourse for those who were excluded.

If the broadcast campaign reform legislation becomes law, we will remove some of the equal time restrictions. But one of the reasons the Congress and the FCC have been willing to consider such a change has been the restraints of the fairness doctrine. I think the American people, through their elected representatives, have decided they want their public resource used fairly. I think it would be bad policy to do otherwise. And I believe the Constitution requires that this public resource be used fairly, with the public being afforded the guarantee to hear diverse viewpoints and information on controversial issues, without worrying whether an individual broadcaster may decide in his own discretion to give them that opportunity.

The fairness doctrine is not the only way to deal with this problem. The problem is that the power over the mass media in this country is concentrated in the three networks, and beyond that even in communities where there is competition, it is at least limited to a chosen few selected by the FCC.

The fairness doctrine is one way to guarantee that all points of view will get a hearing, that there will be robust, wide-open debate, and that viewpoints will not be excluded from the American people. But there are other systems which will help guarantee the public's right of access and right to know. Cable television, if it were a reality for the vast majority of the population, and if it included the opportunity for any citizen to get access to express his views, then the rights that the first amendment seeks to protect could very well be achieved in that way. And the guarantees of the fairness doctrine must be no less on cable television than they are in over-the-air broadcasts.

But I don't think broadcasters can have it both ways. Today they oppose the expansion of cable television as a threat to their right to make money from their control of access to the public. They oppose the public's efforts to gain access to their own stations. And at the same time they want us to do away with the fairness doctrine. Such a posture is not only internally inconsistent and unjust, it raises some very serious questions about the motives of the broadcasting establishment. I am not concerned that they oppose the fairness doctrine, I am concerned that they not only oppose the fairness doctrine but also cable television and access to cable, and also access to their own station, because it leaves them in the posture of suggesting that they do want to retain total control on the ideas and information reaching the American people, and they don't want to have any check upon that arbitrary power. Their position is simply intolerable; but they have urged it again and again before the Commission, the courts, and in Congress—so far, I am pleased to say, in largest measure unsuccessfully.

I would agree with Chairman Burch that we have not perfected the administration of the fairness doctrine. You have heard a lot of complaints, and you have raised some questions yourself. And I am sure you desire improved administration in many of these areas.

But frankly I think the broadcasters are crying wolf again. As Fred Friendly told you, it is not the FCC that is censoring broadcasting. The limited intervention of the FCC through the fairness doctrine is to insure that, after broadcasters have wielded their censor's knife the public at least gets the right to hear diverse and antagonistic viewpoints with regard to what is on the air. But all agree that the administration of the fairness doctrine can be improved. We have undertaken that task with our new hearing. And I think Chairman Burch is entitled to considerable commendation for turning us in that direction.

No; it is not the FCC or the fairness doctrine that stands in the way of the broadcaster's first amendment freedoms as a trustee for the public. It is the broadcaster himself who censors—censors in the name of saving money, censors in the name of currying favor with advertisers, politicians, or others whose predilections he would rather not offend. The fairness doctrine stands as a constitutionally required protection to the public. I am perfectly willing to consider alternatives that would retain this protection for the public, of the kind I have mentioned. But I am unwilling to give up the protection of the fairness doctrine without a substitution for it. I do not believe that Dr. Whitehead's proposals, as initially put forward, would retain the full protection the Constitution requires.

There is one other major subject that I would like to touch upon. There can be no doubt that broadcasting, and especially television, is an extremely important aspect of achieving and retaining high political office, and indeed in the resolution of political issues in this democracy. When we examine broadcasting and the First Amendment, we must inquire into broadcasting as it functions in our political life. Nor is it any criticism to observe that the role of the Presidency and the executive branch as become totally intertwined with a concern over the way that the media reports and comments on the political decisionmaking in our Nation. I have reviewed the recent history of this phenomenon in a speech and article written last December that I am offering for the record. But the basic conclusion I reach is that there is a tremendous imbalance in the ability of the President and the executive branch to gain access to the media unbalanced by opposing views. This imbalance is manifested in two ways. There is an imbalance for the President as the political leader of one party vis-a-vis the opposing parties who are out of power. And there is an imbalance between two supposedly coequal branches of Government—branches that are supposed to be equal—the executive and the Congress. I do not say that a President ought not to be able to speak to the American people when he feels it appropriate. Of course he should. But I do wonder about the justice of permitting the President to seize all three networks, as well as the radio networks, to force the American people to hear him to the exclusion of everything else at no cost to himself, when we then turn around and forbid 14 U.S. Senators to answer, at their expense, on one network.

During the past 3 years we have witnessed increasing proficiency in executive control of broadcasting. As Larry Michie put it in "Variety" last week:

> As has been the case since Vice President Spiro T. Agnew began criticizing the network news, the theory goes, the Administration has kicked broadcasting in the news department while patting them on the bottom line.

Eliminating the fairness doctrine will not make broadcasters any less vulnerable. We can only rely on the professionalism of the broadcasters, the protections of access and the fairness doctrine, and the good sense of the American people.

I would like to conclude by again telling you how important I believe these hearings are. There is no subject of more importance to the functioning of a free society. If you have questions, I will try to be as helpful as I can.

(Prepared statement follows:)

TESTIMONY OF COMMISSIONER NICHOLAS JOHNSON, FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION, BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS OF THE SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE, OCTOBER 20, 1971

There is no sanctuary in the First Amendment for unlimited private censorship in a medium not open to all. * * * It is the right of the viewers and listeners, not the right of the broadcasters, which is paramount.

—Justice Byron White,
for the Court in Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC (1969).

In the First Amendment the Founding Fathers gave the free press the protection it must have to fulfill its essential role in our democracy. The press was to serve the governed, not the governors. The Government's power to censor the press was abolished so that the press would remain forever free to censure the Government.

—the late Justice Hugo L. Black, concurring in New York Times vs. United States (1971).

Mr. Chairman, I cannot overemphasize my commendation of you, and enthusiasm for the task you have undertaken.

Caught up in the day-to-day business of governing, it is all too easy for those of us in the legislative and executive branches of government, and the regulatory commissions, to lose sight of the bedrock foundations of the institutions we temporarily occupy.

Ours is an exciting experiment here in America. We believe that if an entire people are well educated and fully informed they will be able to govern themselves—to identify and analyze the issues, to articulate their desires, and to carry them to fulfillment.

That proposition is at once the most conservative, and the most radical, of our distinctively American articles of faith. It is sometimes hard for us to greet with enthusasm someone else's freedom to express "the thought that we hate." And yet that is what the First Amendment is all about. For there is no need to protect one's right to utter the platitudes that are widely accepted.

It is little wonder that freedom of speech is often misunderstood, ignored or abused. But it is especially unfortunate that there is often an almost inverse relationship between power (office, wealth, education, social status) and a marrow-deep commitment to the logical extensions of democracy and free speech. One need only begin to list the examples to dramatize the point—the Administration's intimidation of the media and suppression of dissent, the occasional arrogance of the wealthy and educated towards the views of the working class and poor, the impediments in North and South alike to the basic rights of registration and voting, and the energetic opposition of broadcasters to the airing of sentiments they would prefer to censor. The list could go on and on.

So in the midst of hearings on ABMs, SSTs, Lockheed loans, and other programs of socialism for the rich, it is refreshing to see distinguished Senators —to borrow from the language of radio and television—pause for a word on behalf of the principle that makes it all possible.

In your opening statement, Mr. Chairman, you raised a number of specific issues: (1) the subpoenaing of newsmen, their notes and filmed "outtakes," (2) the government's efforts to enjoin publication of newspapers, and the intimidation of the broadcast media, (3) the use of false press credentials by government investigators, and (4) regulation of the broadcasting industry.

I have written at length on some of these issues. Rather than take up your time merely repeating statements, I am attaching some, summarizing others, and merely listing some more. In addition to this opening statement I will, of course, be pleased to try to respond to whatever questions or comments you may have.

(1) On February 12, 1970, I addressed the Nieman Fellows of Washington, D.C. ["Subpoenas, Outtakes, and Freedom of the Press: An Appeal to Media Management"] urging a constitutional theory that the threat of sanctions, such as subpoenaing reporters, "may stem the free flow of information and news to the public." That speech is attached. I have also urged the FCC to refrain from asking for newsmen's notes and filmed "outtakes" on a number of occasions—such as Democratic National Convention, 16 F.C.C.2d 650 (1969); Hunger in America, 20 F.C.C.2d 143 (1969); Selling of the Pentagon, 30 F.C.C.2d 150 (1971).

(2) This Administration's intimidation of the print and broadcast media should be a matter of great concern to all Americans of both parties. The full force of its power can only be appreciated, however, when one reviews the sweeping range of its efforts to bend the media to its will. I tried to provide some samples of this range in a paper prepared for the International Association of Political Consultants, entitled "Government by Television." That paper, as published in the March 1971 issue of Earth magazine is attached.

(3) The matter of police government use of false press credentials has never —or only rarely and tangentially—arisen before the FCC.

(4) The matter of broadcast industry regulation is, I presume, the principal reason why you have asked FCC Chairman Dean Burch and me to appear before you. I will spell out some thoughts in a moment, but first let me summarize my position.

a. There are occasions when Chairman Burch and I disagree, but this is not one of them. I fully concur in his explanation of the Commission's view as to the background and need for the Fairness Doctrine.

b. I also agree with Fred Friendly, who testified before you on October 12, 1971 that:

I perceive very little FCC meddling in newsroom activities. The chilling hand that concerns me far more is the corporate concern for maximizing profits.

Two chapters of my book, How to Talk Back to Your Television Set (Atlantic-Little, Brown/Bantam, 1970) are relevant to this problem. (Chapter 2, "The Media Barons" and Chapter 3, "The Silent Screen"). Mr. Richard Salant answered my charges of corporate censorship in an article in TV Guide, "He Has Exercised His Right—to Be Wrong," September 20, 1969. My reply is attached. It was delivered to the Radio and Television News Directors Association Conference on September 26, 1969, "Is There a Salant in the News?" It was printed in the RTNDA Bulletin, January 1970, and the Congressional Record, 115 Cong. Rec. E10178 (daily ed. Dec. 1, 1969). Other relevant dissenting opinions and statements are cited.

c. The problems of "access" to the mass media were ably discussed before your Committee by, among others, Professor Jerome Barron on September 30, 1971. His early views on this subject [Barron, "Access to the Press—A New First Amendment Right," 80 Harv. L. Rev. 1641 (1967); Barron, "Access—The Only Choice for the Media?" 48 Tex. L. Rev. 766 (1970)] have already gone a long way to becoming law. See, e.g., Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. F.C.C., 395 U.S. 367 (1969); Business Executives Move for Vietnam Peace v. F.C.C.,—— F.2d—— (D.C. Cir. 1971). I have written of these issues in a number of dissenting opinions, which are collected in the bibliography. A recent article, which I co-authored with a brilliant young lawyer and former legal assistant, Tracy Westen, is attached [N. Johnson & T. Westen, "A Twentieth-Century Soapbox: The Right to Purchase Radio and Television Time," 57 Va. L. Rev. 574 (1971).]

Let me begin my discussion by empasizing that I join in most of Chairman Burch's statement to you. He has ably outlined the premises and issues underlying the Fairness Doctrine as it applies to broadcasting. I fully agree with him that the leading constitutional teaching on this question is to be found in the Red Lion decision.

There are a great many people who will applaud these hearings on so vital a subject. As a former law professor, and having only seen the press reports of your sessions, I very much look forward to seeing the full printed hearing record. It should become a bestseller at law schools and journalism schools throughout our nation.

The importance of these hearings, not only for those who participate in them, but for the entire nation, was underscored by some comments that Senator Goldwater made on the floor of the Senate in April of 1970. In discussing a public opinion poll that CBS' "Sixty Minutes" had sponsored, he said:

> The findings of the poll were extremely interesting and, to quite an extent, disturbing and frightening. What it shows is that a rather large percentage of our people think that there are amendments incorporated in the Bill of Rights which should be repealed. 116 Cong. Rec. 13137–38 (April 27, 1970).

On freedom of the press the poll results showed:

> [W]ell over one-half of the people (54%) would not give everyone the right to criticize the government, if the criticism were thought to be damaging to our national interest; and, a comparable number (55%) feel newspapers, radio and television should not be permitted to report some stories considered by the government to be harmful to our national interest (wartime censorship was excluded in the question).

I would share Senator Goldwater's characterization of these results as "disturbing and frightening." If we truly believe that freedom of speech and press are important constitutional liberties—important to the functioning of a representative democracy—then surely we should be concerned if the general populace finds them unnecessary. I am confident that most Americans would support the guarantees of freedom of speech and press—if the issues were ever presented and considered thoughtfully.

I hope that your hearings, and the dialogue they stimulate, will encourage this thoughtful consideration. Those of us who support these great freedoms, in government, in journalism and elsewhere, need to tell the American people by words and actions why these guarantees are important—not because they protect the right of businessmen to make money, or to pour abuse on someone, but because they protect the right of the American people to know. It is ironic that the media is now suffering, in part, because it has not done this educational job as well as it might have.

It is useful quickly to sketch how the system of broadcasting was established in this country, why the system of regulation was adopted, and why the Fairness Doctrine was devised.

The radio spectrum and the right to broadcast were considered a national resource, owned by the people as a whole. In deciding how that national resource was to be used, a number of alternatives were considered. A governmental broadcasting system could have been established, on the model of the French ssytem, or a more independent public corporation like the British Broadcasting Corporation. Each special interest group could have been given its own station. Instead, this national resource was not given to private users, nor was it sold. Under the Communications Act of 1934, Congress determined that private licensees would be chosen by the FTCC to operate stations as fiduciary trustees of the American people as a whole. Private profit would be permitted, but Congress clearly contemplated that non-remunerative programming would also be required. The public was thought to be entitled to a public service in exchange for the profitable use of its property. It is essential to grasp this idea of a fiduciary trust that underlies the scheme of broadcast regulation in this country. The act expressly spells out that a broadcaster does not own a license in the way that a newspaper company owns its "right" to print.

I do not mean to suggest that the regulation of broadcasting could never involve the use of unconstitutional methods. That has been the issue in a number of court decisions, including Red Lion—Where the industry unsuccessfully argued the unconstitutionality of the Fairness Doctrine. One of the series of FCC decisions of which I am proudest is our steadfast refusal to discipline the networks in any way in response to charges of distortion in news and documentaries. These decisions, most of which have been unanimous, are something for which I have worked very hard within the Commission. Chairman Burch has noted most of them in his footnote 25, and the only one that I would add is the Commission's unanimous action on complaints regarding the networks' November 3, 1969 analysis of President Nixon's Vietnam speech. [Letter to Mrs. J. R. Paul, FCC Public Notice No. 41437 (Nov. 20, 1969).]

I believe it would be unconstitutional for the FCC to engage in the task of validating the news performance of licensees. But I can't help but speculate what would have happened had the Pentagon Papers story been broken by a broadcaster. What would have been the governmental reaction? What would have been urged on the FCC? What would have been the FCC reaction? I would like to think the FCC would have affirmed the right of the broadcaster to broadcast any story and viewpoint he wishes, subject only to the Fairness Doctrine. I would like to think the actions of the FCC would have been as sound as the view Justice Black expressed.

This discussion leads me to a fundamental issue. Why should the Fairness Doctrine, or for that matter, the provisions on equal time in political campaigns, apply to broadcasting when they do not apply to the print media? As Chairman Burch has pointed out to you, the right to broadcast is controlled by the government, and is not available to all. Of course, there are technological and economic barriers to entering any of the media. But there is no comparable governmental barrier in any other field. Moreover, as a 1964 note in the Harvard Law Review pointed out, there is also a distinction in the way in which newspapers and broadcast stations make decisions vital to the exercise of First Amendment freedoms:

> Perhaps the most satisfactory distinction lies in the nature of the two types of communication organs. Free competition in broadcasting would probably result in the presentation of only the most popular views and programs; newspapers, on the other hand, are sold as a unit rather than by time. There is far less economic impetus for publishers to maximize their audience for each page than there is for broadcasters to maximize their audience for each time period. Indeed, economic motivation might lead publishers to give space to less popular topics, since those who are specially interested in these areas will be encouraged to buy the entire publication. Thus, minority interests and the general public interest in the free exchange of information and ideas—protection of which underlie the first amendment—are fostered by FCC regulation.

Note, "Regulation of Program Content by the FCC," 77 Harv. L. Rev. 701, 714 (1964); and see Young, "Fairness Doctrine: Television As a Marketplace of Ideas," 45 New York Univ. L. Rev. 1222 (1970). Even after you exclude advertising, news and public affairs in broadcasting are not more than 10–15% of the programming. Broadcasting is basically an entertainment business. In newspapers the reverse is true.

Since Red Lion the courts have continued to stress that fairness and access may be constitutionally compelled. A Second Circuit case decided in May of this year has received less attention than I think it deserves. In 1970 the FCC decided that television stations of a certain class would be required to take one of their four prime time hours from a source other than the three major networks. This was a decision by a divided Commission, although those who dissented did so on policy grounds. On appeal, the argument was made that this decision was an unconstitutional abridgment of a station's right to program what it wished. Judge Hays, speaking for the court in Mt. Mansfield Television v. F.C.C. relied on Red Lion, and wrote:

> When viewed in the light of these principles, the prime time access rule, far from violating the First Amendment, appears to be a resonable step toward fulfillment of its fundamental precepts, for it is the stated purpose of that rule to encourage the "diversity of programs and development of diverse and antagonistic sources of program service" and to correct a situation where "only three organizations control access to the crucial prime time evening television schedule." The specific arguments raised by the petitions reflect basic misconceptions of that purpose and of the First Amendment principles outlined above.
> Thus, while the rule may well impose a very real restraint on licensees in that they will not be able to choose, for the specified time period, the programs they might wish, as a practical matter the rule is designed to open up the media to those whom the First Amendment primarily protects—the general public.
> To argue that the freedom of networks to distribute, and licensees to select programming is limited by the prime time access rule, and that the First Amendment is thereby violated, is to reverse the mandated priorities which subordinate these interests to the public's right of access. The licensee is in many ways a "trustee" for the public in the operation of his channel.

Judge Hays has provided us a very good statement of the purposes behind both the prime time access rule and the Fairness Doctrine.

Please note, because it is an essential that is often ignored or misrepresented, that no broadcaster is denied the right to put on any person or viewpoint that he wishes because of the Fairness Doctrine. I understand that the Pentagon Papers story was presented to the networks and refused. It was not the Fairness Doctrine that prevented their breaking it. The Fairness Doctrine only requires that diverse views are also presented on controversial issues of public importance. It guarantees the public's right to know. The Fairness Doctrine keeps no ideas or voices from the audience—quite the contrary.

Recently Dr. Clay Whitehead, Director of the President's Office of Telecommunications Policy, recommended the Fairness Doctrine be abandoned. Even he, however, recognized the need for a statutory right of access for pay to be applied to broadcasting. I do not believe he recommends such a statute to be applied to newspapers; and thus he also finds some relevant differences between newspapers and broadcasting.

Some suggest that entry into the newspaper business is just as economically and technologically difficult as entry into broadcasting, and therefore the same governmental standards on regulation should apply to broadcasting as they do to print. That view was demolished by the Red Lion decision, and simply will not withstand scrutiny. There is no right to start a broadcast station, absent governmental permission. No governmental license is required to publish or to write. There is nothing comparable to the growth of the underground press in broadcasting, and indeed there could not be. Two fellows who tried now find themselves confronting indictment. Entry into broadcasting requires governmental permission to use a public resource, and this fact totally distinguishes broadcasting from newspapers.

In a radio station libel case before the Supreme Court last term, Mr. Justice Brennan wrote for the Court:

> If the States fear that private citizens will not be able to respond adequately to publicity involving them, the solution lies in the direction of ensuring their ability to respond, rather than in stifling public discussion of matters of public concern.[15]
> One writer, in arguing that the First Amendment itself should be read to guarantee a right of access to the media not limited to a right to respond to defamatory falsehoods, has suggested several ways the law might encourage public discussion. Barron, "Access To the Press—A New First Amendment Right," 80 Harv. L. Rev. 1641, 1666–1678 (1967). It is important to recognize that the private individual often desires press exposure either for himself, his ideas or his causes. Constitutional adjudication must take into account the individual's interest in access to the press as well as the individual's interest in preserving his reputation, even though libel actions by their nature encourage a narrow view of the individual's interest since they focus only on situations where the individual has been harmed by undesired press attention. A constitutional rule that deters the press from covering the ideas or activities of the private individual thus conceives the individual's interest too narrowly.

Rosenbloom v. Metromedia, 403 U.S. 29, 47 (1970) (footnote in original).

It is not difficult to conceive what the result would be without a Fairness Doctrine. Broadcasters, acting as public trustees of a publicly owned resource, would be free to present only their viewpoint, or viewpoints they wished to present, and could censor out all others. In a political campaign a broadcaster would be able to present and report only one candidate—his candidate—to the exclusion of all others. He could give free time only to one; or sell time at low rates to one and at exorbitant rates to the other. And there would be no recourse for those who were excluded.

If the broadcast campaign reform legislation becomes law, we will remove some of the equal time restrictions. But one of the reasons the Congress and the FCC have been willing to consider such a change has been the restraints of the Fairness Doctrine. I think the American people, through their elected representatives, have decided they want their public resource used fairly. I think it would be bad policy to do otherwise. And I believe the Constitution requires that this public resource be used fairly, with the public being afforded the guarantee to hear diverse viewpoints and information on controversial issues, without worrying whether an individual broadcaster will give them that opportunity.

[15] Some States have adopted retraction statutes or right of reply statutes.  Cf. Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. F.C.C., 395 U.S. 367 (1969).

There are other systems which would help guarantee the public's right of access and right to know—rights protected by the First Amendment. If cable television were a reality for the vast majority of the population, and included the opportunity for any citizen to get access to express his views, for free or by paying a small sum, then rights the First Amendment seeks to protect could very well be achieved in an alternative way, and the guarantees of the Fairness Doctrine might be less necessary. But I don't think broadcasters can have it both ways. Today they oppose the expansion of cable television as a threat to their rights to make money from their control of access to the public. They oppose the public's efforts to gain access to their own stations. And at the same time they want us to do away with the fairness doctrine. Such a posture is not only internally inconsistent and unjust, it raises some very serious questions about the motives of the broadcasting establishment. Their position is simply intolerable; but they have urged it again and again before the Commission, the courts, and in Congress— so far, I am pleased to say, in largest measure unsuccessfully.

My affirmance of the Constitutional importance of the Fairness Doctrine does not mean that the Commission has perfected its administration. You have heard a lot of complaints, and have raised some questions. Frankly I think the broadcasters are crying "wolf" again. As Fred Friendly told you, it is not the FCC that is censoring broadcasting. The limited intervention of the FCC through the Fairness Doctrine is to insure that, after broadcasters have wielded their censor's knife the public at least gets the right to hear diverse and antagonistic viewpoints with regard to what is on the air. But all agree that the administration of the Fairness Doctrine can be improved. As the Chairman has told you, the FCC is presently undertaking that very task. What the Chairman has not told you is that he is the one who has exercised the leadership in getting this proceeding going.

No, it is not the FCC or the Fairness Doctrine that stands in the way of the broadcaster's First Amendment freedoms as a trustee for the public. It is the broadcaster himself who censors—censors in the name of saving money, censors in the name of currying favor with advertisers, politicians, or others whose predilections he would rather not offend. The Fairness Doctrine stands as a constitutionally required protection to the public. I am perfectly willing to consider alternatives that would retain this protection for the public, of the kind I have mentioned. But I am unwilling to give up the protection of the Fairness Doctrine without a substitution for it. I do not believe that Dr. Whitehead's proposals, as initally put forward, would retain the full protection the Constitution requires.

There is one other major subject that I would like to touch upon. There can be no doubt that broadcasting, and especially television, is an extremely important aspect of achieving and retaining high political office, and indeed in the resolution of political issues in this democracy. When we examine broadcasting and the First Amendment, we must inquire into broadcasting as it functions in our political life. Nor is it any criticism to observe that the role of the Presidency and the Executive Branch has become totally intertwined with a concern over the way that the media reports and comments on the political decisionmaking in our nation. I have reviewed the recent history of this phenomenon in a speech and article written last December that I am offering for the record. But the basic conclusion I reach is that there is a tremendous imbalance in the ability of the President and the Executive Branch to gain access to the media unbalanced by opposing views. This imbalance is manifested in two ways. There is an imbalance for the President as the political leader of one party vis-a-vis the opposing parties who are out of power. And there is an imbalance between two supposedly co-equal branches of government, the Executive and the Congress. I do not say that a President ought not to be able to speak to the American people when he feels it appropirate. But I do wonder about the justice of permitting the President to seize all three networks, as well as the radio networks, to force the American people to hear him to the exclusion of everything else at no cost to himself, when we then turn around and forbid 14 U.S. Senators to answer, at their expense, on one network.

During the past three years we have witnessed increasing proficiency in Executive control of broadcasting. As Larry Michie in Variety put it last week:

> As has been the case since Vice President Spiro T. Agnew began criticizing the network news, the theory goes, the Administration has kicked broadcasting in the news department while patting them on the bottom line.

Eliminating the Fairness Doctrine will not make broadcasters any less vulnerable. We can only rely on the professionalism of the broadcasters, the protections of access and the Fairness Doctrine, and the good sense of the American people.

I would like to conclude by again telling you how important I believe these hearings are. There is no subject of more importance to the functioning of a free society. If you have questions, I will try to be as helpful as I can.

Senator ERVIN. The subcommittee appreciates your commendation of its action in holding these hearings.

We have in the constitution of my State of North Carolina a provision which was written in 1776 to the effect that a frequent recurrence to fundamental principles is absolutely necessary for the preservation of liberty. If the history of the world teaches anything it teaches that liberty is always in jeopardy, and particularly so in times of national stress and strain. Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty and that is the price that we are going to have to pay if we are going to retain it. It is for those reasons that the subcommittee felt that it would be worthwile, in addition to considering the proposed legislation that is before us, to have just a recurrence of these basic liberties which are embodied in the first amendment. First Amendment freedoms are always in jeopardy. Those in power don't like things to be said about them that are uncomplimentary. They would like to curtail the freedom of speech and the freedom of the press, because of a very human instinct. When they don't like what somebody is saying, they would just want to silence them. The reason the First Amendment was set up, and I think you put your finger on the objective of the First Amendment, is to give the freedom of speech to everybody without distinction. I believe the courts have gone so far as to hold that it gives people freedom to advocate the overthrow of the Government even by unconstitutional means such as violence, as long as they stop there and do not advocate the action to carry out what they proclaim in this respect. If I construe your statement correctly, you have expressed the thesis that it is highly important in our system of government, in fact a necessity, to have an expression of diverse and antagonistic views on all subjects of public importance; that is the fundamental purpose of the first amendment.

So it behooves all of us to be sure that we respect the right of people to express thoughts which we hate. As has been exhibited by the licensing of publications in England, and also by the seditious libel law, Government would suppress freedom of speech unless constrained from so doing. So the first amendment was written to prevent the Government from abridging that right.

You point out, I think, in a very lucid manner that in the very nature of things there are some fundamental differences between the printed word and the broadcast word. In order to prevent electronic communications from making a bedlam where no voice could be heard, it is necessary for the Government to designate some agency of government to allocate frequencies among those who apply for them. And while anyone, theoretically at least, can start a newspaper, because of the limited number of frequencies with only a minimum number of persons being assigned broadcast frequencies, the Government, of necessity, must grant licenses to use the airwaves.

And you point out also that the theory underlying the law on this subject has been that the airwaves belong to the people, and were not given to the networks as their private property; the networks are permitted to use them, but they are permitted to use them on a fiduciary basis. I infer from your statement that you believe in permitting the networks to have complete freedom of expression of their viewpoints, subject only to the fairness doctrine, and you state, I think, that very succinctly on page 10.

Mr. Johnson. Yes, sir.

Senator Ervin. The fairness doctrine, you state in substance, was created to make certain that the American people would hear both sides of a highly controversial public question. For that reason, in your view, the fairness doctrine is not only perfectly consistent with the First Amendment freedom for the broadcasters to express their own viewpoints, or to broadcast any story that they wish, but that it is necessary to make the first amendment right of the people effective.

Mr. Johnson. Yes, sir.

Senator Ervin. I like to think that all news media are protected by the first amendment for a twofold purpose. In the first place, I think the founding fathers put the First Amendment in the Constitution for philosophical reasons, that they recognized that unless we had freedom of speech and freedom of the press the people of our Nation would be in danger of being subjected to tyranny of the mind. Furthermore, the institutions that have been created for the government of our country cannot possibly function in the absence of the highest possible degree of freedom of speech and freedom of the press, because the people cannot act intelligently unless they know the issues and have an opportunity to hear all sides and viewpoints on controversial questions.

Is that a fair summation.

Mr. Johnson. Yes, sir. I think you have demonstrated more comprehension of my statement, perhaps, than even I have.

Senator Ervin. Thank you. And of course since all of these things have to be operated by human beings, and have to be judged by human beings, there could be some imperfections in both operations and decisions respectively.

Mr. Johnson. Yes, sir.

Senator Ervin. But that is a risk that we have to take as the risk we have to take with respect to freedom of speech. Although it can occasionally cause trouble, it certainly frees us in the long run.

Senator Hruska. Mr. Johnson, I want to concur with the chairman of this subcommittee in his expression of appreciation for your appearance here and for your testimony.

Mr. Johnson. Thank you, Senator Hruska.

Senator Hruska. There is one place in your statement where you say that one of the series of FCC decisions of which I am proudest is our steadfast refusal to discipline the networks in any way in response to charges of distortion in news and documentaries.

Could you envision or conceive of any situation in which such distortion could be so flagrant and so extreme that the public interest would require the Federal Communications Commission intervention.

Mr. Johnson. Senator Hruska, I think I stand on Chairman Burch's statement on that. We are not in the truth-finding business. The Commission is concerned about the character qualifications of its licensees. Anyone would be disturbed by a management order to newsmen that the news be distorted or that inaccurate information be portrayed. But it has been the Commission's view—and I underscore the fact that it has been a unanimous view—on often highly charged partisan issues, such as the coverage of the democratic national convention, and the Vice President's criticism of the networks for their commentary on President Nixon's speech—it has been the consistent and the unanimous position of the Commission that we should not get into the business of making judgments about the way in which a news story is edited, or what facts are presented, or whether or not the story is true or what not, unless there is extrinsic evidence that there is deliberate effort on the part of management to distort.

There have been such instances in the past, some rather infamous cases, in which management has made it very clear that they want the news distorted. Chet Huntley blew the whistle on a broadcaster out on the West Coast when he was just an up-and-coming young newsman, where the owner of a station directed his newsmen to distort the news in a particular political campaign.

But barring that kind of a situation, I think it is good policy and law for the FCC to stay out of that level of detail, and we have done so.

Senator Hruska. At any rate, those situations which have come to your attention where the decisions have been to refuse to discipline, they have not partaken that type of conduct to which you refer as a possible basis for intervention or for discipline?

Mr. Johnson. That is correct. And here again, I would emphasize what Dean Burch said. You are ultimately, fortunately or unfortunately, dependent upon the quality of the appointments to the FCC. One can hope that you will have men there, and women, who are conscientious and have a sense of responsibility, and nonpartisanship, and commitment to the Constitution of the United States, and that they will carry out those commitments with intelligence and dedication to their daily task. And if they will, the system works pretty well. If they don't, we have some serious problems in our country. Which is one of the many reasons why we require the President to come over and get the advice and consent of the U.S. Senate on these appointments.

Senator Hruska. Thank you very much.

That is all I have, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Ervin. When you get into the area of communications there us always a great controversy about what is truth.

Mr. Johnson. Yes, sir.

Senator Ervin. It seems to me that you could say that the first amendment was written to make Americans politically, intellectually and spiritually free, and it is not a proper function of the Government to tell the American people what is the truth in any of these areas. It is the purpose of the First Amendment to give all Americans the right to discuss what they think is the truth in all of these areas.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. And so I commend your statement on page 9, where you made the statement that Senator Hruska called attention to, "one of the series of FCC decisions of which I am proudest is our steadfast refusal to discipline the networks in any way in response to charges of distortion in news and documentaries."

Wouldn't a different policy require the FCC to undertake the very difficult and impossible and forbidden task of saying what truth is?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, I think so.

I might add at this point, Mr. Clairman, that one of the issues we don't discuss too much in this country when we talk about first amendment freedoms, one I think is just absolutely crucial today, is the restraints on free speech that comes about through corporate power.

What the founding Fathers were concerned about was not just restraints on the opportunity for everyone to speak his mind that might be imposed by Government. They were concerned about restraints coming from any direction. At that time it seemed to everyone that the only really meaningful threat would be the Government. That is what they were used to in the 17th and 18th centuries. Today we see a far more serious threat in my judgment to free speech coming from large corporations and corporate power. There are restraints on free speech on the part of their employees—who happen to constitute an incredibly large proportion of the total American population—people who are essentially written out from under the protections of the First Amendment because their corporate supervisors say, "we don't want you speaking on issues that may be embarrassing to our company." There are also the restraints that come from corporations in terms of their control over progam content, either by direct order from advertisers or by an acquiescence on the part of networks to what they believe to be the desires of their advertisers.

There was a book published by John Cobley called "Black-listing" which you might want to examine. It describes in detail a very black period in the history of American broadcasting where broadcasters were dictated to by advertisers as to who could and could not appear on the airwaves.

I have made it a point during the last few years to get to Los Angeles from time to time and talk to some of the writers and producers and people out there who work in the television business. And they can tell you a set of horror stories to curl your hair about the limitations that are imposed upon them, the subjects they cannot discuss, the dramas they cannot write and put on television, the political satire that they are forbidden from doing.

Tommy Smothers in his experience with CBS told me that 75 percent of the programs that he produced for CBS had something or other censored out of them. The examples are legion. He couldn't put Dr. Spock on because he was a convicted felon, said CBS. He couldn't have Pete Seeger sing a song, "Waste Deep in the Big Muddy." Joan Baez couldn't dedicate a song to her husband because he was in jail.

And then we had a case last year of ABC sports which, in covering the Buffalo-Holy Cross game, refused to cover the half time because they were going to sing some songs about peace, and ABC thought that was a controversial subject that the people shouldn't be exposed to. And yet a couple of weeks later they trotted out the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff at the Army-Navy game ABC sports didn't find that controversial.

I have had some personal experience of my own in this regard. The most recent, that was reported in the New York Times, was an episode on the Merv Griffin show, an entire section where we were discussing the impact of advertising upon mental illness and the general health of the American people, and it was simply excised from the show in its entirety.

There are hundreds of examples of this. And I think in my own judgment this is a problem that is far more serious today, and one on which your committee might well want to get testimony from those most directly involved in Hollywood or in terms of the volumes that have been written in which these episodes have been documented. That is a far more serious problem, in my judgment, than any now imposed by Government. For someone who has not greeted Spiro Agnew's antics with enthusiasm, that is saying considerable on my part.

Senator ERVIN. I certainly do agree that the Government doesn't pose the only threat to freedom of speech. I think that some of the most powerful threats come from the area of advertisement.

Counsel?

Mr. BASKIR. Mr. Johnson, currently I understand WMAL in Washington is undertaking an editorial campaign entitled "Get the Guns off the Streets." Without asking for an ex cathedra judgment as to how the fairness doctrine applies, I would like to use that as an example for a few questions. Do you think you could give us a description of what is the minimum the fairness doctrine would require with respect to an editorial campaign of this magnitude.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, I suspect that again, without knowing the precise details here, and without obviously passing judgment on them, since I don't know them all, often stations will handle this by simply announcing at the end of the editorial that contrary views are not only welcome but are sought by the station.

Anything broadcast by the station is subject to the fairness doctrine. But the balance could be provided anywhere in its programming. It may have an interview program in which someone taking the opposite view of the station is interviewed in some Sunday afternoon talk show. It may have some items on its daily news program dealing with it. Or it may provide direct time, an equal amount of time for somebody to answer in that editorial slot.

Mr. BASKIR. This campaign apparently, as I saw in a newspaper story about it, is unique in its size and frequency and perhaps strength throughout broadcasting history. I am not in a position to judge that conclusion. But apparently it is continually on the air at all hours many, many time daily and they intend to continue it indefinitely.

Would the fairness doctrine require, let's say, equivalent or fair access in terms of the time and the magnitude for the presentation of opposing points of view?

Mr. JOHNSON. The short answer to that is yes. The longer answer is a little more complicated.

Mr. BASKIR. I am interested in the short answer.

Mr. JOHNSON. I don't have many of those.

Mr. BASKIR. On an issue like this why couldn't that be taken care of by the fact that certainly in Washington, as all over the country, gun control is quite obviously a controversial issue, and such an editorial campaign will undoubtedly provoke letters to editors, it may provoke other television and radio stations to take other points of view, and will provoke speeches by public officials in the Federal Government both in the Congress and the executive branch, and by local officials? The opposing point of view on this issue will be aired and when you look at the totality of how controversies are discussed in the public arena, this, rather than requiring WMAL to present the other side, will take care of the problem.

Mr. JOHNSON. You may be asking two questions. The first I have already addressed. That is to say, if the issue is widely debated in the Washington, D.C. area, one would presume that WMAL carried that debate as a part of its normal news coverage, and one could argue that therefore there was balance in its programming.

The second question you may be asking is why not permit a station to be as biased, propagadistic as it chooses—if I may state your case most strongly—because there are in Washington, D.C., an ample number of competing, newspapers, radio, and television stations, expressing viewpoints of one type or another. And my answer to that is the same that I gave to Senator Ervin, and that he stated more eloquently than I, that this is a limited media, and one in which the fairness doctrine should apply.

Mr. BASKIR. Let's take the implications of Government licenses and put that aside for a second and go to the substance of the argument with respect to the fairness doctrine and other kinds of Government regulations. On page 15, all of the criticisms you have with respect to the consequences of and the absence of the fairness doctrine apply in substance to newspapers; there are newspapers that follow their news page with the editorial judgment of the owners, that do distort, that do slant, there are indeed newspaper markets in which there is basically one newspaper—the voice of one group of persons, there are very bad newspapers in very many parts of the country. All of these criticisms that apply to broadcasting also apply to newspapers. It would seem to me that, once we have put aside the licensing difference because of the frequency scarcity, the logic of these arguments either says that the same controls apply to broadcasting as apply to newspapers, or the same lack of controls applying to newspapers should apply to broadcasters.

Mr. JOHNSON. But saying that we are going to put aside the matter of licensing is rather like saying, "once we put aside the reason for the distinction, there is no reason for the distinction." And I guess I would have to agree with that.

There are those who argue that the fairness doctrine, or some variant of it, ought to apply to newspapers. And indeed the doctrine of access has been applied in a smattering of cases to newspapers that have refused to accept, for example, newspaper ads with political content. So if you are asking whether or not there would be—in terms of desirable social policy—reasons for requiring more balance on the part of newspapers in their reporting, I think probably I would agree, yes, there may very well be good reasons for doing that. The reason we don't, however, is historical, it is technological, it is legal, and to some extent constitutional, and is involved in the licensing—the distinction when you ask that I set aside.

Mr. Baskir. There is a halfway point at which to stop, and that is to have the Government role only that of a traffic cop, leaving the rest of the issues to be decided the same way we have them decided or resolved in the area of newspapers, the free for all.

Mr. Johnson. A traffic cop?

Mr. Baskir. Just restricting the Government's role to being a traffic cop with respect to frequency allocations.

Mr. Johnson. What would a traffic cop do with frequencies?

Mr. Baskir. Make sure that people drive on one side of the road and don't hit each other. In other words, you have this frequency, that is yours to do with as you choose, and nobody can have that frequency.

Mr. Johnson. That is right. Congress could have taken that path in 1934. It chose not to do so.

Mr. Baskir. I wonder if you could discuss the problem of the drug lyric songs.

Mr. Johnson. One problem with the drug lyric songs is that they provide a little refutation to the chairman's suggestions that there was absolutely no evidence of a conspiracy between Agnew and the FCC. I have never charged a conspiracy that I am aware of. But it is true that shortly after Vice President Agnew discovered rock music, and found that he didn't like it, there was a meeting held at the White House, to which record company executives and broadcasters were invited, at which Dean Burch was present, in which they were all urged to please not play such music any more. And shortly following that the FCC issued its own ill-fated and now notorious order. And while the substance of it is now occasionally debated, it is now interpreted that rock music dealing with the subject of drugs should no longer be played on radio stations.

I had a slightly different view in that case, and I would be happy to supply that dissenting opinion as well as a speech on the subject, as reprinted by the New York Times, for the record should you wish it.

Mr. Baskir. The reason I raised this is that some people, at that time, came to the subcommittee staff office and objected on two grounds: First, that this was a violation of the First Amendment because it controlled a cultural expression; and second, that in perhaps a more political sense it was a violation of the First Amendment because the advocacy of taking drugs should be permitted if there are even just a few people that think that it should be permitted and public and social policy ought to be changed.

Mr. Johnson. I would agree with you on both counts, although I don't feel I need to reach the second in terms of the issues involved.

And I did in fact express views to that effect in the dissenting opinion at the time. It is a very dangerous business for the Government to involve itself in the creative content of speech. We don't even need to reach political speech, we don't even need to reach the second point about whether or not, there being some advocates of marihuana smoking in the country, they ought to be permitted the right to run commercial announcements encouraging pot smoking, because that issue was not before us.

The issue was whether or not a songwriter who is writing about what is going on in the country, and who believes the issue of marihuana smoking or hard drug usage is an issue in the country—and I gather even President Nixon and Vice President Agnew agree that it is—is dealing with that subject in an artistic format that should be heard. It seems to me obvious that the Government should not be in that business. And I am sorry to see my colleagues on the other side of the issue.

Senator Ervin. One fundamental distinction, it seems to me between broadcasting and the printed page—it is a legal distinction given by the laws of economics and not by Federal law, and may not be as much of an actual distinction, because we do have economic forces that, have given newspapers something in the nature of an option—is that in the case of licenses for broadcasters, the Government gives them something in the nature of a monopoly from which others are necessarily excluded. I would infer from your statement that the fairness doctrine is to insure that the purpose of the first amendment be carried out and that diverse views should be presented.

Mr. Johnson. That is right. Situations simply change. We are no longer living in an age when standing up at your town meeting and speaking your piece, or greeting your neighbors as they come out of church on the village square on Sunday morning, or putting up a few handbills around in the stores, is going to be an adequate way of communicating your views.

Today there is only really one lecture hall and theater and soap box, that makes any difference, and that is radio and television. And it is just simply—you simply cannot equate the ownership of a television station with the right to put up handbills, Once you get that kind of power you necessarily are in a business where you have got to make your facilities available to others.

How you do it? As I have said, it can be done in a lot of ways: Through access to cable, through access to over the air stations, or through the fairness doctrine. But when the broadcasters say that none of those alternatives are acceptable you simply must object.

Senator Ervin. I want to thank you for a very fine statement, which gives us not only the scientific but also the philosophical basis for the control that is exercised by the FCC of electronic communications system

Mr. Johnson. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Baskir. Mr. Chairman, our final witness this morning is Mr. Richard Barron, President of the North Carolina Association of Broadcasters.

STATEMENT OF RICHARD BARRON, PRESIDENT, NORTH CAROLINA ASSOCIATION OF BROADCASTERS; ACCOMPANIED BY WADE H. HARGROVE, GENERAL COUNSEL

Mr. Barron. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

With me is our general counsel, Mr. Hargrove.

Senator Ervin. I want to welcome you to the subcommittee and express our appreciation for your willingness to appear.

And also I want to take this occasion to commend the members of the North Carolina Association of Broadcasters, who to my observation have been extremely fair.

Mr. Barron. Thank you, sir.

I want to thank you for the opportunity you have extended to our association to appear and be heard. The association is comprised of some 200 radio and television broadcast stations in North Carolina and is the third largest State broadcast association in the nation.

I commend you, Senator Ervin, for your very incisive opening statement at the commencement of these hearings. I believe your statement has set a proper tenor for this inquiry and accurately reflects the recent distressing developments in the relationship between the government and the news media. We in the broadcasting industry are deeply troubled at these developments and are fearful of the implications they portend for the future of the first amendment and broadcast journalism in general. It is a time for sober reflection.

Perhaps no single development has caused more concern than recent expansions of the FCC's so-called fairness doctrine. It is to the practical day to day problems in this area that the thrust of my remarks will be directed.

While to the unwary the fairness doctrine might seem a perfectly simple and reasonable requirement, the evolutionary decisions of the FCC and the courts have spun a webb of supertechnical and seemingly contradictory legalistic concepts which boggle even the shrewdest of legal minds.

The recent extension of the doctrine to implicit matters contained in product advertising is an example. With every commercial announcement we broadcast now, there is the very real possibility that some group will go to the FCC with a demand for free time to oppose it. As the Chairman of the FCC recently observed, broadcasters will not be in business much longer if they must give away anticommercials to counterbalance commercials. Advertisers will simply go to other less regulated media.

An excellent article on this issue recently appeared in the Wall Street Journal. The article is brief, and if it has not already been introduced into the record of these hearings, I would offer it at this time for that purpose.

Senator Ervin. We would be glad to have that article. And it will be printed in the record immediately after your testimony.

Mr. Barron. Thank you, sir.

I sincerely believe that broadcasters on the whole strive to be fair in the presentation of controversial programing. But we have reached the point now where the instinctive first question asked by the average broadcaster each morning is not so much whether his programing for the day will be fair as the man on the street or members of his community would regard fairness but rather whether his programming might inadvertently run afoul of one of the many legal subtleties laid down by his government under the guise of fairness.

In today's climate the broadcaster keeps one eye on his programing and the other on his lawyer's telephone number. Large stations are in continuous communication with their lawyers about program decisions. Small stations simply cannot afford to pay for the kind of continuing legal counsel necessary to second guess the Commission and the courts on the latest technical interpretation of the fairness doctrine. So, rather than put his license and his livelihood on the line with every program, the broadcaster has been tempted to play it safe—to steer away from controversial programing. I do not believe, realistically, that he could be expected under these circumstances to do otherwise. However, as a result of a recent D.C. Court of Appeals decision, stations will now be compelled to sell time for controversial programing and many, I assure you, will find only too late that their good faith judgments failed to square with that of their government.

In preparation for this testimony, I have conferred with the managers and owners of some forty radio and television stations across North Carolina to solicit their views about, and problems with the fairness doctrine. Some of the stations were large, with staffs of 150 people—some were small, operating with only a handful of employees.

As president of this association I have at one time or another worked closely with most of these men. They are not hucksters. They are responsible, honorable, conscientious members of their community . . . men who are vitally interested in local public affairs and in the welfare of their communities.

A television station manager in one of North Carolina's largest cities told me:

> The fairness doctrine has a tendency to gag broadcasters. It was written with a noble purpose, but now with the nit picking and harassment we are getting from Washington, it is having a stifling effect on community oriented programming.

A radio station owner-operator in a small Piedmont Carolina city told me. "We just don't air anything controversial. We have to stay out of trouble. With today's interpretations of the fairness doctrine, and the legal fees we would incur, and the time and worry, we are forced, by economics, to play it safe." He continued, "I realize we might be derelict in our duty to the community, but we just don't have the time or the resources to fight."

Another radio owner-operator, this one in a small eastern Carolina community told me, "We have consciously avoided controversial programing, because there are time when we didn't know what we could or could not do. And why get burned by doing the wrong thing?"

A television station manager responded, "We run a nightly editorial and, happily, through these editorials, we have been able to bring much needed reforms to the attention of our community.

However, now that the fairness doctrine has been expaned so drastically, we have given serious consideration to taking the editorials off the air, because of the potential of so many splinter group requests for air time."

He said, "In airing something of a controversial nature, you never really know about the amount of free reply time you are going to have to give. It is not sufficient to cover two sides of an issue. We have to provide time to cover many sides no matter how ludicrous."

Another television manager in a large city said, "In order to try to keep abreast of all the rules and regulations and court decisions these days, I seem to stay on the phone constantly with our legal counsel in Washington. And, on many issues, the lawyers throw their hands up in bewilderment. Our legal fees, because of these matters, have doubled in the past 2 years. We live in the constant fear that one day we are going to be penalized for doing something wrong."

A radio station manager in a medium sized town in "Piedmont North Carolina" said that the recordkeeping is unreasonably burdensome and took an inordinate amount of time away from running his station. He said he felt he could provide a better service to his community if he were not required to devote so much time to the problem of keeping up with FCC and court rulings.

A television station manager in a medium sized city in eastern Carolina said that because of the extension of the fairness doctrine first to the advertising of cigarettes, then to powerful automobile engines, and now with its potential to include aspirin, cold remedies and other nonprescription drugs and a limitless number of other products and services, that he really fears for the future of this industry. He asked, "How can we possibly provide free time for all sides in all of the probable controversial categories and still generate sufficient revenue to provide quality news and public affairs programming?"

Mr. Chairman, so-called "public interest" groups all across the country are taking up the cry of the fairness doctrine, harassing stations and demanding under the threat of government action that their views be broadcast. We have created, in the words of one distinguished Washington observer, a brazen form of "private" censorship which even the Government would not dare undertake.

To illustrate, the following demand for broadcast time was recently made by one group on several North Carolina radio and television stations. I believe the demand misstates the law, but note that it arrogantly contends "overall" program balance is not enough —that spot announcements must be countered by antispot announcements.

> We hope you will want to run our material on its own merits; but we must, in any event, advise you that in the opinion of our attorneys you are obligated, under the fairness doctrine as set forth in recent decisions of the Federal Communications Commission and the Federal courts, to provides time for the broadcast of our side, equal to time provided for the council's side. If you carry the advertising council spots, you will have made spot announcement time available, free of charge, for the direct exposition of a viewpoint on an important public issue. In such circumstances, your legal obligation could not be absolved by reference to "overall balance" in your coverage of the issue. It is our counsel's judgment that opposing views would be entitled to "equal opportunities" within the meaning of section 315 of the Communications Act.

This is the road down which a Government-imposed doctrine of fairness has led us, and I feel sincerely that the country is not being well served by it. While intended to assure a diversity of view, the doctrine, in practice, has tended to choke them off. In an experiment in freedom, I urge you to consider a legislative repeal of the doctrine.

Thank you.

Senator Ervin. Senator Thurmond.

Senator Thurmond. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Barron, I just want to compliment you on a very fine statement.

Mr. Barron. Thank you, sir.

Senator Thurmond. Also I want to compliment you on having with you Mr. Wade Hargrove, whom I happen to know is a very able attorney and a very fine citizen.

Mr. Hargrove. Thank you.

Senator Ervin. Isn't one of the difficulties of Government regulation an inordinate tendency on the part of officials who regulate to overregulate? You agree, I take it, that the purpose of the free speech and free press provisions is the first amendment is to encourage the expression of views and the furnishing of information. And you say as a result of the demands that are made on television and radio broadcasters under the fairness doctrine there is a very strong tendency to curtail the expression of ideas and the expression of information on matters of great importance to the community in which these media operate.

Mr. Barron. Yes, sir. According to my unofficial informal survey, that is what has happened as a practical matter.

Senator Ervin. There is no doubt of the fact that the people who engage in this field every day have the best of opportunities to understand the implications of the Federal regulations, in other words, those whose oxes are gored are more likely to know about the goring and what the effect of the goring is.

Don't you think that one of the most powerful restraints upon any person who acts within the view of the public is the understanding of the people of their community? In other words, I believe that the most important asset that any business has, whether it is the broadcasting business, the retail business, or any other kind of business, is the goodwill of the customers.

Mr. Barron. Yes, sir.

Senator Ervin. And isn't the desire to have the goodwill of the people of the community served by the communications system a very powerful deterrent from conduct which is manifestly unfair, and a very strong incentive to engage in the kind of operations of business which will generate goodwill.

Mr. Barron. Well, I would heartily agree with that statement. Had you not made it I think I would have. I think that the great majority of broadcasters, at least in North Carolina—and I would have to extend this opinion to include the rest of the country—are conscientious, community minded businessmen. They know that it is good business to be concerned with the major issues which affect their respective communities. They know that this is the only way in which they can be accepted as businessmen and as conscientious citizens in their community. So therefore I would think that it would be certainly a logical extension of this that they would treat the major issues in their community fairly, regardless of whether or not there was such a thing as the fairness doctrine.

Senator ERVIN. One of the most important functions which any communications system can perform for the public is to educate the public on the needs of a community, and what needs to be done by way of a change in the system or adopting a new system with respect to governmental matters. That is one of the most important functions that can be discharged by any facet of the communications business, whether it is a newspaper, radio, or television; is it not?

Mr. BARRON. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. And, of course, most all matters that call for a change in what a community is doing governmentally are likely to be controversial, because there are always some people who adhere to the status quo, as well as those people who champion what is to be considered a reform. Under the fairness doctrine, if you are required to give every group who may have diverse views free use of the communications system, you are going to be in a right bad fix.

Mr. BARRON. Yes, sir. The thing that really concerns us—I would have to say that the country has been relatively well off with the fairness doctrine as it has been interpreted, I would not argue with that—but I think one of the most unfortunate recent developments has been the extension of the fairness doctrine to include product advertising. I could foresee where it would have the effect of destroying the system of commercial broadcasting as we know it today. I honestly don't know how we as commercial broadcasters could cope with this on a practical day-to-day basis.

I would not begin to have the answers.

Senator ERVIN. I have very strong convictions about this phase of it, because I don't think it is the business of the FCC or any other agency of Government to try to tell the American people what they should eat, what they should drink, or what they should wear, or how they should act insofar as their personal needs and desires are concerned. When the Government goes to extending the fairness doctrine to the question of advertising, I think it is assuming the right to say what truth is, and that is exactly the reason the first amendment was written, to keep government from ever assuming the power to try to tell the American people what the truth is in respect to political matters or in respect to intellectual matters or in respect to their daily lives. Counsel.

Mr. BASKIR. I would like to explore the fairness doctrine with you as I did with Mr. Johnson, but on another example.

Let's assume that instead of a long series of articles in the New York Times, the Washington Post and other newspapers, on the Pentagon papers, you are one of the stations in North Carolina who decides to have a whole series—let's say Sunday afternoons—on the Pentagon papers doing exactly what the New York Times did with the broadcasting format. I wonder what your understanding of the fairness doctrine would be with respect to such a series, let's say, of a dozen hour programs reported in a sense as the New York Times did the contents of the Pentagon papers.

Let me throw a new hypothetical question at you. Do you think that you would have to give access to the persons that were mentioned as having played certain kinds of roles in the Pentagon papers to let them respond to what their roles were thought to be? Do you think you would have to give time to pro and con theories as to how we got into the war and how we waged the war?

Do you think you would have to give, let's say, time to people in favor of and opposed to the war and of various ways to get into or get out of the war? And do you think you would have to give time to persons with different theories as to how we got into the war in the first place, as well as, I suppose, many other issues? How would you handle something like the Pentagon papers in the manner in which you think the fairness doctrine requires.

Mr. Barron. First of all, I think that it is good—here again this is the good judgment—I think it is a matter of good judgment, to air opposing views. And I think that the public wants to know the sides of an issue. I think a conscientious broadcaster in a community is doing justice not only to his community but to his station to air those sides.

Mr. Baskir. Isn't the difficulty with the Pentagon papers that you can't say there were two sides because there were many different facets to the Pentagon papers? There is quite a controversy as to what the Pentagon papers say or don't say; it is not a matter of, are you in favor of or against the Pentagon papers, like you can be in favor or against gun control. We don't know what the issues are, and I wonder how you would handle something like that.

Mr. Barron. Of course we would not have to give time to specific individuals unless they are personally attacked.

Mr. Baskir. For example since Mr. Bundy's role was discussed, he might claim it was a personal attack on him, because it did not show what this role actually was. Maybe you would have to give him time.

Mr. Barron. Let me give you my personal viewpoint as a broadcaster. Again, I have no quarrel with these things. I think if you are doing justice to your community and to an issue, whether or not the fairness doctrine is in existence, I think it is good information to the community; I think it exercises your role as a conscientious member of the community to get as many people on the air as you judge are necessary to talk about all sides of an issue.

Mr. Baskir. The fairness doctrine is a legal requirement superimposed over your journalistic judgment, and if you were to handle something like the Pentagon papers you might find that although your journalistic judgment was satisfied that you had handled it properly, the Government might decide that you hadn't handled it properly.

So you have to rely on more than just your journalistic judgment in a case like this; you have to anticipate, as you said in your statement, what the legal governmental judgment about fairness should be. It seems to me that in a situation like this which is not one dimensional, where you have all different classes of individuals attacked, it would be impossible to put on the Pentagon papers and be sure that you could handle it under a legally imposed fairness doctrine. You might find yourself taking up all of your broadcast time for a couple of months in making sure that you had taken care of every aspect of what the fairness doctrine as required by the FCC might require you to do.

And the simple solution to that is not to do it at all.

Mr. BARRON. I think we have a practical consideration here today say, for example, we do take up all our—not all of our broadcast time for a couple of months, but suppose we aired a series of public affairs programs over a period of a couple of months, one a week, or every 2 weeks, I think the programs would be successful only inasmuch as you continue to generate interest on the part of your viewers and listeners about the subject matter.

Now here again I realize that you get into various shadings and gray areas and black and white areas, and you say, what is the general interest? Is it a majority interest? Is it a minority interest? Where do you make a judgment? Where are you going to cut these programs off as being not interesting to the viewers and the listeners any more?

Senator ERVIN. You advocate the abolition of the fairness doctrine in its entirety?

Mr. BARRON. I would urge you to consider a legislative repeal of the doctrine. To restate my point, to repeat myself possibly, I think the country has been fairly well off under the fairness doctrine as it was originally interpreted. But the extension of it, the expansion of it is what bothers us very much. I favor "fairness," but I do not believe our Government imposed standard of fairness is working well. Perhaps it was inevitable that Government entanglement in this area would lead to the present state of chaos.

Senator ERVIN. That is one of the great dangers of regulation, we started out there is always a danger to overregulate, and you get so much red tape in regulation that you really tie up essential freedoms.

Mr. BARRON. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. I appreciate very much the very fine statement you have made.

Mr BARRON. Thank you for the privilege of being here.

Senator ERVIN. The subcommittee will stand in recess subject to the call of the Chair.

(Whereupon, at 12:50 p.m., the subcommittee was adjourned, subject to the call of the Chair.)

S. 1311—FREEDOM OF THE PRESS

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1972

U.S. SENATE,
OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to notice, at 10:45 a.m., in room 1202, New Senate Office Building, Senator Sam J. Ervin, Jr. (chairman of the subcommittee) presiding.

Present: Senators Ervin (presiding), and Kennedy.

Also present: Lawrence M. Baskir, chief counsel; and Bill Pursley, counsel.

Senator ERVIN. The subcommittee will come to order.

I want to apologize to everybody concerned for the delay. I attended a prayer breakfast at the White House and there was such a traffic jam up there, I had trouble getting away. Then I had to go and testify before another congressional committee.

I have an opening statement which I will not read. I will have it inserted in the record at this point.

(The statement referred to follows:)

Today the Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights resumes its hearings on the state of freedom of the press. This series of hearings, to continue on February 2, 8, and 17, follows eight days of Subcommittee hearings in September and October of 1971 on the same subject.

In the course of our previous hearings we have examined a number of current problems associated with the First Amendment's guarantee of freedom of the press. Among other matters, we have considered the increased government subpoenaing of newsmen, the government's attempt to enjoin several newspapers from publication of the so-called "Pentagon Papers," the controversy surrounding the CBS program "Selling of the Pentagon," alleged harassment by government of the "underground press," and the expanding scope of government regulation and control of the broadcast media. During this second series of hearings we will continue to focus on these subjects.

In addition, the Subcommittee for the first time will examine developments in "cable television" and public broadcasting with a view toward understanding their impact on First Amendment principles and government communications policy. These are important developments which will receive increasing attention in our country. Indeed, a special commission studying the future of cable television has said:

> "Cable technology, in combination with other allied technologies, seems to promise a communications revolution. There have been such revolutions before. Some 500 years ago the hand-written manuscript gave way to the printed book, and where earlier the store of man's knowledge and judgment and imagination had been available only to a few thousand of the wealthy or the learned it abruptly was laid bare to all who wished access to it. Some hundred years ago the first telephone wires were strung, and where earlier a man could readily make immediate contact with no more than those persons he chanced to find in his own neighborhood, quickly he > began to find the whole city, the whole nation and ultimately the whole world within the sound of this voice. The revolution now in sight may be nothing less than either of those. It may conceivably be even more." (Sloan Commission, p. 2)

Developments in technology, new concepts in the communication of ideas, and proposals for new government communication policies will be presented to the Subcommittee. By considering these matters in the context of First Amendment principles, I believe we can help assure that the purposes of the First Amendment—to secure the political, intellectual, and spiritual freedom of all Americans—will be better served.

Last fall the subcommittee heard a number of distinguished Americans express their doubts as to whether government any longer shares the faith of our Founding Fathers in the value of an unbridled, robust press free from government control and intimidation. They brought to our attention far too many instances in which government has appeared anxious to silence its critics by official sacntion or the threat of official sanction.

Of course there has always been a state of tension between government and the press. This is as it should be. This is what our Founding Fathers contemplated when they wrote the First Amendment. Government officials have every constitutional right to express criticism of newspaper stories and television reports which they believe to misrepresent the government's policies and intentions. Indeed, recent experience demonstrates that the freedoms protected by the First Amendment are fully appreciated and frequently availed of by this Administration's spokesmen. Our concern is not, nor should it be, with the exercise by government officials of their own First Amendment rights. Rather, our concern is directed to evidence that the government is not respectiful of the First Amendment rights of its critics. The press cannot perform its function as a watchdog for the public if government views it as an enemy of the public and acts accordingly.

Among other distinguished witnesses scheduled to testify during four days of hearings, we will hear from Mr. Andrew Heiskell, Chairman of the Board of Time-Life; Mr. Elie Abel, Dean of the Columbia University Graduate School of Journalism; Professor James Q. Wilson, Harvard University Political Science Professor and member of the Sloan Commission on Cable-TV; Mr. Clay Whitehead, Director of the Office of Telecommunications Policy; Miss Edith Efron, author of the vook The News Twisters; Mr. Bill Monroe of NBC News; and Mr. Norman Lear, writer for the popular television program, "All in the Family."

Our first witness today is Mr. Daniel Schorr, a news correspondent with the Columbia Broadcasting System. The Subcommittee invited Mr. Schorr to discuss reports of an FBI investigation of him conducted last year. Following press reports of this investigation, many Americans expressed their concern over the impact of this incident on freedom of the press. The Subcommittee itself has received a large number of inquiries and comments, about this matter. Consequently, I extended an invitation to Mr. Schorr and to two White House officials, Mr. Charles Colson and Mr. Frederic Malek—who reportedly authorized the investigation—to use these Subcommittee hearings as a forum for setting the record straight. Unfortunately, neither Mr. Colson nor Mr. Malek have agreed to testify. The only official Administration response to our Subcommittee inquiry of this matter, made by letter, has come from Mr. John W. Dean, III, Counsel to the President. By-passing a number of specific questions which I posed in my letter of inquiry of November 12, 1971, to the President, Mr. Dean wrote on behalf of the President:

> "This matter has been fully and carefully reviewed. There are no indications of any intent on the part of anyone on the White House staff to harass or intimidate Mr. Schorr by initiating an investigation into his background."

I have written letters of inquiry to Mr. J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation; Mr. Robert Hampton, Chairman of the Civil Service Commission; and Mr. William Ruckelshaus, Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency. From them I hope to learn what government positions were open at the time of the Schorr investigation, who ordered the investigation and when, what information the FBI was asked to obtain, to whom they were to report, and what has happened to information collected about Mr. Schorr. Mr. J. Edgar Hoover has written an immediate and most helpful response to my letter. I would like to insert Mr. Hoover's letter in the hearing record immediately following my statement.

I want to have faith that the Executive Branch is fully responsive to the Congress and the American people and that it is willing to tell the Congress and the people what they have a right to know about its actions and policies. But the White House's refusal to make available to this Subcommittee a single spokesman in the course of these hearings has caused me to question my own faith. Not only has the Subcommittee been unable to obtain testimony from a White House spokesman concerning the FBI investigation of Mr. Schorr, but it has been unable to obtain any other White House official to discuss generally the problems between the White House and the press. We invited Mr. Herb Klein, the President's Director of Communications, to testify in the first series of hearings. In turning down our invitation, Mr. Klein wrote, "I wish to advise you that, as a member of the immediate staff of the President, I must respectfully decline the invitation to testify."

This use of "executive privilege" is a great mystery to me. The Administration seems to be granting to itself an unprecedented privilege from setting forth for the public its policies and attitudes toward the First Amendment, the keystone of our freedom and our democracy. How can a government be responsive to the people if it will not answer the people's questions, explain its actions, and describe its policies to the only national body directly responsible to the people?

Despite the fact that we have been unable to explore fully the problems between the Administration and the press, I am confident that this second series of hearings, like the first, will result in a greater understanding of and appreciation for the freedoms protected by the First Amendment. I want to express my appreciation to the individuals and groups that have contributed greatly to the development of these hearings.

Senator ERVIN. Do you have a statement, Senator?

Senator KENNEDY. I want at the start of these hearings to recognize the very significant contribution that you have made and this subcommittee has made to the protection of the free speech and free press rights in this country. I think the work that was done by this subcommittee, and you in particular, in the area of military surveillance will be recorded as some of the most effective work done by any congressional committee to protect the civil liberties of American citizens. I think it is entirely appropriate that these hearings be held at a time when, over the period of the last 3 years, we have seen the heavy hand of Government and its use against the press of this Nation and the television networks; the attacks that have been made by the Vice President against the networks and many of the major newspapers, the efforts which have been made to make newsmen involuntary agents by subpenaing them and subpenaing their notebooks, the efforts that were made to keep silent the pentagon papers, and now the very mysterious set of circumstances that have been raised surrounding Mr. Daniel Schorr and the activities of the FBI in investigating him.

I personally feel that the press and speech in this country are as threatened as at any time in the history of our Nation since the passage of the Alien and Sedition Laws. I feel that the work you have done in this area and the work of the subcommittee, is some of the most important work done by any congressional committee in the last few years. I just want to express great satisfaction that these hearings are being held and say thank you for the initiative you provide in this area.

Senator ERVIN. I want to thank you for your statement and say, on my own behalf, that whatever good the subcommittee has done in this field has been due in large measure to the fact that you have strongly supported this activity.

Will counsel call the first witness?

Mr. Baskir. Mr. Chairman, our first witness this morning is Mr. Daniel Schorr, news correspondent for CBS television.

Senator Ervin. I want to thank you for your acceptance of the invitation extended to you by the subcommittee. I think your appearance here will either help clarify the state of confusion that exists, or make the state of confusion—in light of the newspaper article or evidence supplied by the White House—more dense, I do not know which.

STATEMENT OF DANIEL SCHORR, NEWS CORRESPONDENT, CBS

Mr. Schorr. Mr. Chairman, thank you. I doubt that what I say will totally clarify events, many of which still remain a mystery to me. But whatever help I can be, I am delighted, because I share your concern and the concern of this subcommittee about relations between the Government and the press and people of the press in this country.

I am Daniel Schorr, resident of Washington, D.C., a correspondent of CBS News for the past 19 years, for many of those years a foreign correspondent in the Soviet Union, Poland, Germany, and elsewhere; for the past 6 years in Washington, where I also had previous assignments.

Mr. Chairman, you have invited me to testify concerning the FBI investigation of me and related matters. I am happy to respond, sharing your concern for the state of freedom in the press and the relationship between the Government and the press. I have not until today given any public recital of this singular episode because of a conviction that a reporter of events should try to avoid, if he can, becoming part of the events. But, in the interests of this subcommittee's inquiry, I shall be as helpful as I can. In a sense, it is somewhat embarrassing for me to be making my debut as a witness, because in some part, I feel we should be on the other side of those lights and not have to stand in front, but I think the episode has made it necessary. I would not myself have reported it on the radio or on television, but since it has become a subject of inquiry, I am glad to be here.

CBS has not been consulted about my testimony, and I speak entirely for myself. The facts are as I experienced them. The administration has at no time, until today, undertaken to give me any official explanation of its investigation.

On Friday, August 20, 1971, at about 10 a.m., an agent of the FBI appeared, without prior appointment, at the Washington office of CBS News, saying that he wished to interview me and my bureau chief, William Small, and to consult personnel files on me as part of an investigation undertaken, he said, because I was being considered for a high Government position.

Mr. Small declined to cooperate unless advised of the nature of the position, which the agent said he did not know. Interviewed separately, I replied to initial questions, but then declined further answers pending some indication of the position for which I was being investigated. The agent asked if I had any objection to pursuance of the investigation elsewhere, or of the FBI's pursuing the investigation elsewhere. I said, yes, I did object, because such an investigation could be a source of embarrassment and, at the very least, create the impression that I was considering a change of employment. The agent promised to report my observations to his superiors.

In fact, embarrassment for me had already begun. Early that morning the FBI Bureau in New York had telephoned the home of Richard N. Salant, president of CBS News, apologizing for the early call by speaking of a crash investigation that had to be completed by the following Monday. Other CBS executives were contacted during that day. I had some difficulty in allaying their concern that I was planning to leave CBS. They found it incredible—as did I—that a full field investigation should be in progress, connected with a possible appointment of which I had no inkling. My relations with CBS News are, happily, on the whole, rather stable. Otherwise, they could easily have been placed under a great strain.

From information volunteered to me by others who had been approached by the FBI, it appeared that agents interviewed or telephoned previous employers, various colleagues, including an NBC correspondent who served with me in Moscow; residential neighbors, one of whom reported what appeared to be surveillance of my home: and neighbors of my brother, Prof. Alvin L. Schorr, dean of the School of Social Work at New York University.

There was naturally intense speculation among all of us within CBS about the purpose of the investigation. Perhaps more trusting than most, I inclined to the belief that there is more bungling than conspiracy in Government, and that the investigation had perhaps preceded a job offer, which would eventually emerge. Others in CBS leaned more to a harassment theory because of the general climate of pressure on the broadcasting industry, the history of my relations with the administration, which I shall go into in a moment, and especially because of the timing of my investigation.

The administration and its supporters had, on several occasions, expressed displeasure over my reporting. Senator Dole had inserted a statement in the Congressional Record criticizing my reporting on nutrition matters. President Nixon had accused me, in speaking to a group of newspaper women, of "telling a little lie" because of a report indicating that the President had privately, at one point, expressed misgivings about the Safeguard ABM system. White House Press Secretary Ronald Ziegler had criticized me at briefings in printable language, and other White House officials had expressed themselves privately in less printable language. And on August 19, the day before the start of the FBI investigation, I was invited by the White House to a meeting with officials to hear objections to my report on the CBS Evening News the previous day raising doubts about the concrete effects of President Nixon's promise to assist the Catholic parochial schools in their financial plight.

To me it seemed highly doubtful that the administration would beef to me one day and set the FBI on me the next—if only because this would set some kind of bureaucratic speed record. But my belief that a job offer would surface in fact began to weaken with the passage of time. My informal inquiries of friends in Government produced no enlightenment. On October 8 on a social occasion, I asked Frederick V. Malek, White House specialist in recruiting, if he knew what kind of job the FBI had been investigating me for. Mr. Malek professed ignorance and surprise, promised to check and call me that next day. Mr. Malek never called.

By early November I was close to agreeing with the cynics in my organization that the investigation had not been benevolently intended. What else could an oft-criticized reporter believe about an ostensibly job-connected investigation that, 2 months later, had produced not the slightest whisper of a job offer, but only avowals of ignorance from the White House talent scout?

Then, amidst the mysterious silence about the investigation, the criticism was renewed. On November 4, Charles Colson, special counsel to the President, telephoned Dr. Frank Stanton, vice chairman of CBS, Inc., to object to a report I had made the previous day about conflict within the Pay Board. As I understand it, Dr. Stanton referred Mr. Colson to Mr. Salant, the President of CBS News. My own knowledge of the telephone call is sketchy because neither Dr. Stanton nor Mr. Salant has discussed it with me. I imagine they were seeking to insulate me from administration pressures. Gordon Manning, vice president of CBS News, did ask me for factual material to get in a position to reply to Mr. Colson's objections.

Now, let me tell you what I was thinking at that time. In such a situation, a reporter has a problem, or several problems. First of all, whether to disclose the FBI story. With the concurrence of my CBS News superiors, I decided not to because to my mind this was a "no win" situation. That is to say, to become the purveyor of news about my problems with the Government could only cast me in the role of an interested party and tarnish my journalistic neutrality. I thought one had to stick to the position that, no matter how emotional the administration was about me, I had to try to avoid becoming emotional about the administration because if the administration could push me into the role of its open antagonist, that would serve its purpose as well, or perhaps better, than intimidating me into pulling my punches.

This leads to the larger problem of how you conduct yourself as a reporter from then on; trying to make sure that you are still covering the administration on its news merits, not leaning backward, not leaning forward; trying to put out of your mind that CBS, however valiantly it seeks to protect you from intimidation, is itself under strong pressure, and the thought that you might be contributing to the woes of your employer. I tell you about these inner thought processes because I think it important for you, the subcommittee, to know some of the more subtle ways in which Government actions can affect the exercise of press freedoms.

Let me give you a concrete example of the problems created for me. On November 11, the story of the FBI investigation was published in the Washington Post by Ken W. Clauson, then a Post reporter. The White House offered public explanations, which I shall not go into because I was not present for any of them and they are available to you. The episode received widespread publicity, and I became somewhat better known as the guy investigated by the FBI than as a news professional, which bothered me some. You must understand that I never considered myself as having any problem with the FBI per se. I believed the FBI had acted quite properly, routinely and on instruction.

Early in December, I was asked, from within the CBS News organization, to investigate a tip that the President's Commission on Federal Statistics had completed its report, and that this report criticized the FBI's system of keeping crime statistics. We talked about it in CBS, because there was the possibility that the idea of this being done by a reporter who had been recently subjected to a FBI investigation and actually widely publicized, there would be snickers here and there. But we generally agreed that for me to steer clear of a story involving the FBI, simply because my name had been linked with the FBI, would depart from the "normalcy" we were determined to try to maintain. On December 9, I reported the story on the CBS Evening News. Subsequently, Tom Bishop, Assistant Director of the FBI, telephoned CBS News, suggesting that I bore some animus against the FBI and calling attention to a letter which, he said, the Chairman of the President's Commission had written to the New York Times criticizing my report as having been, among other things, prematurely released. As far as I know, no such letter has appeared in the Times, and I took the trouble yesterday to check with the Times and found that no such letter has appeared in the Times. How Mr. Bishop knew about a letter from the Chairman of the President's Commission on Crime Statistics and his motive for calling CBS News about this letter, these are matters for surmisal.

Those are the facts. Let me present a few purely personal observations about these matters.

The primary issue in the FBI of me is not whether or not a possible job offer lay behind it. You may have read in the Post today that an unnamed White House source is now telling the Post that there was a job considered, and the job involved being an assistant to Russell Train, Chairman of the Council on Environmental Quality, and might have had something to do with preparing television productions. It is news to me. I have had no word at any time from the administration on why there was this investigation, what the job was if there was a job, or any other communication from the administration. I find it rather weird, I must say, that in a matter of this sort, the White House, on the day before this hearing, chooses to speak through anonymous sources, apparently regarding this as a more sensitive matter than Mr. Kissinger's negotiations on Vietnam, for which he was permitted to surface himself and tell the story. But I would not presume to advise the White House on public relations.

But job or no job, the launching of such an investigation without consent demonstrates an insensitivity to personal rights. An FBI investigation, I can now tell you from experience, is not a neutral matter. It has an impact on one's life, possible impact on relations with employers, neighbors, friends, and colleagues. For me, the effects, though I do not wish to exaggerate them, persist still. I am still constantly everywhere in Washington and outside Washington asked whether my FBI shadow is with me, whether it is safe to talk to me on the telephone, whether I am still in trouble with the FBI. President Nixon is said to have issued instructions that, in the future, there will be no such investigations without advance consent of the person involved. But, in a system that relies more on laws than on men, I think most Americans would feel more comfortable if there were legal safeguards against such intrusion into their lives. That I say for all citizens.

The issue acquires a special dimension when a journalist is involved. I doubt that this episode would have received such attention if it had not happened to a television reporter, especially a television reporter who had previously drawn administration fire. I also do not believe it would have been such a big story had it not arisen in the context of other episodes of conflict between the Government and the press—the speeches of Vice President Agnew, the controversy over the publication of the Pentagon papers, the public discussion of Government credibility and news manipulation.

Against that background, what is important to the free functioning of the press is not only what the Government intends, but how its intentions are perceived by the news media and their working practitioners of the news media. Most of my colleagues believe that I was subjected to harassment, whether I was actually or not. Perhaps that general feeling, in the face of official denials, is itself a reflection of the current climate of suspicion and skepticism between press and Government. But the objective fact is that most of my colleagues found the "Schorr-FBI" story chilling.

Let me say that I do not think that many reporters will be directly intimidated. We are, on the whole, a pretty hardy lot. We generally cannot be deterred by Government, but only by our employers. And, it is our employers who feel the real pressure—especially in the regulated broadcast industry where networks can be subjected to pressure in many direct ways, and in some indirect ways through the affiliates which give the networks existence.

Anyone concerned about the freedom of the press must be concerned about the climate of suspicion, hostility, and nervousness that I think the administration has helped to create. Vice President Agnew says that we are not immune to criticism, and of course that is right. But then the administration will have to bear its responsibility for how far it goes in its criticism, and by what means. If the administration was misunderstood about the FBI investigation of me, it was because of so much that had gone before.

As for me, I should like to think that I have not been affected by the whole episode. The insidious thing about it is that I do not know what subtle effects it may have on me, or on my colleagues.

Thank you.

Senator ERVIN. When the matter became known to the subcommittee, the subcommittee sent letters to the White House and to the FBI asking for information about this matter. The subcommittee also requested the White House to permit the two gentlemen who were reputedly concerned with the affair to come down before the subcommittee to testify.

I received a letter from Mr. J. Edgar Hoover, dated January 27, 1972, in which he says:

> My dear Mr. Chairman:
> Reference is made to your letter dated January 24, 1972, regarding the investigation of Mr. Daniel Louis Schorr.
> Investigation of Mr. Schorr was requested on August 19, 1971, by a member of the White House staff, authorized to request federal personnel background investigations.

I digress to note that the committee has been given no information as to who this member of the White House staff was.

I think this is a very significant statement in Mr. Hoover's letter:

> The investigation was referred to our field offices, but no inquiries were conducted until the morning of August 20, 1971. Mr. Schorr was contacted at approximately 8:30 a.m. on August 20, 1971, to obtain appropriate background data. He was informed of the investigation and later that morning made background data available to us. At approximately 3:00 p.m. on the same day, we learned from officials of the Columbia Broadcasting System that Mr. Schorr desired the investigation to be discontinued. The investigation was discontinued at approximately that hour pursuant to instructions from the White House. Prior to the discontinuance of our investigation, 25 persons were interviewed concerning Mr. Schorr.
> This Bureau was not specifically requested by the White House to obtain any particular type of information during the investigation. The investigation was requested as a routine background investigation for possible federal appointment in which we make inquiries regarding a person's character, loyalty, general standing, and ability.
> The incomplete investigation of Mr. Schorr was entirely favorable concerning him and the results were furnished to the White House.
> Sincerely yours, J. Edgar Hoover.
> This Bureau was not specifically requested by the White House to obtain any particular type of information during the investigation.

I say that is a very significant statement because of my own experience on many occasions when I have been questioned by FBI agents concerning some individual under consideration for a Federal appointment. In every case in which the FBI has sought information from me, I have been advised not only of the name of the individual that they were seeking information about, but the office that the Government contemplates appointing him to. For that reason, I find great difficulty—although, as you say about yourself, I am a rather trusting individual—in believing that anybody at the White House or any member of the White House staff would initiate the FBI investigation with a view to determining one's qualifications for a job without ever first asking that individual whether he would accept the job if it was offered to him. Undoubtedly, it is a source of great embarrassment for a man to have 25 of his associates questions about him by the FBI, it would certainly be a source of great embarrassment to me. Despite the fact that most of the statutes of limitations have expired on most of my misdeeds, I would be very embarrassed by that and I can understand why you would have personal embarrassment about that.

Now, this subcommittee specifically requested the White House to permit Mr. Frederick V. Malek and Mr. Charles W. Colson to appear before the subcommittee and give us what information they could. The subcommittee has never heard from Mr Malek and Mr. Colson directly, but it has received this letter from Mr. John W. Dean III, counsel to the President, written on White House stationery. It says:

"Dear Senator Ervin:

"This is in response to your letter of December 3, 1971, to the President, Mr. Frederick V. Malek and Mr. Charles W. Colson concerning the investigation of Mr. Daniel Schorr. You have indicated in your letter to the President that your inquiry was prompted by concerns and suspicions which have arisen in connection with this matter and the need to put them to rest.

"We fully agree that any concerns and suspicions which have arisen must be eliminated and we have moved to do just that by publicly stating the precise reason the investigation of Mr. Schorr was conducted.

"Also upon reviewing this matter, the President has made it the policy of this administration that such preliminary job clearance investigations will not be initiated without prior notification to the person being investigated."

It is rather peculiar that so much of this administration has gone by before it arrived at that conclusion that that is a good rule to follow. But I am glad that at long last, it has agreed that it is going to use that commonsense approach to these matters in the future.

"Despite some inaccurate conjecture to the contrary, the facts in this situation are quite simple. Mr. Schorr was being considered for a post"—and they emphasize this—"that is presently filled and a routine job investigation was commenced without notifying Mr. Schorr. Mr. Malek's office was performing in his general area of talent searching in this matter. Mr. Colson's office was not involved in the matter at all. Given these facts, there is nothing more we believe can be added to clarify the situation.

"With respect to your request for the appearance of Mr. Malek and Mr. Colson before your subcommittee, it has been a matter of long-established principle and precedent that members of the President's immediate staff do not appear before congressional committees to testify in regard to the performance of their duties as members of the President's staff. This practice is indeed fundamental to the operation of our system of government. Therefore, I wish to advise you that Mr. Malek and Mr. Colson respectfully decline the invitation to testify."

So we got a letter in response to our request for witnesses, but when you search for truth, you are somewhat handicapped when the only information you can get is in the form of a letter because you cannot cross-examine a letter.

Now, cross-examination is a great weapon in the search for truth. When all you have is a letter, it can conceal more than it reveals. We are not told to this day who initiated this investigation, and until this morning, I never heard of anything that indicated what kind of a position you were allegedly under consideration for.

I have seen and heard you many times on TV, reporting news which affected the Government, and I am frank to state that I have always been impressed by your objectivity.

Mr. Schorr. Thank you.

Senator Ervin. Sometimes the news you reported was very prejudicial to the governmental activities that the news referred to, and sometimes the news you reported did not reflect too much credit on the governmental activities involved. I think that is true in reporting any news. But evidently from your statement, you did not enamor yourself to Mr. Colson, or some other members of the White House staff. It appears here that on several occasions, they protested—quite naturally, because none of us likes to hear unfavorable news about ourselves. I plead guilty to being one of those individuals, myself, so it is understandable to me.

But I think you have to draw one of two conclusions here; either the Government really had you under consideration for a high Government position, or they were trying to intimidate you or harass you. I do not see any other conclusion. If there was any other possible conclusion, we could have learned a little more about it if some witness had come down to testify and been subject to being questioned. That is rather necessary.

I remember an old story we lawyers used to tell about a man who ran into a train at a crossing on a dark night. The question was asked whether he was given any warning of the presence of the train on the crossing. This old night watchman testified very positively that he stood out beside the train and waved his lantern back and forth; but despite that fact, the driver of the car just crashed into the train. And the jury evidently believe the night watchman, because they returned a verdict in favor of the railroad.

After the verdict was returned, the railroad lawyer was complimenting the night watchman on his testimony and he said, "You were so cool and calm on the stand." And the night watchman said, "I might have appeared that way, but I was scared to death—scared all the time that they were going to ask me whether my lantern was lit."

So they sent us a letter and by sending the letter, they have us in a position where we cannot ask them whether the lantern was lit.

Now, there are some things that are interesting to me in this matter. One is that Mr. John W. Dean III, in a letter which was handed to me just a few days ago, said this:

"Mr. Schorr was being considered for a post that is presently filled." And I read to my consternation in the Washington Post this morning that some unknown person—maybe that John Doe the grand juries have been looking for so unsuccessfully all these years—had an interview with a reporter from the Washington Post and had this to say about the job that Mr. Dean said is presently filled:

"* * * but he said the job had not been filled."

If I had been White House counsel, I would have told the witnesses that they had better try to reconcile their testimony instead of making a contradictory statement of that kind.

Now, your statement is to the effect that after this matter arose and you got no enlightenment from any source about the job for which you were allegedly under consideration, on a social occasion, you asked Frederick V. Malek, White House specialist in recruiting, if he knew what kind of job the FBI had been investigating you for. Then you state that Mr. Malek professed ignorance and surprise, promised to check and call you the next day, and never called.

Now, in this same article of this interview by this undesignated White House official, it says this which is the latest on the subject from the White House: "The official told the Washington Post that Schorr's name was considered for the position by Frederick V. Malek, Chief White House Recruiter." Your statement says that Mr. Malek told you that he was ignorant about it at the time, and was surprised to hear about it.

Mr. SCHORR. I must, in justice to him, say that he has since that time given various newspaper interviews in which he has said that he wanted to let me down easy and he didn't want to tell me on that occasion that I had been considered and rejected.

Senator ERVIN. He wanted to let you down easy. In other words, his subsequent explanation was that he had been so reluctant to tell you the truth at the social occasion that he decided to tell it to you later and let you down easy?

Mr. SCHORR. Yes, but he did not tell me later, either.

Senator ERVIN. One thing about it, if he had been willing to come down here and testify, we could have asked him and given him the opportunity to elucidate on the situation and at least dissipate some of the confusion about whether he knew or did not know about it. I do not think that the White House would have fallen into ruins if he had come and given this information, which I think the subcommittee is entitled to. The subcommittee has found that so many Americans have come to fear the Government, because the Government is always snooping around and trying to investigate them. In the absence of any testimony I think I will just have to put these two letters in the record, and also this article from the Washington Post of today.

(The items referred to follow:)

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION,
Washington, D.C., January 27, 1972.

Hon. SAM J. ERVIN, Jr.,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights,
Committee on the Judiciary,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Reference is made to your letter dated January 24, 1972, regarding the investigation of Mr. Daniel Louis Schorr.

Investigation of Mr. Schorr was requested on August 19, 1971, by a member of the White House staff, authorized to request federal personnel background investigations. The investigation was referred to our field offices, but no inquiries were conducted until the morning of August 20, 1971. Mr. Schorr was contacted at approximately 8:30 a.m. on August 20, 1971, to obtain appropriate background data. He was informed of the investigation and later that morning made background data available to us. At approximately 3.00 p.m. on the same day, we learned from officials of the Columbia Broadcasting System that Mr. Schorr desired the investigation to be discontinued. The investigation was discontinued at approximately that hour pursuant to instructions from the White House. Prior to the discontinuance of our investigation, twenty-five persons were interviewed concerning Mr. Schorr.

This Bureau was not specifically requested by the White House to obtain any particular type of information during the investigation. The investigation was requested as a routine background investigation for possible federal appointment in which we make inquiries regarding a person's character, loyalty, general standing, and ability.

The incomplete investigation of Mr. Schorr was entirely favorable concerning him and the results were furnished to the White House.

Sincerely yours,

J. EDGAR HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D.C.

Hon. SAM J. ERVIN, Jr.,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR ERVIN: This is in response to your letters of December 3, 1971 to the President, Mr. Frederick V. Malek and Mr. Charles W. Colson concerning the investigation of Mr. Daniel Schorr.

You have indicated in your letter to the President that your inquiry is prompted by concerns and suspicions which have arisen in connection with this matter and the need to put them to rest. We fully agree that any concerns and suspicions which have arisen must be eliminated and we have moved to do just that by publicly stating the precise reason the investigation of Mr. Schorr was conducted. Also, upon reviewing this matter, the President has made it the policy of this Administration that such preliminary job clearance investigations will not be initiated without prior notification to the person being investigated.

Despite some inaccurate conjecture to the contrary, the facts in this situation are quite simple. Mr. Schorr was being considered for a post that is presently filled and a routine job investigation was commenced without notifying Mr. Schorr. Mr. Malek's office was performing in its general area of talent searching in this matter. Mr. Colson's office was not involved in the matter at all. Given these facts, there is nothing more we believe can be added to clarify the situation.

With respect to your request for the appearance of Mr. Malek and Mr. Colson before your Subcommittee, it has been a matter of long-established principle and precedent that members of the President's immediate staff do not appear before Congressional committees to testify in regard to the performance of their duties as members of the President's staff. This practice is, indeed, fundamental to the operation of our system of government.

Therefore, I wish to advise you that Mr. Malek and Mr. Colson respectfully decline the invitation to testify.

Sincerely,

JOHN W. DEAN III,
Counsel to the President.

WHITE HOUSE WEIGHED JOB FOR SCHORR

(By Carroll Kilpatrick)

A White House official said yesterday that CBS correspondent Daniel Schorr was under consideration last year to be assistant to the chairman of the Council on Environmental Quality.

The official told The Washington Post that Schorr's name was considered for the position by Frederic V. Malek, chief White House recruiter, and that his discussion of Schorr's name with aides triggered the FBI investigation of the correspondent.

Schorr is scheduled to testify today at the opening of hearings called by Sen. Sam. J. Ervin (D-N.C.) on press freedoms. Ervin is chairman of a Senate constitutional rights subcommittee.

Ervin charged last night that the White House has refused to permit any of its officials to testify at the hearings.

He said he had requested Malek, Special Counsel Charles Colson and Communications Director Herbert G. Klein to testify to set the record straight, but all declined.

Ervin said the only response was a letter from John W. Dean III, counsel to the President, who wrote, "This matter has been fully and carefully reviewed.

There are no indications of any intent on the part of anyone in the White House to harass or intimidate Mr. Schorr by initiating an investigation into his background."

Ervin also released a letter from FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover supporting the White House explanation that Schorr was considered for an administration job.

"My mind is open on whether there was a job," Schorr said yesterday when informed of the White House official's comment.

"That is not the issue. The issue is whether the administration should have the FBI investigate anyone not accused of a crime without his consent."

Schorr said he had heard nothing about a job offer or the nature of the job from the time the FBI first began investigating him last August to the present.

After the news broke that the correspondent was under investigation his name was dropped from consideration. Since then other well known TV newsmen have been interviewed in connection with the job, the official said. He declined to give their names, but he said the job had not been filled.

There are plans to undertake the project, whether under the direction of someone brought in from the outside or by someone already in the government, the official said.

The FBI investigation of Schorr brought accusations that the administration was seeking to intimidate Schorr, who had been critical of administration policy on a number of occasions.

Schorr had never been told he was under consideration for a job and had not sought one. He said in November when news of the investigation broke, that he did not believe there was a job to be offered.

"Out of curiosity, mostly, I have checked every source who might know without the slightest indication that I was ever considered for any post," he said in November.

White House press secretary Ronald L. Ziegler said at the time that the administration definitely had a job in mind for Schorr, but he declined to say what it was on the grounds it would make it more difficult to fill the post.

Ziegler did say that it was in the environmental area, and he promised to disclose the nature of the job later.

The official who gave The Post the information yesterday said Schorr had been considered because of his prominence and experience as a TV newsman and because he had done important work in the environmental area. Schorr's broadcasts have included reports on environment issues.

Malek knew that Schorr had been critical of the administration on occasion, the official said. But Malek was under instructions from President Nixon to find ways to encourage individuals to do more to help clean up the environment.

Malek and Russell E. Train, director of the Council on Environmental Quality, agreed that the best way to enlist public support for individual initiative in the environmental field was with a series of television programs, the official explained.

The President was not told that Schorr was being considered. When criticism developed over the FBI investigation, the President, according to Ziegler, directed that in the future no FBI investigations be started on a person being considered for a job without his knowledge.

Senator Ervin. I am sorry the subcommittee is left without evidence from anybody from the White House, because notwithstanding that I am a very trusting person and a very charitable minded person and do not like to draw wrong conclusions about any event. I am left with the opinion that there is either some stupidity in the way this matter was handled—that is, having the FBI investigate a man for a job of which he knows nothing—or a certain amount of duplicity. I hate to have to make a choice which requires me to draw one of two conclusions, either stupidity or duplicity. In the absence of a statement from the White House, I am left in a state where those are the only two possible choices I see.

Senator Kennedy?

Senator Kennedy. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Ervin. Before you begin, let me express to you, Mr. Schorr, our appreciation for your coming here, because I think that one unfortunate thing about government is that it sometimes yields to the temptation to try to intimidate citizens whose activities, whether they be reporting or some other activities, it does not fully appreciate. I think you have struck a blow by your appearance here for the right of reporters to be allowed to report news objectively without being embarrassed and intimidated by Government. I hope we will have less of this in the future than we have had in the very recent past.

It is particularly disturbing to me because the broadcast media sit at all times under the Damocles sword which is held by the FCC.

Please proceed, Senator.

Senator Kennedy. Thank you, Senator Ervin.

I, too, want to extend a word of welcome to you. Mr. Schorr. Senator Ervin, in his comment about observing you report on news matters over a considerable period of time, which all of use have—he stated quite well that he has always been impressed about your fairness and objectivity and the judiciousness with which you have handled that assignement, and I share, as well, that view. There are not too many times that Senator Ervin and I agree on various matters, but I think on this, we are in wholehearted agreement. I want to underline that comment that he made.

In trying to evaluate the two different alternatives that the chairman has presented, whether, in effect, this was an effort toward intimidation or a legitimate kind of job offer, I was reviewing your testimony. As I understand, in looking through it on page 2, there are approximately five different instances where either the White House or high Government officials or the President himself had criticized you. First of all, you mention Senator Dole had inserted a statement in the Congressional Record criticizing your reporting on nutrition matters. Then President Nixon had accused me of telling a little lie because of a report indicating that the President had privately, at one point, expressed misgivings about the Safeguard ABM system." White House Press Secretary Ron Zeigler "criticized me at briefings in printable language." And "other White House officials had expressed themselves privately in less printable terms."

Then, "On August 19, the day before the start of the FBI investigation. I was asked by the White House to a meeting with officials to hear objections to my report on the CBS Evening News the previous day." and so on.

Was it these kinds of obervations being made either by the chairman of the Republican National Committee or by the White House or by the President himself which added heavily to your own view that the idea that your were under consideration for a job was really highly speculative?

Mr. Schorr. Well. Senator. it did strike me as weird. in view of my relations with the administration. that they would consider me for job. I was willing to allow for the possibility. It would have been an extraordinarily openminded thing for them to have done.

Senator Kennedy. You mention as well in your testimony about the questions that were being asked neighbors of your brother in

New York and you talk about your own neighbors. Did you ever talk to them or did you get any kind of idea from them of the kinds of things that they were asking during that investigation? What sort of questions were they asking?

Mr. SCHORR. As far as I can ascertain, the questions that were being asked had no specific purpose other than to simply gather a great deal of information. They were the normal checklist questions that the FBI asks, simply finding out—in the case of the neighbors of my brother, one of the questions was, "Can you tell us the kind of people who come and go at your neighbor's house?" I must say that the neighbor of my brother was thrown into a state of shock by the visit from the FBI agent, because one of the spin-offs of this kind of thing is that everybody who was visited by the FBI thinks he is under investigation. One of the hard effects of this has been, I was told by a person recently appointed to high office by President Nixon, he told me that his appointment was delayed because his investigation had been retarded by people refusing to answer FBI questions about him, saying, you are not going to drag us into another Schorr affair. Then he had to call them with pleas, trying to get them to answer the questions, saying I am trying to get appointed to a job. So there are side effects by people themselves when they are investigated by the FBI.

To answer your question, as far as I know, there was nothing imporper about the questions, except that people just generally tend not to accept at face value the purpose of the question. People say, yes, I know they may be asking just what he did when he was here, who he sees, what time he gets up in the morning, but they may be looking for something else. There is such an atmosphere of distrust which surrounds the entire thing.

Senator KENNEDY. You have indicated in your testimony that there never was a time when anyone within the administration had spoken to you about being under consideration for a job. But was there any time, once this became public, that the FBI communicated with you to indicate that this had been a mistake or give you any kind of explanation of what they were doing or why they were investigating you or any kind of comment?

Mr. SCHORR. No, sir. There were a great many comments being made after the story broke in the Post. None of those comments were made to me.

Senator KENNEDY. They never communicated to you at all why they were made?

Mr. SCHORR. No, sir.

Senator KENNEDY. Tell me, are you now still covering the White House for the CBS?

Mr. SCHORR. I do not cover the White House as such. I have a rather broad assignment which is more based on situations than on any particular place. But to answer your question, I am not assigned to the White House.

Senator KENNEDY. Your range of interests would cover matters which would relate to the White House and White House activities, would they not?

Mr. SCHORR. Yes, sir.

Senator Kennedy. Since this became public, have you felt any difference toward you?

Mr. Schorr. Yes, all of it favorable. I sense a certain attempt by some people in the administration to lean backward in order to demonstrate to me that no one has anything against me.

Senator Kennedy. You mentioned in your testimony the importance of trying to provide some kind of safeguards for individual citizens who might very well be subjected to the same kind of harassment. I am wondering if you thought at all about that, the kinds of things that you think might be included in attempting to protect individuals so that they would not be subjected to the same kinds of intimidation?

Mr. Schorr. Senator, I have thought about it. I am not a lawyer or a legislator. I do not happen to speak in terms of legislation. But as I said in my statement, we rely more on laws than on men. If President Nixon can give instructions that in the future, no persons can be investigated without his consent, then it means it is possible for it to have happened in the past and it is possible for it to happen under some future President or under the same President when he changes his instructions. I believe that the law knows of suits by citizens when they are under investigation seeking to limit the investigation to the probable cause of it. I see no reason why legal language could not be written which would require that a citizen be safe from investigation unless there was a probable cause, or unless it has to do with a job in which he has been consulted and authorized the investigation.

Senator Kennedy. That would not appear to be a terribly complicated administrative decision to be set up, would it, notifying an individual or being sure that he is notified prior to the time of the investigation?

Mr. Schorr. Well, it is common practice. As far as I know, perhaps with rare exception, that the person being considered for the job is first sounded out and then told, we will come to you more formally after some necessary clearance, do you accept the idea that there may be some clearance that may bother you. But that has been normal practice.

Senator Kennedy. And that never happened in your particular situation?

Mr. Schorr. No, sir.

Senator Kennedy. You talk a little, Mr. Schorr, about the general climate of skepticism and suspicion among newsmen. You have been covering news now for a great many years, both in this country and abroad. What is different now? Why do newsmen feel differently about their handling the news today from how they did, say, in years past? What has changed?

Mr. Schorr. Well, the relationship between the press and Government has always been a relationship that is basically an adversary relationship. In every administration, there will be instances of criticism, occasionally directly expressed. President Johnson used to pick up the phone and bawl people out if he did not like a report. What is changed, it seems to me now, is that it has taken on a rather concerted quality, not simply to blow off about a natural indignation that any official may feel when he finds that his thing has been jeopardized by a report, but rather a concerted thing saying, we can cow the press, we can manipulate them, we can set the public against them.

What has changed is that I have never before felt, until after Vice President Agnew started making speeches, I have nver before felt that to a great many citizens of this country, it is no longer a honorable thing to be a news broadcaster. Somehow, the administration has set a segment of the country against us, apparently by some design. Because if you can discredit the press, then it does not matter much more what they say and what they write.

Senator KENNEDY. Do you feel as a professional that either the networks, which you have had a great deal of experience with, or the broadcasters themselves have been affected by this climate of intimidation? Have they responded to it or reacted to it?

Mr. SCHORR. Senator, the honest answer is, I do not know. Whenever a speech is made by the Vice President, whenever there is some incident involving the Pentagon Papers or involving CBS's "Selling of the Pentagon," the memoranda that come to us all say, don't allow yourself to be threatened, don't give in, the way you didn't before. But this is a very subtle thing we are dealing with. You read the memo and say, they must be feeling the heat up there, it is very brave of them to write us memos, but you are part of the family with them, and the opportunities for pressure, the opportunities for economic retaliation are so great in this field.

Senator Ervin mentioned the FCC. We are a regulated industry. But there are other things. We exist because of our affiliates. We hear from the affiliates, who sometimes in turn have heard from the administration. The affiliates express their dissatisfaction. Well, we do not like having unhappy affiliates. I say "We." I mean people upstairs, the executives.

Correspondents are not stupid. We are aware that we are running an industry that is fighting for its existence. We want to be as honest and frank as we can. Yet we do not want to bite the hand that feeds us.

The answer to your question is the answer that I gave at the end of my paper. I do not know what it does. I do not know.

Senator KENNEDY. But at least you have felt as a professional newsman a different climate because of these statements or charges by the Vice President, the restraints that have been put on the publication of the Pentagon Papers or the subpenaing of newspapermen's notes, or I suppose the activities that surrounded your own situation. I can understand how it is more difficult, perhaps, for you to get a view of this than perhaps some others. But certainly, you are convinced of a different climate now from what has existed at other times in your professional career as a reporter of news and events.

Mr. SCHORR. I would think so.

Senator KENNEDY. I want to thank you very much for your appearance here, Mr. Schorr. It is enormously helpful and valuable to the committee and I want to thank you for having the courage to be here.

Senator Ervin. I want to say I concur in your opinion that there should be no governmental investigation of a person without his consent unless Government has reasonable grounds to believe that that person has committed a crime or is about to commit a crime. I think that any investigation outside of that is not justified. I again want to thank you for your willingness to appear here.

Mr. Schorr. Thank you.

Senator Ervin. Counsel will call the next witness.

Mr. Baskir. Mr. Chairman, our next witness this morning is Mr. Aryeh Neier, executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union.

Senator Ervin. Mr Neier, I wish to welcome you to the subcommittee and to express the subcommittee's appreciation for your willingness to come and give us the benefit of your observations.

STATEMENT OF ARYEH NEIER, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR, AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION; ACCOMPANIED BY MRS. HOPE EASTMAN, ACTING DIRECTOR, WASHINGTON OFFICE, ACLU

Mr. Neier. Thank you very much, Senator Ervin. With me, on my left, is Mrs. Hope Eastman, an attorney with the American Civil Liberties Union. She is acting director of our Washington office.

Senator Ervin. We want to welcome her here.

Mr. Neier. Mr. Chairman, when this committee held its hearing last fall, it heard about a number of attacks on the American press. I would like to submit my statement, rather than read it, but I would like to suggest a number of things which I think this committee can do to counteract these attacks upon the press.

Senator Ervin. As I understand, you want to express your views without reading the statement in full.

Mr. Neier. That is right.

Senator Ervin. That will be entirely satisfactory to the subcommittee, but let the record show that the witness' statement will be printed in full in the body of the record immediately after the witness' oral testimony.

Mr. Neier. Thank you very much, Senator.

Since the time of the hearings by this committee last fall which documented very fully the pressures which there had been upon the press, there have been a number of other incidents. You heard just now about the incident involving Mr. Schorr. There have also been continuing grand jury investigations of the publication of the Pentagon Papers; a number of reporters have been subpoenaed to testify before those grand juries.

In addition, there has been an episode involving public television in which a segment of a program, the "Great American Dream Machine," a segment on the FBI, was first cancelled and then subsequently aired in the context of a discussion program over whether it should have been canceled. That initial cancellation followed a letter from Mr. J. Edgar Hoover, written on Justice Department stationery, saying that he was referring the question of the production of the segment on the FBI to the Justice Department. That implied threat probably had something to do with the cancellation of that particular episode of the television program on the FBI.

I think these attacks, following upon the attacks which were documented in your hearings last fall, have taken their toll upon the press. I think Mr. Schorr's statements earlier this morning are eloquent evidence of the subtle but nevertheless real toll that has been taken by these attacks upon the press. The result has been a certain kind of self-censorship within the press, always the most difficult kind of censorship to document in any way, but perhaps eventually the most dangerous kind of censorship of all. An atmosphere of beleaguerment and restraint has been fostered in some segments of the press.

Nevertheless, I think there have been forces which have been moving in the opposite direction, forces which have been stimulating the press not to be restrained. Perhaps foremost among those forces has been the work of this committee. The very willingness of a prominent Senate committee to make itself known as a forum for the examination of these issues has been enormously important in preventing the attacks upon the press taking a larger toll than they have in fact taken.

There have been some other forces at work. One of the forces which I think has militated against self-censorship within the large instruments of the press, such as the New York Times, CBS television, the Washington Post—which have experienced the frontal attacks from the Federal Government—has been the existence of an alternate press within this country, a burgeoning alternate press, most of it which came into existence during the past decade. This alternate press includes all of the underground newspapers, the college newspapers, the high school newspapers which have emerged, the newspapers which serve such special communities as prisoners within prisons and soldiers on military bases and homosexuals. The press that has existed to serve these communities has had an important impact on the establishment press. I think it has served as a gadfly to the establishment press.

One of the especially useful developments in the past few years has been the emergence of a number of journals, usually published and distributed on a local basis, which are reviews of the activities of the press within their communities. The first of these publications was the "Chicago Journalism Review," which emerged after the Democratic Convention in Chicago in 1968. It was put together by working journalists in Chicago who were dissatisfied with the coverage of the convention and of the events surrounding the convention by their own newspapers and their own television stations. They published this journal in order to take the press to task and criticize it for what they thought were its inadequacies. I believe that the emergence of this kind of press has been very important in keeping the establishment press on its toes.

In my testimony, I note that perhaps the largest of the papers which fits into this category, the Village Voice, advertises itself with the slogan, "Keep Ahead of the Times." Its very purpose is to needle the New York Times. Hardly an issue passes without one or more articles critical of the way in which the New York Times has covered or not covered some story of interest.

I believe that kind of needling by the alternate press is a very desirable means of stimulating the press and preventing it from succumbing to the pressures or restraint that may be felt from the Federal Government.

But this alternate press also suffers from censorship. It is not the same kind as that suffered by the establishment press. The alternate press is really not significant enough for the Federal Government to spend much time on. Rather, it is usually local police agencies and local licensing agencies which have been responsible for harassment of the alternate press. The publications which fall into this category very often can't be distributed by commercial newsdealers and, therefore, rely on their own street vendors. These street vendors are very much subject to harassment by local police or minor pretexts. For example, if a person purchases a paper and throws it to the ground the vendor of the paper may be arrested on a littering charge.

Despite the fact that day-to-day harassment is a fact of life for the alternate press, if one reads these papers it does not seem as though they are terribly subject to the special evil of self-censorship. If anything, they are raucuous and rowdy and robust in their criticism of the establishment press and of public life generally. These are not successful commercial ventures and they are generally not subject to commercial pressures. They are, however, intensely competitive among themselves.

It is terribly important that this segment of the press be protected against the kinds of harassment to which it is subject. The number of incidents of local police harassment and the local licensing agency harassment often drives papers of this sort out of existence. I think they ought to be encouraged rather than driven out of existence, in part because of the effect that they have upon the establishment press.

In the broadcast industry, there is no equivalent of that alternate press that exists in the print media. I think there are opportunities which could be pursued to create an alternate press within the print media. I think there are opportunities which could be pursued to create an alternate press within the broadcast media. Unfortunately, I think the present tendencies suggest that these opportunities will be let go by. One of the opportunities is in the development of cable television as an important alternate broadcast medium. It could be a medium to which the public can have free and easy access and which will be a tremendous instrument for diversity upon the air. I am not an expert on cable television. However, in watching what has been taking place, it seems as though cable television is being allowed to become an adjunct of commercial broadcasting rather than the great instrument for diversity upon the air that it could be. I think this is one of the areas which this committee could look into very profitably. It could encourage cable television to be developed along lines which would make it the kind of gadfly to the predominant broadcasting industry that the underground press and the college press and the like are to the print media.

There was another opportunity that Congress launched in 1967 to create an alternate press in the broadcast industry. That was with the creation of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting. I think the hope was that public broadcasting would be a significant instrument for diversity upon the air. Unfortunately, funding has never been established on any kind of long term and secure basis. Public television is very much fearful of drying up its sources of revenue, and that exercises a pressure not to rock the boat very much. Therefore, public television, rather than being more outspoken and more creative than commercial television, often comes second best when compared with commercial television in its willingness to be creative and innovative and to express controversial points of view on the air. I think this committee could do a singular service in examining the pressures of conformity which exist upon public television and engaging in actions which will help to stimulate diversity on the air through the development of public television in accordance with its true potentials.

I should say in this regard that the ACLU has commissioned a study of public television which is virtually complete. We will have it ready within a few days and will submit it to you at that time.

Senator Ervin. We would certainly like to have a copy of that report, because I think that the lack of independent sources of funding has prevented public television from performing the functions that it is capable of performing.

Mr. Neier. One of the possibilities of giving public television security of funding would be to give it a tax base. The Congress should consider at an early stage the possibility of a franchise tax upon commercial television which would support noncommercial television. Proposals of that sort deserve to be examined so as to establish secure funding which will allow public television to develop as an appropriate alternative and gadfly to the commercial television networks.

To summarize my statement, I think that when one examines the dynamics of freedom of the press, it is important not only to look at those actions of Government which exercise pressures for conformity and restraint, but it is also necessary to examine those elements which can stimulate the press to be more imaginative, more innovative, more daring in the news coverage that it presents to the American public.

The ACLU approaches this entire area from the standpoint of trying to create opportunities for diversity in the press. Ultimately, our theory is that through the expression and availability of diverse points of view, the American public can make its own decisions and can exercise responsibility in determining the directions which this country has to take. It can only do so when it has available the full range of diversity of points of view that exist within the country. It requires a vigorous press in order to have access to that full range of points of view.

(Prepared statement follows:)

STATEMENT OF ARYEH NEIER, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR OF THE AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION, BEFORE THE SENATE SUBCOMMITTE ON CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS HEARINGS OF FREEDOM OF THE PRESS

February 1, 1972

My name is Aryeh Neier. I am Executive Director of the American Civil Liberties Union and I appear here today on behalf of the ACLU. I am grateful for the opportunity to appear before you and even more grateful for the work that has been undertaken by this committee. Under the chairmanship of Senator Sam Ervin, Jr., this committee has emerged as one of the most important forces in American life in safeguarding the values embodied in the First Amendment.

The liberty of the press is under attack today. For the most part, the attacks are subtle. Occasionally, they are heavy-handed. Most of the more prominent attacks have failed. The Supreme Court refused to restrain the publication of the Pentagon Papers. The House of Representatives voted against citing CBS for contempt for declining to comply with a subpoena for the film used in the production of "The Selling of the Pentagon." The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit excused Earl Caldwell from appearing before a grand jury in San Francisco.

Nevertheless, the attacks have taken their toll. They have created an atmosphere of beleaguerment in some segments of the press. The result has been self-censorship.

I have attached to this testimony a report prepared for the ACLU by Fred Powledge entitled "The Nixon Administration and the Press: The Engineering of Restraint." This report documents the application of pressure by the government and the resulting self-censorship. Subsequent to the publication of this report last fall, there have been additional instances of governmental pressure on the press. Reporters associated with the publication of the Pentagon Papers have been subpenaed to appear before federal grand juries. The F.B.I. has investigated the life and activities of a CBS television reporter known for his critical attitudes towards this administration. Following receipt of a letter from J. Edgar Hoover containing an implied threat of reprisals, a segment of a program on public television was deleted (though it was subsequently aired in the context of a discussion program on public television about its deletion.)

One of the reasons for the atmosphere which produces self-censorship is that the victories that the press has won against outside censorship have been excessively narrow. The Supreme Court upheld publication of the Pentagon Papers—but a majority of the Justices indicated they would support some kind of press censorship. The House of Representatives refused to cite CBS for contempt—but 181 members of the House voted for contempt citation. The implications are clear: an extra step and the decision might go in the other direction.

CBS, The New York Times and The Washington Post are giants of the press. They can afford to spend huge sums of money on attorneys to defend their interests. They have powerful friends and they are powerful themselves. Yet they only narrowly escaped government censorship.

There have also been attacks on the freedoms of those segments of the press which do not have available to them the financial, legal and political resources of CBS, The New York Times and The Washington Post. I am talking about attacks on the freedoms of the "alternate" press—the underground press and the press which services such groups as college students, high school students, soldiers and prisoners. However, while the general impact of the attacks on the giants of the press has been to produce self-censorship, no such result has followed attacks on the "alternate" press.

Any examination of the "alternate" press will readily show that it is robust in its expression of dissent—if not the raucous and rowdy. Precisely these characteristics of the "alternate" press lead to such forms of harassment as arrests of paper vendors, denial of press passes, overbroad and harassing application of obscenity statutes and illegal searches and seizures. For the "alternate" press, these forms of harassment act as prior restraints as effectively as a court injunction against publication of the Pentaon Papers would have imposed prior restraint on The New York Times and The Washington Post. For many of the newspapers and magazines which make up the "alternate" press, sales by their own street vendors are the basic form of distribution.

In the attached report by Fred Powledge, there is an account of a lawsuit involving two Washington D.C. underground newspapers, The Washington Free Press and The Quicksilver Times. In this case, 8 vendors for the papers who appeared as witnesses testified to about 300 episodes of harassment by the District of Columbia police. (Examples of these episodes appear at p. A–10 of the Powledge report.) Yet despite such intense harassment, it would be difficult to read these newspapers and find many traces of self-censorship.

I want to try to suggest some of the reasons for the different responses to government harassment from the different segments of the press. In addition, I want to try to analyze the relationships between the different segments of the press. For the sake of convenience, I will use labels, which are necessarily inexact, and call the one segment the "establishment" press and the other segment the "alternate" press.

The "establishment" press is a big business. Large amounts of money are at stake in its operation. When government moves against it, the result may be great financial loss to people only marginally related to the dissemination of news. This is especially true in the broadcast industry which is most vulnerable because it is directly subject to federal regulation.

Those intent on restraining the press have deliberately played on the susceptibility of the "establishment" press to economic sanctions. In his November 1969, Des Moines speech, Vice President Agnew attacked the television networks and, at the same time, reminded them that they had "a monopoly sanctioned and licensed by government." A week later, the Vice President spoke in Montgomery, Alabama and coupled his attack on the newspapers with a reminder about "monopolization."

As if to demonstrate that the Vice President is not just a paper tiger, the F.C.C. has demonstrated its willingness to act on his criticisms of the press. Right after the Vice President attacked the television networks for their "querulous criticism" of a speech by the President, it was learned that the Chairman of the F.C.C. has asked the networks for their transcripts of commentaries on the President's speech. A few months after the Vice President attacked the lyrics about drugs in popular songs, the F.C.C. told broadcasters that questions would be raised about "whether continued operation of the station is in the public interest" if they broadcast drug lyrics.

Self-censorship has come about because the press can never be sure what will get it into trouble with the government. As professor Thomas Emerson of the Yale Law School has pointed out: "The infinite varieties and subtleties of language and other forms of communication made it impossible to construct a limitation upon expression in definite terms." Therefore, in order to steer clear of trouble it is necessary for the press to guess at what might be offensive to government and to give such potentially offending communications a wide berth. In this manner, self-censorship becomes the most sweeping kind of censorship.

By and large, the "alternate" press does not share the business characteristics of the "establishment" press. The owners of the means of publiation are, therefore, not likely to be forces for restricting the content of these publications. Some of the publications which make up the "alternate" press are fly-by-night publications with erratic publication schedules. Others, such as New York City's Village Voice are solidly established. (The weekly circulation of the Voice is climbing towards 200,000). There is often a lively competition among the publications which make up the "alternate" press. Many cities across the United States have two or more weekly newspapers which can be classified under this rubric. Another characteristic of these publications which militates against self-censorship is their acquired habit of allowing columnists to carry on running disputes with each other within the pages of the same publication. Again, to use New York's Village Voice as an example, it is not at all unusual to have several different columns within the same edition of the paper expressing widely divergent views on a single subject. Censorship is a fact of life for the "alternate" press—but not self-imposed censorship.

The "alternate" press, though largely immune to self-censorship, is highly susceptible to direct government harassment. The ACLU has undertaken large numbers of cases in which papers have been barred from military bases, prisons and high schools. The College Press Service estimates that some 60 college papers were censored during the 1970–71 academic year. And yet, all the indications are that the "alternate" press is growing ever more aggressive in utilizing its First Amendment rights.

Not only is the "alternate" press itself relatively invulnerable to self-censorship, it is also a force which works against self-censorship in the "Establishment" press. It is a part of the purpose and the effect of much of the "alternate" press to serve as a gadfly to the "establishment" press.* Moreover, the "alternate press expands its circulation as segments of the public sense that self-censorship has set in at the "establishment" press and become suspicious of the news that is being purveyed.

Recently, several papers have appeared which have as their main purpose criticism of self-censorship in the "establishment" press. The first of these papers was the Chicago Journalism Review which was organized by working journalists in Chicago dissatisfied by the coverage in their own newspapers of the events surrounding the 1968 Democratic Convention. Subsequently, similar journals have appeared in about a dozen other cities around the country. These publications are playing a significant role in prodding the "establishment" press to exercise its rights under the First Amendment. They supplement the role of other segments of the "alternate" press as a counter-weight to the pressures of the government upon the "establishment" press.

Much of the harassment of the "alternate" press has been based on fear that it is revolutionary. Prison administrators, high school principals, military commanders, police and others have harassed publications because of their fear of the ideas contained in those publications. Unfortunately, these fears tend to be self-fulfilling. The suppression of ideas which results from these fears is more likely to have revolutionary impact than the ideas themselves.

De Tocqueville understood the relationship between complete liberty of the press and social stability. He observed that:

"The general principles of the (American) government are stable, and the opinions most prevalent in society are generally more durable than in many other countries. When once the Americans have taken up an idea, whether it be well or ill founded, nothing is more difficult than to eradicate it from their minds . . . I attribute this consequence to a cause which may at first sight appear to have a very opposite tendency, namely, to the liberty of the press. The nations among which this liberty exists are as apt to cling to their opinions from pride as from conviction. They cherish them because they hold them to be just, and because they exercised their own free will in choosing them; and they maintain them not only because they are true, but because they are their own."

Or, to state the point the other way round, those societies which have been most subject to violent upheavals have been those in which dissident ideas were prohibited.

I believe that there are some important steps that could be taken by this Committee to enhance the capacity of the "alternate" press to exert pressures against self-censorship in the "establishment" press. They include

(1) Conduct an investigation of censorship of the press in prisons, army bases, schools and other compulsory institutions and of harassment of the underground press and of the college press.

The ACLU is prepared to supply this committee with information on large numbers of cases in which this segment of the press has been subject to censorship and harassment. In some instances—such as censorship at military bases or in federal prisons—Congressional action would be the most appropriate way to establish First Amendment rights.

(2) Investigate means of stimulating an alternate electronic press.

For example, cable television may have the capacity to act as a counterweight to the stultification of expression in the established broadcast industry. The ACLU believes that by developing cable television as a common carrier it can become the broadcast equivalent of the alternate press. Unfortunately, there is presently underway a headlong rush to develop cable television along commercial lines comparable to the established broadcast industry. Under such circumstances, it is doubtful that cable television will fulfill its potential to offset the impact the government presently has in promoting self-censorship in the established broadcast industry.

---

* The Village Voice advertises itself with the slogan "Keep Ahead Of The Times."

(3) Conduct an investigation of the role of the federal government in dimming the bright prospect that public television would serve as another "alternate" medium and as a major force for diversity of programming on the air.

Congress enacted legislation in 1967 establishing the Corporation for Public Broadcasting. The ACLU supported the legislation because, as we testified before Congress at that time, we saw it "as a means for providing the public with a diversity of programming which commercial television, because of its marketplace orientation, does not present sufficient to the public need". However, we noted that unless financing was established so as to immunize the Corporation from political pressures, there was a danger "that the spirit of inventiveness which can create new and different programs [would] be impaired, resulting in a new brand of broadcasting conformity."

Recent developments in public television suggest that the absence of a secure financial base is resulting in the cut back of precisely those aspects of public television which have best served the purpose of diversity.

The ACLU will shortly issue a major report on public television which, we think, will touch on many of the issues which deserve consideration by this committee.

I want to comment on one other matter that has come before this committee.

The ACLU supports the general thrust of S. 1311. However, we believe that certain improvements can be made. They are:

(1) We believe that the exception for reports on grand jury proceedings should be eliminated.

The entire institution of the grand jury requires reexamination. Its secrecy was originally designed to protect potential defendants. However, it is usually used today as an arm of the prosecutor's office. The potential defendant is sometimes better protected if there is public knowledge of a grand jury's actions. No attempt to protect the secrecy of a grand jury belongs in this bill.

(2) We believe that the language is too broad which would permit exceptions for information "required to prevent a threat to human life, espionage, or foreign agression."

An indication of the overbreadth of this language is provided by the attempt to restrain the publication of the Pentagon Papers under the Espionage Act. Under this provision, the government might subpena newsmen to discover the source of the Pentagon Papers.

We suggest that this exception should be limited to crimes involving serious injury to persons or property.

A fuller exposition of our views on this issue appears in the ACLU's amicus brief in the Caldwell case which I submit as a supplement to this testimony.

Mr. NEIER. At this time, I will be happy to respond to any questions that you may have.

Senator ERVIN. You state in your prepared testimony that the ACLU favors S. 1311 with certain amendments.

Mr. NEIER. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. I have always had the sort of tentative belief that in view of the fact that the Caldwell case and two other similar cases, have been accepted by the Supreme Court for review, it might be wise for the subcommittee to postpone determination of whether it should favorably recommend S. 1311 until after the Supreme Court has ruled on those cases.

Mr. NEIER. I would not quarrel with that at all.

Senator ERVIN. I have the feeling that the Supreme Court has the chance to render some landmark decisions determining the constitutional rights of reporters to collect and disseminate information without having their efforts chilled by being subpenaed before grand juries and other investigative bodies. I have a little more confidence in the linguistic ability of the men who wrote the Constitution than I have in the linguistic ability of those of us who are now serving in the Congress. Failure to properly fashion a bill, which may be necessary in the absence of a great decision on the point, might tend to restrict rather than to secure these rights that I think are essential.

Mr. Neier. I think, Senator, that is a judgment in which I have to concur. The decision will come down by June and I think the Congress might be well advised to wait until the decision comes down.

Senator Ervin. I think the opinion of the circuit court in the Caldwell case was certainly written by a man who proved himself to be a real judicial statesman. If the court can adopt the view expressed in that opinion, I think the press will be able to fulfill its mission of keeping the American people informed, not only as to ordinary news but as to the unusual kind of news that is necessary for the public to know what is going on in the country.

Mr. Neier. I am hopeful that the Supreme Court decision will be as good as the circuit court decision.

Senator Ervin. I want to thank you for a very excellent statement —both your oral statement and what I have read of your written statement.

I want to commend you on your statement with regard to what you called the "alternate press," because of the recent testimony we received concerning that press indicating that it was subjected to harassment by local officials, and unfortunately the established press did little to justify or defend the alternate press' right to freedom of the press.

Mr. Neier. Senator, there are two aspects of that segment of the press which, really, are controlled by the Federal Government. One is the press which is distributed on military bases. There are now better regulations within the Armed Forces on the distribution of newspapers on military bases than there have been before, but there is still a substantial number of incidents in which base commanders do not respect the rules which now exist. That is one area where the Federal Government has a direct responsibility.

Another area where the Federal Government has a direct responsibility is in connection with the newspapers which are circulated at Federal prisons. There is a concomitant concern there. That is the ability of newspaper reporters to cover what takes place within the Federal prisons.

I should note that the ACLU filed suit here in the District of Columbia just a couple of weeks ago in behalf of a number of reporters seeking access to Federal prisons and seeking the ability to interview prisoners about conditions within the prisons. I think that is something which the Federal Government can take direct action on.

Senator Ervin. Do you have any questions, Counsel?

Mr. Baskir. Yes, Mr. Neier, last night on NET, there was a program with respect to surveillance. There was reference in that program to a study that Mr. Donner is doing, I think——

Mr. Neier. Yes.

Mr. Baskir. Perhaps the study has been completed——

Mr. Neier. No, it has not been completed.

Mr. Baskir (continuing). Some of which had to do with surveillance of the alternate press. Are you familiar with last night's program and the question?

Mr. NEIER. I did not see last night's program, but I may be familiar with some details of it.

Mr. BASKIR. Apparently, there is a statement there that Mr. Donner is being investigated presumably because of his investigation of surveillance of newspapers.

Mr. NEIER. Well, I do not know about any investigation off hand, but it would not surprise me at all. I think that any person who becomes concerned with kinds of issues which he has become concerned with—that is, the full range of surveillance activities by local agencies and by agencies of the Federal Government—almost has to expect that he himself will become a target for those surveillance activities.

Senator ERVIN. Thank you very much. We are very greatly indebted to both of you for your appearance here.

Mr. NEIER. Thank you.

Mr. BASKIER. Mr. Chairman, our next witnesses represent the National Newspaper Association, the Newspaper Association Managers, Inc., and the Suburban Newspapers of America.

Congressman Waldie is present and would like to introduce them.

Senator ERVIN. Congressman, we are delighted to have you with us.

STATEMENT OF HON. JEROME R. WALDIE, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE 14TH CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA

Mr. WALDIE. Thank you, it is a pleasure to be here.

I am introducing today a constituent of mine, Mr. Dean Lesher, who comes before this committee with the following credentials: He is a graduate of Harvard Law School, he has been a newspaper publisher in California since 1941, a considerable length of time. At the pesent time, he owns a number of newspapers in the State. He owns six daily newspapers, eight weekly newspapers, and an ABC affiliated radio station. In addition, he is the president of the California Newspaper Publishers Association and director of an organization known as the Suburban Newspapers of California.

I have introduced a number of constituents before congressional committees as a courtesy that all Congressmen and Senators extend to constituents and I am not in every instance in agreement with their views. I am in agreement with the views of Mr. Lesher.

May I make one statement on my observation of the hearings today and from following the activities of this committee? Really, I think it is an enormously valuable contribution to the situation that exists in our country. Though we might occasionally be confronted with an irresponsible or an arrogant publisher or owner of the media or an incompetent or arrogant or irresponsible reporter in the media, to such extent as abuses occur from that activity, they pale into insignificance beside the extent of abuse that an arrogant and irresponsible Government control of this means of communication would cause. I think the committee is doing a splendid job in informing the people that the First Amendment has meaning today as it always has had.

Senator Ervin. Thank you very much. I appreciate your understanding of the first amendment. I think it can be said of freedom of the press as with every other freedom, that they are sometimes going to be abused. The only way we can put an end to abuse of freedom is to destroy freedom and that would be the worst calamity the country could suffer. It is better to suffer abuses of all our freedoms than to have them regulated in an irresponsible manner.

Mr. Waldie. Thank you.

Senator Ervin. I believe Mr. Lesher is accompanied by Dr. Earl English of the National Newspaper Association. Please introduce the other gentlemen accompaning you for purposes of the record.

STATEMENT OF DR. EARL ENGLISH, NATIONAL NEWSPAPER ASSOCIATION; ACCOMPANIED BY RICHARD W. CARDWELL, PRESIDENT, NEWSPAPER ASSOCIATION MANAGERS, INC.; THEODORE A. SERRILL; EXECUTIVE VICE PRESIDENT, NATIONAL NEWSPAPER ASSOCIATION; AND WILLIAM G. MULLEN, GENERAL COUNSEL

Dr. English. Mr. Chairman, I have with me Mr. Theodore Serrill, executive vice president of the association; and Mr. Wiliam G. Mullen, general counsel. And Mr. Lesher has been introduced.

My name is Earl English, dean emeritus and professor in the School of Journalism, University of Missouri-Columbia.

I am sorry, I did not introduce Richard Cardwell, general counsel of the Hoosier State Press Association and president of the Newspaper Association Managers, on my right.

Senator Ervin. I am delighted to have all you gentlemen here. We appreciate your appearance for what I think is a very good cause, the cause of freedom of the press.

Dr. English. I am here at the invitation of the National Newspaper Association, accompanied by Mr. Theodore A. Serrill, executive vice president of the association, and Mr. William G. Mullen, its general counsel. The national Newspaper Association is composed of approximately 7,000 small daily and weekly newspapers with offices here in Washington.

While I have been involved in journalism education for many years, I am also a practicing newspaperman. I learned the printing trade on a weekly newspaper as a boy before engaging in a wide variety of newspaper responsibilities. During the past 19 years I have held top responsibility for a daily teaching newspaper of general circulation in Columbia, Mo.

We are honored indeed to have the opportunity to appear before this committee.

The weeklies and small dailies of this country have great interest in these important hearings and the particular problems being discussed. None of these papers is likely to be found in the national spotlight as the result of the publication of a classified 43-volume Government document. But throughout the country hundreds of editors, publishers, and reporters each day face up to most of the basic issues with which your committee is concerned.

These are not the kinds of problems and issues that make the wire services. The fact is they may appear of minor importance when removed from their local scene. The advertising people have a slogan that all business is local, and it seems to me we can say something similar about first amendment guarantees and the people's right to know. Most of the problems are local ones and the individual gains and losses in the struggle are not necessarily large ones. But the total effect, because of precedence and loss of public confidence, may be considerable.

I asked an editor of a metropolitan newspaper the other day how he felt about the difference in publishing community and metropolitan newspapers so far as courage and responsibility are concerned. His experience has included both. He did not hesitate to say that the often isolated editor or publisher in the small cities and towns carrier a greater burden of responsibility along with the need for courage to live dangerously than that required by their well-counseled counterparts on the large-circulation press. The small daily editor who insists in print that a public official reveal the details of a closed public meeting may very well meet that official on the way to the post office.

This organization which we represent today recognized the need for support of this so-called grassroots press back in 1958 under the organization's earlier name, the National Editorial Association. It called on the Missouri School of Journalism with the assistance of several persons from other organizations to set up a Freedom of Information Center. Today the center includes thousands of clippings gleaned from daily newspapers and more than 500 professional journals and bulletins. Subject matter ranges over 1,100 different files from access to Government data to the underground press. The center publishes a bimonthly FOI Digest and has issued nearly 300 in-depth studies on right-to-know issues.

But its publications are only a part of the center's functions. Each day requests for the center's information and guidance pour in from newspapers, broadcast stations, public officials, businessmen, lawyers legislators, librarians, students, teachers, and private citizens. The center's 2,000 requests a year make it the largest clearinghouse in the world for information on the general subject of the people's right to know.

Time does not permit an examination of the variety of requests for help that come to the center. But a brief sampling will point out that the basic needs of the people seeking help is on the general order of the concern expressed by Senator Ervin at the opening of these hearings on September 28.

A city official wants to know about laws and court rulings on obscene publications; another about the release of information in criminal cases; a newspaper association inquires about open meeting laws and executive sessions; another about taxation of publications; another about a publication's right to refuse advertising; and a broadcaster tells of a dispute over his demand to inspect teachers' salaries.

The basic theme of these requests centers on a struggle of the press to obtain truthful information from sources with the power to withhold and to manipulate the facts which the public has a right to know. Well-meaning men seek to withhold at least part of the information of particular events and to postpone the day when even part of the story will be available. The main function of the press, they hold, is to present the Government's policies in the best possible light.

The press and Government as adversaries, whether in our courthouses or in the State and Federal capitols, is a condition of long standing. As in the past, each side finds it easy to blame the other and to contend that today's practices are worse than ever before. In blaming each other both sides appear to have overlooked the basic social issues involved today. The impact of television on our society and the effects of an economic system pushed to its limits have both caused changes in our society that are relevant to the issues of press freedom.

Television has changed for a large share of the people from an entertainment medium licensed to serve the public, to a No. 1 source of the news. Thus, it follows that this major news source is under Government control in very important ways, a condition at variance with time honored First Amendment principles.

We may point to the media's required role in recent years as the bearer of bad tidings, and a developing confidence gap between the public and the press to account for public apathy in today's free press controversy. The fact is, however, society today does not believe that press freedom is as important a function in our democratic system as it was 40, even 20 years ago.

The Freedom of Information Center has noted some informal surveys in recent months that reflect how disinterested and unsupportive the public has become of the freedoms both it and the press have formerly enjoyed.

The Corpus Christi Caller-Times (2/17/70) called on four reporters to carry the Bill of Rights in the form of a petition to the streets. Of 199 persons contacted, only 19 identified the document; 56 signed it—a third of which did not bother to read it: 143 declined to sign, 54 percent of which read it and refused to sign it. The remainder would not even read it.

In Florida, 887 students in 12 high schools did not understand press freedom under the First Amendment to the extent that they approved controls incompatible with that amendment and were in general poorly informed on guarantees of press freedom.

In Miami reporters (St. Louis Post-Dispatch) asked 50 middle-aged people on the street to sign the Declaration of Independence. Only one agreed. The same reporters asked 300 youths attending a Youth for Christ convention to sign it. Twenty-eight percent thought it had been written by Lenin. Others said it was a hippie document.

In Omaha (St. Louis Post-Dispatch) 80 percent of persons questioned refused to sign the declaration. In Madison, Wis., only one person in 112 said he would sign the Bill of Rights. Again in Illinois, two-thirds of those interviewed refused to sign the preamble to the Constitution. A CBS poll found that more than half the population favored peacetime censorship if the Government found news stories to be harmful to the national interest.

In Seattle 68 percent of the readers of the Seattle Post-Intelligencer wanted some form of censorship for motion pictures, television, and literature.

Growing consumerism in all areas seems to show that the people want Government to restrict big business in order to make it more responsible to the public's needs. As members of the business community, the print and broadcast media fall into the same reference despite the first amendment.

A case can be made for the statement that the executive branch today is not better or worse than previous administrations so far as respect for the First Amendment is concerned. But a public that does not understand or condone freedom of the press may respond to emotional appeals by political figures in ways contrary to the public allegiance of other times. It may not be that we have more authoritative government today than in the past. The great danger lies in the fact that readers, listeners, and viewers, may be willing to condone authoritatian actions, seemingly oblivious to the important lessons of our country's history.

The First Amendment's hard-earned rights to utter unpopular statements is no longer held in high esteem, it appears. An ambitious study of 90,000 persons under age 35 by the Educational Commission of the States asked if such statements as "Russia is better than the United States" and "It is not necessary to believe in God" should be allowed to go on the air. Sixty-eight percent of the 26–35 age group said no; 94 percent of those age 13 said no, and 78 percent of those age 17 would not permit these statements to be broadcast.

While we may applaud the direction of their sentiment, their willingness to forego their own rights to free speech to suppress unpopular statements should be of grave concern. Thomas Jefferson's guidance again seems much to the point:

> I know of no safe depository of the ultimate powers of society but the people themselves; and if we think them not enlightened enough to exercise their control with wholesome discretion, the remedy is not to take it from them, but to inform their discretion by education.

Senator Ervin pointed out in his opening statements in these hearings the increased subpenaing of newsmen by grand juries and congressional committees. The subject will produce an argument in most newsrooms on a moment's notice. Newsmen have been required to reveal sources and details of information, thus reducing their effectiveness to carry out their duties, while at the same time making them virtual representatives of law enforcement. With the recent addition of Rhode Island, Illinois, Nevada, and New York, 19 States now have some form of newsman's privilege law. Most of the recent State legislation, however, recognizes a need for balance between the demands of securing information for publication and the compelling needs of the legal system for justice.

The Attorney General's issuance of guidelines in August 1970, governing the use of subpenas to newsmen at the Federal level seems to have reduced the number of cases. Perhaps the information being sought by this method is now regarded as less vital to justice than was earlier believed.

In any event, three cases pleading privilege to withhold information in order to protect reporter sources are presently high on the Supreme Court's calendar. Until a clarification by the Court is given on these problems, the question of granting immunity is probably academic.

The freedom of information (FOI) law has helped the news gathering information, but some weak spots remain, particularly in the time it takes to get information through judicial order. Information under the FOI law may be expensive, also. One newspaper reported having to pay more than $100 for inspecting postal route lists in its area. The Postal Service maintains an $8 an hour searching fee, the largest of any Government agency. Names of farm subsidy receivers requested by a Pennsylvania newspaer—that is local subsidy—prompted a bill for $117.36. A protest to the Agriculture Department's Office of Information brought forth the conclusion that fees would not be required and that the public has the right to this type of information.

The Associated Press managing editors know the problems facing newspapers today. Their recent freedom of information committee report says the press is under increasing attack from all quarters as evidenced by (1) roadblocks in obtaining information on the military, (2) increasing difficulty in securing information from computer files, (3) police harassment exemplified by the invasion of the Stanford University Daily, and (4) attempted prior restraint in the Pentagon Papers case. The committee is optimistic about gains in education. New courses are designed in Texas and Washington Universities on journalism and the law. The Committee also points out with apparent tongue in cheek that in Virginia the first amendment is being taught in public schools.

The equal time provision of the Federal Communication Act of 1934 requiring broadcasters to provide political candidates with time to reply has been expanded into the more general FCC fairness doctrine. Under the provisions of this policy, radio and television stations are required to provide some reasonable chance for rebuttal of attacks and expressed opinions. Under a personal attack section the doctrine requires that when "the honesty, character, integrity or like personal qualities" of a person or group are assailed, the station must notify the person or group attacked and supply a script or tape of the communication. The station must then provide a reasonable opportunity to respond over its facilities. The personal attack provision became law in 1967.

The expressed opinion provision has opened the floodgates for persons and groups seeking free time for the airing of themes and views contrary to their own. Even themes of television movies are included in the requests for time to reply, said to have totaled nearly 6,000 in 1 year's time. Advertising is not exempt from the fairness doctrine's expressed opinions provision and broadcasters face a possible disastrous reduction of their saleable air time through letter-of-the-law interpretation. Even the Federal Trade Commission has cited industry commercials on the basis that they do not fairly picture ecological problems.

These developments in bradcasting are frequently cited as the reason that newspapers are now faced by growing public sentiment toward enforced access to their columns. Two States, Nevada and Florida, have right-to-access laws, the latter restricted to policical candidates. The Florida law has received national attention in a case involving the refusal of the Daytona Beach News-Journal to print a reply of the mayor of Daytona Beach to a column in the newspaper. Under these laws a person does not need to establish defamation or even negative context in order to invoke the right to reply, and the newspaper apparently must publish the replies regardless of libelous content or other factors.

Recently, the U.S. House of Representatives approved legislation which would have required newspapers to afford all candidates for a Federal office equal advertising space, if such space were made available to one candidate for the office Fortunately, this provision was removed from the political spending bill in conference.

There can be no doubt that many persons and groups feel strongly that what they read in newspapers is not in accord with their experience and beliefs. Among them are those who have not been afforded equal time in the offending publications. The reasons given by the newspapers for denial of access are many and varied. On occasion the material offered for publication simply libelous. Many persons ask for the publication of possibly libelous statements in the mistaken belief that they alone and not the publisher are responsible under the libel laws. But in general the access thrust is launched in the belief that first amendment guarantees imply access rights to all media.

The courts have held that the access argument is valid where the public airwaves are concerned, but that private newspapers have the right to determine what they shall publish. (Red Lion v. FCC, 395, P.S. 367, 1969).

Publishing a newspaper is a private enterprise and the owners and employees risk their capital and their jobs in their effort to provide a product the public is willing to buy. Proposed access legislation would order the courts to provide case-by-case judgment on what newspapers would be required to print.

If the day ever comes when government can order private media to print protested statements under the threat of punishment, we will have diverted a long way from the rights of individuals set forth in the First Amendment.

NNA makes no suggestion or recommendation for specific new legislation.

What is needed is revitalization of the concepts underlying the First Amendment itself. No law written by this Congress can be more clear than that amendment's prohibition against any "law . . . abridging the freedom . . . of the press."

All we ask is that those who write our laws—Federal, State and local—understand fully the reasons for this guarantee of freedom and in fact, make no law which would abridge it.

We call on educators everywhere, at all levels, to instill in their students a love and respect for this First Amendment guarantee that all aspects of the press shall remain free from any hint of Government of control or interference.

Congress should support fully such endeavors for it is only through a public, adequately informed of what Government is doing, by a completely free press, that the Government can maintain the confidence of the people.

Thank you.

Senator Ervin. Dr. English, I want to comment you on the excellence of your statement, both for its philosophy of the reasons which underly the First Amendment, and also for your appreciation of the problems which frequently confront the First Amendment at this time.

You have pointed out something which is rather disconcerting to me, and that is the fact that the First Amendment freedoms, especially the freedom of the press, seem to have many enemies in our country. And although strange to say, some of them are found in the press itself. I have received communications from people in the press and in the broadcast media who think there should be some kind of censorship established—not for themselves, because they do not abuse this freedom, but for other persons engaged in the media.

Is it not true that this unfortunately is the feeling of many people about freedom in general, and First Amendment freedoms in particular, because the exercise of the freedoms in the Bill of Rights by others, they think, threatens some of their sacred cows?

Dr. English. Yes, I think that is true. I think the big problem seems to be in the public's lack of appreciation and understanding of the amendment itself. Is it possible that we do no longer teach it in schools? I am not a very good person to ask that question, because I am involved in teaching. But several years ago, a Ph.D. thesis of teachers was being prepared in three universities—this is 20 years ago. Already, we begin to see that those teachers are not aware of the First Amendment, what it meant. Just telling about it, teaching about it, students do not really understand what is involved. I think the instruction must be in what you call extensional definition, extensional terms, what is involved, what does it mean to you? Otherwise, just reciting it does not seem to make the point.

Senator Ervin. My study of the First Amendment, has led to me to the conclusion that the Founding Fathers incorporated it within the Bill of Rights for a reason which was philosophical and another reason which is entirely pragmatic. I think the Founding Fathers realized that the information which people get through the exercise of the freedom of the press will teach them the truth making men free from the worst sort of tyranny—tyranny over the mind.

Also, I think they realized as pragmatists that freedom of the press is absolutely essential to make the institutions which our Constitution establishes for our Government workable. I do not know of any two things that are of more supreme importance than those two, one that is philosophical in nature and the other pragmatic in nature. Those are the reasons why I do not think that we, those of us who reverse the First Amendment freedoms, can overemphasize their importance to our country. I just do not think our system would work without it.

As I remarked awhile ago, any freedom is subject to being abused, and for a country which will not tolerate abuses of freedom, the only remedy it has is to abolish freedom, I think that would be the greatest disaster that can happen to our Nation.

Mr. Baskir?

Mr. Baskir. Sir, in discussing the range of access rules that apply to broadcasting in making reference to the Florida situation, you expressed your opposition to those rules with respect to the print media. What is your position with respect to those rules in broadcasting? Do you think they infringe upon the First Amendment or are a bad policy?

Dr. English. I think they should be as free as they could be, but I do not know how to resolve the problem of the airwaves and so on that are restricted. I do not know how we can resolve that problem.

Mr. Baskir. As I understand the rationale for those rules in broadcasting, it is because of technical reasons, broadcasters have a monopoly on the airwaves, and also because the Government does allocate them. They are, in a way, in a monopoly position and the law has a right to impose an obligation on them to make sure that they give access to all points of view.

Now, with respect to the print media, of course, the factual situation may be very similar. You may have a market, a town, with only one newspaper. So as a practical matter, there is a monopoly from that newspaper. Also, of course, there is legislation, the Newspaper Preservation Act, which at least to some extent gives the Government sanction to these monopolies, these single voices. It would appear to me that the same rationale could be applied to the print as applies to broadasting.

Dr. English. I do not see how you can apply it to the print and still respect the First Amendment, the right to publish. It is possible for competition to come into the field. No one is keeping them out while someone may be keeping out the broadcaster in a particular region—that is, the FCC.

Mr. Baskir. The practical arguments would seem to me to be the same in favor of these access rules. I am not necessarily in favor of them. It seems to me that the sauce there applies to the goose as well as to the gander in practical terms.

Dr. English. It is much easier to start a newspaper now in the towns that we represent than it was a few years ago before offset publication. Already—I believe I would call on the counsel here—already we have papers starting up in these small areas. The problem is, of course, they do not have the voice that the larger ones have. But they all started from scratch someplace.

Mr. Baskir. Thank you.

Senator Ervin. Thank you very much. You have given us a most illuminating statement.

Senator Cranston, I understand you wish to say something about our next witness. We will be glad to hear from you at this time.

STATEMENT OF HON. ALAN CRANSTON, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA

Senator Cranston. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, this is a moment of particular significance for me, first because I wholeheartedly support the work that this committee is doing. Out of a background of having been a newspaperman both in our free country and in the dictatorships of Hitler and Mussolini, where I worked under the most stringent controls, I have developed a deep feeling about the need to maintain a free press in this country.

Second, because it is a great privilege to make an introduction to you, who have done so very much as a jurist and a legislator in leading the fight for freedom of information and freedom of the press in this country. You and I have stood shoulder to shoulder on the Senate floor in related matters, such as the effort to keep the press and media free from infringement on their freedom by wage and price controls. I have profound respect for what you have done in this field.

Third, because I am introducing to you a man, Dean Lesher, a publisher of suburban newspapers in my California, who as a publisher has been very aware of the great importance of all this and who has fought to preserve the right of the press to know and through that right, the right of the people to know what government is doing.

Dean Lesher first published newspapers in the great Central Valley of California. He still does, but also he now publishes in Contra Costa County, which is a suburban area across the Bay from San Francisco, just beyond crowded Oakland.

Many publishers of suburban papers avoid issues and simply cover local matters and even cover those in a rather bland way. That is not Dean Lesher's way. He knows what publishing is all about. He knows what freedom of the press means, and he sees to it that he uses his powers as a publisher to inform the people. He is deeply interested in preserving that right for himself and others. I think that makes him a particularly important witness for you. It is with great pleasure that I introduce Dean Lesher to this committee.

Senator Ervin. Thank you. I appreciate your remarks very much. The country is fortunate to have in the high office that you hold a man who understands the purpose of the First Amendment as well as you do.

Senator Cranston. Thank you.

STATEMENT OF DEAN S. LESHER, SUBURBAN NEWSPAPERS OF AMERICA

Mr. Lesher. I think I should probably say that I have a unique editorial policy in which our editors are free to express their own thoughts and if I disagree with them, I usually write a letter to the editor on an important issue. Thus far, each editor has had the good judgment to print that letter to the editor.

My name is Dean Lesher and I publish newspapers in California, after having been a trial lawyer in Kansas City, Mo.

It is a privilege to appear on behalf of the Suburban Newspapers of America. This is the dynamic group of 600 to 700 newspapers in the areas around the metropolitan core cities. This is the fastest growing segment of the American press today. Some have risen to places of dominance in their respective areas. As an aside, I can tell you that one of our daily papers is the largest daily paper in northern California outside of the metropolitan daily press.

Mr. Chairman, on behalf of this growing, vibrant, challenging segment of the American press, I come before you to respectfully challenge you and your subcommittee to move forward on two closely related legislative fronts to shore up the tottering pillars of our representative form of democracy. In order for representative democracy to survive and serve well the needs of the people, the public must know fully how the Government functions and the public must be free to express its individual and collective opinions with respect to such functioning. Both of these activities are closely related and involve freedom of speech and freedom of the press.

In the recent Pentagon Papers decision by the U.S. Supreme Court, both the public's right to know and the freedom of press were major issues. A study of the various opinions by the Supreme Court Justices in this case shows the need for legislative expression upon the two related subjects of the public's right to know and freedom of speech tied in with freedom of the press.

My extended remarks, a copy of which you have before you for your record, emphasize the need for an enactment by the Congress proclaiming that freedom of the press under the First Amendment is an absolute right, subject only to such restrictions as are deemed absolutely necessary where the security of the Nation is clearly and immediately threatened. In such event the burden of proof should be upon the Government to establish by a clear preponderance of the evidence (a burden much greater than the mere preponderance of the evidence) that such security is so clearly and imminently threatened that a restriction, even of a limited nature, should be placed upon freedom to publish in writing or orally.

Briefly, my remarks recall history, how our forefathers were fearful of a strong central government. They formed the loose Articles of Confederation which did not work. In writing a Constitution for a stronger central government, they were still fearful that such a government might preempt the rights of individuals. In order to assure that individual rights would be protected, they adopted the Bill of Rights, the first 10 amendments to the Constitution. If those amendments had not been proposed, the Constitution would not have been ratified by all of the original 13 colonies. Thus, the very birth of our Nation depended upon the enactment and ratification of the first 10 amendments.

It is the First Amendment that deals with the relationship between the individual and the Government on a broad group basis. The First Amendment thus is of primary importance to the continued success of our representative form of democracy, yes, even to the continued existence of our nation in its present form.

It is axiomatic in the interpretation of any document that an amendment to an instrument prevails when there is a conflict between the amendment and the original document. The amendment is later in time and the framers of the amendment were aware of the wording of the original document. Accordingly, they must have intended to change that meaning wherever there is a conflict.

We thus make a clear case for the enactment of a Federal statute proclaiming the absolutism of freedom of the press and freedom of speech, except where the national security is clearly and immediately threatened.

We come then to the second segment of these two closely related subjects. That second segment is the public's right to know what is taking place in the government. It is on this phase that we strongly urge you to strengthen the freedom of information statute of 1966 proclaiming the public's right to know about the operation of their government. This right should be circumscribed ordinarily only by clear and immediate threat to the security of the Nation and also with respect to matters of diplomacy where a certain degree of secrecy would necessarily be involved.

Senator ERVIN. Mr. Lesher, I'm sorry to interrupt, but I have to leave to go over to the floor to answer a live quorum call. You might proceed with your statement.

Mr. LESHER. Fine, I will rely on ESP to carry us.

Senator ERVIN. I regret that I have to do this because you have a very fine statement.

Mr. LESHER. Thank you, sir.

Aside from these limitations, the public would have a right to check, to observe, to hear, to record, and to report upon the operation of their government at its various levels and in its many phases.

Many States of the Nation have statutes known under the general heading of "The Public's Right to Know." California is probably the leader. I am proud that I was the legislative chairman of the California Newspaper Publishers Association when it sponsored the first enactment upon this subject.

That act was introduced by Assembly Speaker Ralph M. Brown, of Modesto, in 1953, was passed by both houses of the legislature and signed by Gov. Earl Warren. The scope of that act has been expanded to cover the activities of the various commissions and legislative bodies of the State at various political subdivision levels.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to insert in the record the first section of this act because of its philosophy—California Laws 1953, chapter 1588, page 3270, paragraph 1:

> In enacting this Chapter, the Legislature finds and declares that the public commissions, boards and councils and the other public agencies in this state exist to aid in the conduct of the people's business. It is the intent of the law that their actions be taken openly and that their deliberations be conducted openly.
> The people of this state do not yield their sovereignty to the agencies which serve them. The people, in delegating authority, do not give their public servants the right to decide what is good for them to know. The people insist on remaining informed so that they may retain control over the instruments they have created.

This clear and unequivocal statement and the enactments since made thereunder have had a salutary effect in California upon deliberations of commissions and legislative bodies at all levels of government and upon the opening of public records to inspection by the public and the press. They are now accepted as the beacon light upon government activities keeping the public better informed of what their government is doing.

Every member of this committee is aware that our forefathers considered the people to be the government. This philosophy is expressed in every major document they drew. We cannot urge upon you too strongly the enactment of Federal statutes proclaiming this philosophy of government and asserting further the right of the public to know and of the press to keep the public informed.

What are the areas where information is not disclosed to the public or even available to the public? They are many and time permits only of a broad reference to two general categories.

The first is executive privilege, the right proclaimed by the executive department to keep secret too many documents at its own unsupervised discretion. It compounds this by refusing to permit key officials and employees to be questioned on issues either by the public or by the public's representatives, the Congress. This area needs extensive research, study, and action.

This is a sensitive area in view of the historical and constitutional separation of powers between the executive and legislative branches of the government. The issue is critical, however, in view of the growing credibility gap between the government and the public. This gap could produce an atmosphere that would seriously threaten the continuation of our form of government and the Nation itself.

Another area applies to the deliberations of Congress itself. Too many matters are heard in executive sessions, too few committee decisions and votes are recorded in detail and too many actions are not available to the press and public. This area involves the always difficult task of self-analysis and self-criticism. It is, however, an area where the public welfare calls for action.

Everyone who has enjoyed this land of opportunity yearns for a chance to make one small contribution toward the continuance of this great form of government. I hope that our small contribution will be to motivate this subcommittee to take a step in each of these directions by expanding the right of the public to know about the operations of its government and by stating that freedom of the press and freedom of speech are absolute except where the security of the Nation is clearly and immediately endangered. If you do so, your hearings will have contributed mightily toward shoring up the foundation upon which this government rests.

Our form of representative democracy is under attack at all levels from within and without. Many of these attacks are fanatical and emotional without any basis in fact whatsoever. The best defense against them and the best way to preserve what we have and enjoy is to insure that the people know the facts, that the people are well informed.

Knowledge is a necessary keystone in the functioning of a representative democracy. Without such knowledge and without full freedom of expression that the first amendment guarantees, this form of government may begin to totter and shake at its very foundation. You have a great opportunity to shore up this democracy we so dearly love by taking steps in these two proposed legislative fields that will assure to our generation and to future generations a knowledge of what is taking place and an opportunity to express themselves in the light of this knowledge.

It is hoped by the suburban press that you will place this Nation upon the pathway to a better understanding by its citizens of how government functions. It is hoped that you will take the steps suggested to eliminate the credibility gap that has grown up with respect to that functioning. Only by the elimination of this credibility gap can our representative democracy have a full and fair opportunity to succeed and to continue.

(Prepared statement follows:)

TESTIMONY OF DEAN S. LESHER, PUBLISHER OF LESHER NEWSPAPERS OF CALIFORNIA ON BEHALF OF THE U.S. NEWSPAPERS OF AMERICA, BEFORE THE SUB-COMMITTEE OF THE U.S. SENATE CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS, OCTOBER 13.

Senator Ervin and distinguished members of the U.S. Senate Sub-Committee on Constitutional Rights:

My name is Dean S. Lesher. I am a publisher in California of six daily newspapers and eight weekly newspapers under the trade name of Lesher Newspapers. These newspapers are in Contra Costa and Alameda Counties in the East Bay and in Merced and Madera Counties in the San Joaquin Valley.

I have the distinct honor of representing the Suburban Newspapers of America, some 500 strong, which are published in the growing suburbs around metropolitan centers throughout the nation. Many of these newspapers are the most vital, progressive and expanding newspapers in the United States. They are in the growth areas of the country, the bustling suburban areas outside the cities. These areas are growing both in population and in commercial business and the newspapers serving these areas have had the same sort of sensational growth that the census shows for population.

The average age of the publishers of these suburban newspapers is in the early 40s. That average age contrasts strongly with the average age of the publishers of metropolitan papers. Suburban publishers are younger, more dynamic, more eager to progress, more alert to the problems that beset America. In one sense they have more at stake than any other part of the press of America.

Suburban Newspapers of America sincerely support Senate Bill 1311 introduced March 23, 1971 by U.S. Senator Pearson from the State of Kansas. We agree with the purpose and intent of the bill, with the language used in the bill and with the statement made by Senator Pearson upon the introduction of the bill on March 23, 1971 in Volume 117, at page 41, of the Congressional Record.

Fifteen states now have similar bills granting to newsmen the privilege of sanctity of confidential information received or obtained in their capacities as newsmen engaged actively in the gathering or presentation of news for any newspaper, periodical, press association, newspaper syndicate, wire service or radio or television station.

Protection of this confidential relationship is vital to the gathering and dissemination of news. It is high time that the United States of America recognizes this by an act of Congress protecting said privilege.

The press in general, and newspapers in particular, are vitally interested in having the First Amendment and the rights of the press under the First Amendment clearly spelled out by a Congressional enactment. The late Pentagon Papers decision pointed out the varied philosophies expressed by the U.S. Supreme Court in connection with the First Amendment.

The position of Mr. Justice Hugo Black and Mr. Justice William Douglas was that the First Amendment gives an absolute grant to freedom to the press of America. They base it upon the simple, straight forward, uncomplicated statement of the First Amendment that Congress shall make no law abridging freedom of speech, freedom of press. . . .

These words, according to these two distinguished members of the Supreme Court, meant exactly what they said. They had in mind that the framers of the Constititution were masters of language and were quite careful in the selection of words used in the documents they prepared—from the Declaration of Independence through the Constitution of the United States.

The language used has no reservation of any kind, either expressed or implied, and therefore, must have been intended to be an absolute grant of rights and privileges to the press of America. That grant is for the benefit of the public and the welfare of the nation.

The second position taken in the opinions in the Pentagon Papers case was that there was an absence of an enactment by the Congress of the United States with respect to the situation then before the court. Attention was called to the debates in the U.S. Senate at the time the Sedition Act was originally before that body. In these debates the Senate specifically refused to grant to the government the power of injunction which the government was now seeking to use in these cases.

These Justices of the Supreme Court said that for them to grant the government such injunctive power would be to, in effect, legislate and these Justices refused to permit the court to do so.

All of the six Justices who wrote majority opinions or concurred in the majority opinions felt that the United States government had not met the burden of proof upon it of showing that the national security of the United States was endangered by the proposed publication of the articles then in process.

The burden of proof, these Justices agreed, was upon the government and the government had not sustained this burden of proof.

The Justices did not determine the degree of proof that would be required and presumably the preponderance of the evidence would have been the standard of measurement. It is the opinion of this witness that that degree of proof should be spelled out to require more than a preponderance of the evidence and something closely akin to evidence beyond a reasonable doubt. Freedom of speech and freedom of press are so vital to the preservation of our form of government and our way of life that supression thereof should take place only when the case therefor is clearly established.

The three dissenting Justices of the Supreme Court felt that the matter was being hastily handled and that there were issues of fact that should be resolved by trials in the original district courts. Their comments, therefore, did not go strictly to the question of the meaning and extent of the First Amendment with respect to freedom of the press.

It is the opinion of the Suburban Newspapers of America that the rights and privileges granted by the First Amendment are absolute, save and except in a case where the national security is clearly threatened. In such event, the government should have the right to restrict freedom of the press but only after a showing by a massive preponderance of the evidence that the security of the United States is actually threatened by the proposed publication. In the absence of the sustaining of this burden of proof, the right of the press to publish should not be abbrogated nor interfered with under any circumstances.

We base this position upon the language used in the First Amendment, upon the cardinal rule for construction of documents, and upon the historical background surrounding the enactment of this amendment. We must bear in mind that our forefathers were fearful of a strong central government. They were mindful of the aggressive conduct of the government during the colonial times. They had before them the case of Peter Zenger, the small weekly publisher in New York who dared to criticize the Crown Governor. Andrew Hamilton, a Philadelphia lawyer, won this case by first espousing freedom of the press, a doctrine new to the world.

Each of our forefathers involved in the forging of the Declaration of Independence and of the Constitution had in mind that freedom was the most important right that could be set up and safegurаded in any governmental political document.

Our forefathers were willing to so limit the powers of the central government that they began this union with a loose confederation under the Articles of Confederation. These Articles established such a loose federal organization that the country began to founder. It thus became obvious that a stronger central government needed to be formed and thus the Constitutional Convention met to draft a Constitution for the new United States of America.

At this Constitutional Convention, the founding fathers specifically stated in the body of the Constitution that all powers not specifically granted to the central government were reserved to the people. This was the theme surrounding the drafting of the Constitution.

Even when the Constitution was finally prepared, the body was not satisfied that the rights of the individuals were thoroughly protected.

Dissention arose among the group and it became apparent that the original 13 colonies would not ratify the Constitution until and unless the rights of the individuals were spelled out fully and were protected by amendments to the Constitution.

It was in this atmosphere and with this in mind that the authors of the Constitution prepared the first ten amendments of the United States Constitution, known as the Bill of Rights. If these ten amendments had not been drawn, it is doubtful that the Constitution of the United States would have been ratified by the 13 colonies and that this government would have gotten off the ground.

It is with this atmosphere in mind, and the temperament of the authors of the Constitution before us, that we become aware that the intent of the framers of the Constitution was to have freedom of speech and freedom of the press to be an absolute right and privilege. These framers could conceive of no situation requiring the spelling out of any limitation upon such rights and such privileges. Therefore, they specifically did not limit them in any manner.

The only basis we have for limiting them when national security is endangered is the fact that the underlying factor in the setting up of any government is the right of the government to protect itself against enemies, both foreign and domestic. In order to insure of such protection, the central government has the right to act when its security is jeopardized. That right to act superceded such rights of individuals as freedom of speech and freedom of the press.

However, in order for the central government to so act to suppress or restrict freedom of speech or freedom of press, the duty should rest upon that central government of establishing a weight of the evidence that exceeds a mere preponderance of evidence that the national security is clearly and immediately endangered by such unlimited and unrestricted freedom of speech or fredom of the press. It is only when such a case has been made by the central government that the central government should have the power to restrict in any manner whatsoever absolute freedom of speech and absolute freedom of press.

That the First Amendment was intended to grant an absolute right evolves from the general principle of how to construe documents. Whenever an amendment or an addition is made to a document after it has originally been executed, the amendment or addition controls in the event it is in conflict with, or in derogation of, any part of the original document.

This follows from the very nature of the word amend or amendment. To amend means "to change or modify for the better; to improve". Thus, the very purpose to be served by an amendment is to change or alter the document or to explain the document in clear and understandable language.

This is a recognized principle in determining the meaning of contracts. An addition changing a portion of the original contract prevails over any language in the contract with which the addition conflicts.

The practical principle is that the parties are fully aware of what the original document provides when they draw up the amendment. Since the amendment is later in time and was drawn with this awarness, any change the amendment makes in the original document must have been thoroughly considered by the parties and such change must have been intended.

Illustrations by the hundreds can be used to show the general application of this principle and the basic reasons for doing so. There are specific amendments to the U.S. Constitution in conflict with the general provisions of the Constitution. In each instance, the amendment prevails with respect to such conflict.

The same principle applies to the First Amendment. The framers of the Constitution obviously intended it to be interpreted as written—as a full and complete guarantee of freedom of speech and freedom of press except only in the unusual situation where the national security is immediately and clearly threatened.

While this seeems clear to students of law and students of the history of the formation of our nation, it would be well for Congress to spell this out in clear and unmistakable language. This Sub-Committee has now an opportunity to do so and thus perform a worthwhile service to this nation and its people. This could be a great contribution to Constitutional dialogue and to the preservation of the freedoms we enjoy under the U.S. Constitution.

It is the hope of the Suburban Newspapers of America that this Sub-Committee will initiate legislation that will spell out specifically the nature and extent of the First Amendment with respect to freedom of press and that will delineate and define the meaning thereof. This will offer a guideline for the U.S. Supreme Court and all Federal and State courts to follow in considering matters which arise under the First Amendment. It would be a fitting memorial to the late Justice Hugo Black to do this at the current session of Congress.

We cannot emphasize too much the fact that the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution is one of the keystones upon which this republic is founded. If that amendment is emasculated in any manner, if it is eroded by any act of the U.S. Congress, the executive or the judiciary, then the arch upon which this great form of government rests will be endangered.

We of the press, the written press, the spoken press, the broadcasting press, have a very great and substantial interest in the enactment of legislation that will define and clarify the First Amendment of the United States Constitution and of the rights and privileges which it establishes for the benefit of the public.

We urge you to enact the confidential information protection for members of the press provided for in Senate Bill Number 1311.

We further urge you to sponsor legislation to specifically state that the First Amendment's grant of freedom of speech and freedom of press is an absolute right which can be limited or restricted only when the security of the nation is immediately and clearly endangered and then only after the United Sates has established by a vast preponderance of evidence that the danger to national security by the threatened publication actually exists.

Respectfully submitted this 1st day of February, 1972.

Mr. BASKIR. Mr. Lesher, thank you very much. On behalf of the Senator, I first would like to thank you for appearing and testifying, and again to reiterate his apology for having to leave.

Because the Senate is having a vote, we are not permitted by rules to continue the hearings, so the Senator has asked me to ask the other witnesses who have not had a chance to testify if they would be kind enough to submit their statements for the record.

(The statements referred to follow:)

STATEMENT OF RICHARD W. CARDWELL, GENERAL COUNSEL, HOOSIER STATE PRESS ASSOCIATION, INC., INDIANAPOLIS, IND., PRESENTED BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY, U.S. SENATE, ON FREEDOM OF THE PRESS, FEBRUARY 1, 1972, REPRESENTING NEWSPAPER ASSOCIATION MANAGERS, INC.

Mr. Chairman, my name is Richard W. Cardwell. It is a pleasure to have this opportunity to appear before you and the other distinguished members of this Committee. I have served for 10 years as General Counsel of the Hoosier State Press Association, a membership association of daily and weekly newspapers of general, paid circulation in the State of Indiana. For the past 14 years, I have been an associate in the Indianapolis law firm of Symmes, Fleming, Ober & Symmes. I have been active for several years in the Newspaper Association Managers, Inc., a voluntary society of the managers and directors of national, regional and state newspaper associations. At the present time, I am privileged to serve as President of that group.

I appreciate having this opportunity to discuss the concept of freedom of the press with you today. By way of qualifying myself to do so, I might mention that I attempt to teach about it at two universities; I have researched it in connection with considerable litigation and also to answer in my own mind some of the apparent contradictions about it—largely caused by currently-romanticized versions of history; I read every published decision every year in which freedom of speech or of the press is at issue, and I may be one of the few living Americans who has actually read 1 ANNALS OF CONGRESS, the record of the first Congress, which details the fascinating journey of the Bill of Rights toward enactment.

It is often difficult for some to grasp the full implication of freedom of the press. Implicit in its history, and as developed judicially, it embodies multiple meanings—some of which lie at its core and some of which surround the core and are protected to make those central concepts fully meaningful.

Mr. Justice Harlan, speaking for the Court in Curtis Publ. Co. v. Butts [18 L.Ed. 2d 1094, 1107–1108 (1967)], reviewed the meaning and role of the First Amendment guarantee of freedom of the press very succinctly—and correctly, in my opinion—by stating:

"The modern history of the guarantee of freedom of speech and press mainly has been one of a search for the outer limits of that right. . . . That concern has perhaps omitted from searching consideration the 'real problem' of defining or delimiting the right itself.

"It is significant that the guarantee of freedom of speech and press falls between the religious guarantees and the guarantee of the right to petition for redress of grievances in the text of the First Amendment, the principles of which are carried to the States by the Fourteenth Amendment. It partakes of the nature of both, for it is as much a guarantee to individuals of their personal right to make their thoughts public and put them before the community as it is a social necessity required for the 'maintenance of our political system and an open society.'" [our emphasis]

The personal right of individuals to make their thoughts public, embodied within the core concept of freedom of the press, has been broadly developed. It includes absence of prior restraint on publication [Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697 (1931)]. To make the right more fully meaningful, courts have extended it to include a right to make lawful distribution [Lovell v. City of Griffin, 303 U.S. 444, 58 S. Ct. 666, 82 L Ed. 949] and a qualified right to publish anonymously [Talley v. California, 362 U.S. 60, 80 S. Ct. 536, 4 L. Ed.2d. 559]. That personal right also includes the right not to publish that which one does not wish to publish. This concept was summed up perfectly by Judge Marovitz of the United States District Court in Chicago, Illinois, when he said:

"The right to free speech was never intended to include the right to use the other fellow's presses . . ." [Chicago Joint Bd., etc. v. Chicago Tribune Co., 307 F. Supp. 422, 429]

My major concern for the future of freedom of the press is that this basic personal-right concept is getting lost in, or could be swallowed up by the social-necessity concept.

I have the feeling that if freedom of the press is undermined in this nation judicially or legislatively, it will not occur so much from malice as from confusion.

The social-necessity concept—that freedom of the press is required for the 'maintenance of our political system and an open society' is what all the flap about "right to access" is about—a desire in some to subordinate the personal right of those using the press to exercise it freely, to the "social necessity" as they see it of furthering some desirable public policy in the dissemination of ideas.

Licensed broadcasters have already been adjudged to have sacrificed a measure of their personal right in the interest of the social necessity of "fairness." That is what Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. F.C.C., [89 S. Ct. 1794 (1969)] means. There, the Court through Mr. Justice White declared:

"It is the right of the public to receive suitable access to social, political, esthetic, moral, and other ideas and experiences which is crucial here. That right may not constitutionally be abridged either by Congress or by the F.C.C." (p. 1806)

Declaring that the purpose of the First Amendment is "to preserve an uninhibited marketplace of ideas in which truth will ultimately prevail" (p. 1806), it maintained that ". . . the people as a whole retain their interest in free speech by radio and their collective right to have the medium function consistently with the ends and purposes of the First Amendment. It is the right of the viewers and listeners, not the right of the broadcasters, which is paramount." (p.1806). [our emphasis]

Similarly, the slogan, "The People's Right to Know", falls within the "social necessity" concept.

This shift toward collective public rights in the guarantees of freedom of speech and of the press, which may have been rather implicit historically, is relatively recent judicially.

It was not until 1965 in Lamont v. Postmaster General [85 S. Ct. 1493] that the United States Supreme Court found a specific First Amendment right in the people to receive information. In striking down a Congressional "communist political propaganda' mail statute, the Court stated:

"We rest on the narrow ground that the addressee in order to receive his mail must request in writing that it be delivered. This amounts in our judgment to an unconstitutional abridgment of the addressee's First Amendment rights." (p. 1496)

In a concurring opinion, Mr. Justice Brennan (joined by Mr. Justice Goldberg), stated:

"It is true that the First Amendment contains no specific guarantee of access to publications. However, the protection of the Bill of Rights goes beyond the specific guarantees to protect from congressional abridgment those equally fundamental personal rights necessary to make the express guarantees fully meaningful . . . I think the right to receive publications is such a fundamental right. The dissemination of ideas can accomplish nothing if otherwise willing addressees are not free to receive and consider them. It would be a barren marketplace of ideas that had only sellers and no buyers." (p. 1497)

I believe there is a public "right to know" implicit in the historic concept of the First Amendment. Yet, what there is a "right to know" and its scope are relatively undeveloped judicially.

Moreover, insofar as the privately-owned printed press is concerned, undeveloped is the question how a public "right to know" and its scope are relatively undeveloped judicially.

Moreover, insofar as the privately-owned printed press is concerned, undeveloped is the question how a public "right to know" under the First Amendment would be, or should be, accommodated to the personal right of those utilizing presses for the dissemination of information under the First Amendment if the two concepts come into conflict.

The Supreme Court has certainly indicated before that a public "right to know" is subject to qualification. In Zemel v. Rusk [85 S. Ct. 1271 (1965)], Chief Justice Warren shrugged off a contention that the Secretary of State's refusal to validate passports for travel to Cuba violated a newsman's First Amendment right to "acquaint (himself) at first hand with the effects abroad of our Government's policies, foreign and domestic, and with conditions abroad which might affect such policies." He replied that no First Amendment right was involved because the inhibition was on action.

"There are few restrictions on action which could not be clothed by ingenious argument in the garb of decreased data flow. For example, the prohibition of unauthorized entry into the White House diminishes the citizen's opportunities to gather information he might find relevant to his opinion of the way the country is being run, but that does not make entry into the White House a First Amendment right. The right to speak and publish does not carry with it the unrestrained right to gather information." (p. 1281)

The Court obviously felt that the public's "right to know", if any, should be circumscribed in particular criminal cases when it instructed courts to order non-release of information about them in the Sheppard case. [Sheppard v. Maxwell, 384 U.S. 333]

Chief Justice Burger, dissenting in last summer's celebrated "Pentagon Papers" cases (New York Times Co. v. United States), jabbed at the Times contention that a First Amendment "right to know" was involved in publication of the secret documents and hinted at the possible conflict between that asserted principle and the action of the press in fulfilling it. He said:

"It is not disputed that the Times has had unauthorized possession of the documents for three to four months, during which it has had its expert analysts studying them, presumably digesting them and preparing the material for publication. During all of this time, the Times, presumably in its capacity as trustee of the public's 'right to know' has held up publication for purposes it considered proper and thus public knowledge was delayed . . . After these months of deferral, the alleged right-to-know has somehow and suddenly become a right that must be vindicated instanter."

It is my opinion that the development of any such "social necessity" meaning of the First Amendment must be accommodated with, and if necessary, subordinated to, the central personal-right concept of the guarantee.

The core meaning of freedom of the press must include the personal right to exercise it. The concept was that from the free exercise of this personal right —from the multiplicity of views—the political system and an open society would be maintained ipso facto.

Contrary to the views of some, I have the firm belief that this concept is still operating in a very vibrant way today. The saving grace of the press in this nation has been its diversity. There have always been so many tongues that—absent cutting them out—government could not still them all even if it had the desire to do so. Goodness knows, the press in all its facets is still "cantankerous, obstinate and ubiquitous" enough. It couldn't even reach any uniformity of agreement about the merits of one of the most serious attacks against it in history last summer in the "Pentagon Papers" cases. And certainly this committee has gotten a hint of the press' diversity in various testimonies about the desirability of the "newsman's shield" bill [S. 1311] which is before it.

Any one with any sense knows—or should know—that the quickest and most effective way to unleash a torrent of discussion by the press is by trying to silence it. I always recall the plight of the judge in New Mexico who cited a columnist for contempt for something he had written the judge felt reflected on him, only to be immediately barraged by press comment from hundreds of newspapers, all infinitely more contemptuous than the original statements.

In my view, the press itself is partly to blame for subliminating its personal rights. Too often accused of "wrapping itself in the First Amendment," too sensitive to allegations of personal advantage, its public-relations consciousness has responded by reminding others that freedom of speech and of the press is a right "of all the people and not an exclusive perogative of those who are engaged in the business of news dissemination," and that "it is a right of the people and not of the press."

It is correct that freedom of speech and of the press is a right of all the people. It is not correct that it is not a right of those engaged in the business of news dissemination. They obviously exercise it every day on the assumption that it is.

Freedom of speech and of the press includes the personal right of anyone, including the press, to freely communicate with others who will listen. I see no necessity for any apologies.

That kind of self-induced confusion confuses others too, such as the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. To the contention that a trial court anti-photography order violated the newspaper's freedom of the press, it replied:

"However, as pointed out by Erwin D. Calnam, Editor of the Christian Science Monitor, 'freedom of the press is not a right of the press. It is a right of the people!'"

Therefore, it intimated, the press has no right to assert its right to freedom of the press. [In re. Mack, 126 A. 2d 678, 681 (1956)]

Similarly, the Florida Supreme Court, answering a contention that an unrestricted rule of venue could result in a multiplicity of suits which would seriously injure constitutional freedom of the press, stated:

"Freedom of the press was never intended to be a special privilege extended to its publishers. On the contrary, it was conceived by the writers of the Constitution and of the Bill of Rights to be a right of the people in a democracy to unrestricted information and presentation of views on government for which the press was a tailor-made medium of dissemination. Freedom of the press, therefore, is a people's personal right rather than a property right." [Firstamerica Development Corp. v. Daytona Beach News-Journal Corp., 196 So. 2d 97, 99 (1966)]

That's the type of preposterous confusion which bothers me, but it is bound to happen when one understands the guarantees of freedom of the press only in the narrowly restricted "social necessity" sense.

A tentative example occurred in Congress last year in connection with the "Federal Election Campaign Act" [H.R. 11060]. A section of that bill would have provided that if the privately-owned printed press made space available to one candidate for federal elective office in connection with his campaign, it than had to make equivalent space available on the same basis to all legally qualified candidates for the same office. [Sec. 103 (b) (2) of H.R. 11060]

It was defended on the House floor by a Representative who stated:

"Now, then some would attempt to stretch in some peculiar way the first amendment to some kind of protection to the newspapers to do precisely what they want to do with respect to using space. What the First Amendment protects is the people's right not to have their right of free speech abridged. It is in plain terms. It says that Congress shall make no law abridging the right of free speech." [Congressional Record, House, H. 11430, November 29, 1971]

That section was nothing more than a legislative attempt to socially engineer the dissemination of ideas at the expense of the personal right of the press to decide what it does, and does not, wish to publish. I believe that the First Amendment does give the privately-owned printed press the precise right to do what it wants with respect to using space.

We have a good mutual deal going in this nation. The press can tell legislators what they should do and criticize them for what they have done, but the press can not vote on the floor. Legislators can tell the press how they think it should operate and criticize it when they think it is not operating properly, but the First Amendment tells legislators they can not operate it.

But, if the press is simply some tool to further the maintenance of a political system and open society as a "social necessity", then government can operate it to an extent.

Licensed broadcasters certainly know this. The Federal Communications Commission is statutorily proscribed from censoring program content, but it can engineer "fairness" as it sees the social necessity for it.

There is, of course, no licensing mechanism for the privately-owned printed press, nor could there be constitutionally. But if the personal right of the press to decide what it will, or will not, publish can be circumscribed in some manner in the interest of "social necessity," then the question necessarily arises: if the press alone can not make such personal decisions, who else can?

The answer, inevitably, is government, since only it has the structure and power to promote the general welfare. The personal right of the press can only be substituted to some undefined degree by the power of government to decide what is socially desirable in the dissemination of ideas.

If that day comes, then a free press will be a mockery.

STATEMENT BY CHARLES A. PERLICK, JR., PRESIDENT, THE NEWSPAPER GUILD, AFL-CIO, CLC, BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS OF THE SENATE, COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY, TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1971

I am Charles A. Perlik, Jr., President of The Newspaper Guild. The Newspaper Guild is the union which represents some 40,000 news and commercial department employes of newspapers, new services, magazines and related enterprises in the United States, Canada and Puerto Rico.

As the only national organization of working newspapermen in the United States (we use the term newspapermen generically), The Newspaper Guild since its founding in 1933 has had a deep and abiding concern and has worked to assure that the press be truly free of any influence that would subvert its right to gather and disseminate news and opinion—whether that influence be public or private, and whether that influence be brought to bear directly or indirectly.

The Newspaper Guild's concern is practical, to be sure. Working newspapermen, it almost goes without saying, have a most immediate and direct interest in the maintenance and application of the First Amendment's guarantee of press freedom. Working newspapermen are the foot soldiers of the press. They most immediately and directly feel the effects of actions which threaten, slow or stop the free flow of information and opinion. Newsmen are threatened with jail—sometimes they are jailed—if they refuse to disclose their information and/or its sources to public authorities or private persons. They feel the displeasure and wrath—sometimes administered physically on their persons—of those who see them as agents of vested interests—public or private in nature —right, left, or somewhere between, in posture. They bear the frustration of restrictions imposed on the gathering and publication of news by press managements unable or unwilling to risk the financial burden that might be incurred through retaliatory action by those who might be offended or annoyed by that news.

The Newspaper Guild's concern for press freedom reflects more than our members' self interest, however. We share those convictions expressed so eloquently at the opening of these hearings in October by this subcommittee's chairman. We have long held that ours becomes less the free society we profess it to be—less a representative democracy—to the extent that there is abridgement of press freedom: freedom to gather as well as publish news and opinion.

The Guild is dedicated to the maintenance and extension of the right of the press to gather and to publish, and to protect its information and its sources of information, without government interference or hindrance.

Internally this is reflected in Article II, Section 1, of The Newspaper Guild's Constitution, which reads:

"Guild membership shall be open to every eligible person without discrimination or penalty, nor shall any member be barred from membership or penalized by reason of age, sex, race, national origin, religious or political conviction or anything he writes for publication."

(We have applied the emphasis to the latter qualification.)

Externally, since the Guild's founding, this dedication has been advanced by The Newspaper Guild and its local unions in a continuing series of actions at the national, regional and local levels and in repeated policy expressions by our annual Conventions.

While the Guild is aware that conflicts periodically and inevitably arise under the First Amendment, our most recent Convention, held in Boston last July, addressed itself to many of the events and issues which gave rise to these hearings and concluded that "the principle of freedom of the press * * * is under grave and unprecedented attack in the United States and Canada."

Among the occurrences cited by our 1971 Convention in arriving at this conclusion were subpenas for used and unused notes, films, tapes, photographs and files; attempts to compel disclosure of the sources of information and materials gathered; what the Convention described as the "incredible actions of the government in attempting to muzzle newspapers in the Pentagon Papers cases," abuses of press credentials by military and law enforcement agencies, and the physical abuse of newsmen by agents of the public and private citizens alike. (The complete texts of the pertinent '71 Convention's resolutions, titled "Freedom of the Press and Police Press Relations," are appended to this text. I offer them for the hearing record.)

This committee is expert on the constitutional and sociological arguments favoring the full and free flow of news and opinion in a free society such as ours.

At the risk of belaboring the obvious, however, I would like to emphasize a point that all too often, I'm afraid, is forgotten by the very public whose freedoms the First Amendment is designed to ensure and protect:

The purpose of the First Amendment's free press guarantee is not to create a special privilege for newspapers and newspapermen. Its purpose is to ensure that the public may be informed of events which may affect it and of what its government is doing in its name and be free to express itself thereon, for good or for ill. Flowing from that, to the extent necessary to ensure that the public may be informed, we believe that the First Amendment does create unique rights for newspapers and newspapermen in our society.

One of these rights, championed by the Guild for the past 37 years, is the right of newsmen to protect their information and materials as well as their sources from forced disclosure—a right presently being challenged by the government before the Supreme Court, as you are aware. (The Guild has filed an amicus brief with the Court.)

It is the Newspaper Guild's position that this right is absolute and unqualified, and that it applies to any information or source, confidential or not.

Demands for disclosure of newsmen's notes, tapes, films, photographs or files, or for disclosure of their sources whether made by the government or by private persons, endanger the trust between newsman and news source. And that trust is essential both to the ability of the press to provide the public the information to which it has a right under the First Amendment and to the newsman's ability to carry out his function under the First Amendment.

The basis for our position was laid down by the Guild's first annual convention in 1934 when it adopted a Code of Ethics affirming the newsman's obligation to "refuse to reveal confidences or disclose sources of confidential information in court or before other judicial or investigating bodies." That position was reaffirmed by our 1959 Convention, which noted that a anewsman who discloses confidences and/or sources can expect to "soon be unable to collect the information necessary to give meaning to a free press * * *."

The 1969 Guild Convention, reacting to the first signs of what became a trend, cited its belief that the Bill of Rights "should permit a newsgatherer to protect both the ethics of his craft and his own future ability to practice it" and condemned "any attempt by the courts or law enforcement agencies to use newsgatherers as arms of the court."

By the time the 1970 Guild Convention met we were in the middle of a virtual flood of demands that newsmen disclose their information, materials and sources not only to law enforcement bodies but to defendants as well. And some newspaper managements had been turning over files, containing published and unpublished photographs, verified and unverified information, the names of soures, etc., to governmental agencies—sometimes without any subpena being involved—without so much as the courtesy of informing the newsmen involved. (This subcommittee has heard from at least one publisher who apparently sees no possible problem in this type of activity.) Some subpenaed newsmen had also been refused support by their publishers in resisting subpenas.

These events resulted in a pair of actions by the 1970 Convention.

In one we committed the Guild to negotiating specific contractual provisions to forbid a publisher to disclose file materials without permission of the newsgatherers involved and to require a publisher to support a newsman refusing to honor a demand for disclosure and to guarantee that the newsman will not loose his income and employment as a result of that refusal.

At the same time the 1970 Convention, while calling for enactment of legislation to protect a newsman's rights against forced disclosure "when careful study indicates conditions to be favorable to its passage," cautioned that legislation crippled by qualifications "may be worse than no law at all."

Senate Bill 1311 in its present form, in our opinion, falls into that category I just mentioned: legislation that may be worse than no law at all.

S.B. 1131, like bills introduced in the last Congress, is in our opinion so full of exceptions and qualifications that we fear it would invite prosecution against newsmen rather than protect their rights—that it would contribute to the destruction of the purpose it purports to serve. S.B. 1311 in fact appears to us to be more restrictive than rulings by some courts in recent years.

In any event, it is our opinion that enactment of any "privilege" legislation while the Supreme Court is considering the matter, is premature. We do not believe in legislation for legislation's sake.

Briefly, some of the difficulties we see in S.B. 1311:

It would restrict the privilege against compulsory disclosure of information to information which is "confidential." We are at a loss to see how in a great many instances a newsman or anyone else can properly sort out that which is "confidential" from that which is not. Not much information gathered by a newsman in the course of his daily activity comes neatly labelled.

Had this bill been law last summer, it seems to me, its explicit denial of privilege for information "which has at anytime been published . . ." might well have enabled the government to "inspect and copy" the Pentagon Papers in the New York Times's possession as it sought to do. Once the first story on the Papers had been published U.S. District Court Judge Murray I. Gurfein might well have been precluded from refusing as he did to allow a government "fishing expedition" (his words) into the Times's files.

The bill's explicit exemption from protection of the source of information required by law to be kept secret would seem to invite prosecution in many instances, such as those involving grand jury investigations, while hampering the press's ability to continue to carry out its traditional role of exposing the subversion of the public good to private interest, as has been known to occur behind legally closed doors.

And the bill's provisions for total disvestiture of privilege for both source and information in cases involving "threat to human life, espionage or foreign aggression" are much broader than recent court rulings. In the Caldwell case, for instance, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that there must be a clear showing of a compelling and overriding public need that cannot be served by any alternative means before disclosure can be required.

The bill seems to us to invite investigators to seek to let newsmen gather their evidence, turning reporters and photographers into unwilling agents of the government or other interested third parties.

If at some time, soon or not so soon, legislation to protect newsmen's rights against forced disclosure seems necessary, this bill might accomplish what it sets out to do if the word "confidential" were strickened from its statement of purpose and from line 9 and at the same time all of Section 4 and references to it in Sections 2 and 3 were deleted.

We fail to see how anything less than absolute privilege can be justified under the First Amendment. I am not aware of any foreign aggression against the U.S., espionage against our nation, miscarriages of justice or lives lost because the press refused to disclose information it had gathered or its sources and which might demonstrate otherwise.

The point I emphasized earlier on the purpose of the Constitution's press freedom guarantee applies equally to the issue of prior restraint on publication raised by last summer's Pentagon Papers cases as it does to newsmen's rights against forced disclosure.

In analyzing the actions surrounding publication of the Pentagon Papers there is a corallary that seems especially appropriate: that just as the public has the right to know about the operations of its government, so do its elected representatives in the Congress.

Once government censorship of the press and denial of information to the public's elected representatives abridges the public's right to know, two equally disastrous consequences are inevitable.

First, as I pointed out earlier, we become, to the extent of that abridgement, less a representative democracy than we profess to be.

And not only the credibility of the press, but also, more importantly, the credibility of the government itself, is destroyed.

We do not contend, of course, that the government does not sometimes need to act in confidence and even classify some of its papers against disclosure, particularly in matters involving the national defense.

But any system for the clasification of such documents: (1) must be narrowly defined and responsibly applied, (2) must ensure periodic review and declassification, and (3) must provide for effective challenge of, and relief from, the decisions of those officials who have the initial responsibility for administering it.

We think the system's declassification process would operate best under an independent review unit with the power to make public any document classified for two years unless the necessity for maintenance of the classification is demonstrated by the classifying agency. Any document for which such proof is not made or offered should be automatically declassified.

The government's present classification system, though improved and reformed in recent years, does not meet the above criteria. Classification is imposed on some information unnecessarily, and on other information mistakenly, and the government has not been above utilizing it to attempt to manage the news. In fact, as pointed out in the press at the time of the Pentagon Papers incident, the substance and some of the precise details of nearly everything printed from the Pentagon Papers was published while it was happening, apparently deliberately leaked by persons in the administration.

While it may once more be belaboring the obvious, we must never forget that our system of government is based on a delicate system of checks and balances between legitimately contending interests. And under our system classification and publication are and must remain separate questions; the first regulated by law, the second protected by the First Amendment.

It would be foolhardy, of course, to deny the hypothetical possibility that there might be occasions justifying prior restraint on publication. The courts, including the Supreme Court, have suggested and the defendants in the Pentagon Papers cases have conceded that prior restraint might conceivably be justified in cases involving such matters as current information on wartime battle plans, troop movements and the like.

However, it would be equally irresponsible to forget that voluntary press censorship has served our nation well during wartime, without the necessity of prior restraints on publication, and can be expected to continue to do so if the occasion arises in the future. Like the government, newspapers have their own systems of internal checks and balances that serve to restrain them from precipitate action.

As the chairman noted in opening the first round of these hearings last fall, tensions of yet another kind have arisen between newsmen and public officials in recent years in some parts of the country—tensions over abuses of press credentials, involving both their issuance and use.

A press credential—or press card—is, or at least is supposed to be, simply a document which a working newsman can use to readily identify himself as such in a situation where it is necessary to establish that identification.

Press cards differ in form and format from locale to locale and the method by which they are issued or obtained, as well as their source, also differs from one city or part of the country to another.

Tension surrounding the issuance of press cards is most prevelant in places where law enforcement officials have a hand in their issuance, and seems, where it exists, usually to vary in intensity in direct proportion to the degree of those officials' involvement.

Press cards generally are issued in one of three ways.

Some papers design and issue their own.

The chairman noted in his remarks last fall that members of the Newspaper Guild in Madison, Wisconsin, last summer voted unanimously to destroy their press cards that had been issued by the Madison police department.

The paper for which those Guild members work, The Capital Times, is now one of those which issues its own press cards. These new cards, like those similarly issued, carry the designation "Press Card" at the top of one side, state the newsman's name and the fact that he is a newsgatherer in the employe of the Capital Times. There is a place for the newsman's photo on that side, too, and at the bottom, the signature of the executive editor. On the reverse side is space for the newsman's signature along with vital statistics: height, weight, color of hair, eyes, etc.

When we checked with Madison members last week they reported no more problem establishing their identity with their new press cards than they had had with the old.

Under a second method, a newsman receives from his employer a press card, carrying both his and his employer's identity, but bearing the signature of a public official, most often a police chief or commissioner, attesting to those items of information. In these instances the public official, who issues the card, sends a number of signed cards to someone in a newspaper's management ranks—like a managing editor—and he has a newsman's name, etc., put on the card before the newsman receives it.

Under a third method of issuing press cards, the issuing public agency, again most often a law enforcement body, is requested to issue a card to a newsman identified in the application and the card comes to the newsman minus perhaps only his signature and/or photo. In some instances managements request and receive the card on the newsman's behalf and give it to him. In other instances the newsman himself requests and receives the card directly from the issuing official or agency.

The California Highway Patrol issues a press card under the third method. We understand it is used widely in the state. On the front of the card it issued in 1971 the legend "1971/Press/California/Highway Patrol" is superimposed on a reproduction of a police badge and appears more prominently than the name of the newsman and the paper which employs him.

The reverse side of cards issued under both the second and third methods usually contains a statement to the effect that it has been issued for identification purposes only, a pledge that the holder will abide by orders or directions given him by police in carrying out their duties and perhaps a second pledge that the newsman will return the card if he leaves his present employer. Below all this is a place for the newsman to indicate his acquiescence to those conditions with his signature.

Press cards falling into the third category have produced most of the tension that has risen among newsmen over press cards in recent years.

When newsman must depend on government agents or agencies to obtain press cards—the basic document of their identity—it is in fact a form of licensing and as such is subject to the same sort of abuses as any other kind of licensing.

When The Newspaper Guild, in a resolution by its 1968 Convention, first took official notice of problems involving the issuance of press cards we called for them to be "issued without discrimination to persons employed in gathering news" and condemned their being "withheld (as reportedly occurring in Los Angeles) simply because a law enforcement officer does not like what the reporter writes."

A veteran newspaperman who recently joined the Guild's staff reports that several years ago when he worked in Las Vegas, Nevada, two reporters were denied press cards issued there, at least then, by the police because a "routine" police check revealed that they had police records. They lost their jobs because they couldn't get a police press card, he reports. (There was and is no Guild contract in Las Vegas to protect newsmen from such treatment, by the way.)

Tension also has arisen over press cards issued by law enforcement agencies when in several instances the agencies apparently have not been averse to issuing some to their own agents, enabling them to masquerade as working newsmen.

In several instances law enforcement officials have admitted employing this sort of ruse. In one of the most brazen of their admissions, just about a year ago, the California Justice Department's chief of law enforcement, backed by the state's attorney general, stated that he would not hesitate to have one of his agents pose as a newsman in order to gather information.

Our 1968 Convention voiced the Guild's condemnation of this practice, too, "not only because of its doubtful ethics but because it believes such conduct could destroy news sources and the willingness of the public to be interviewed by authentic members of the press * * * as well as the trust of newsmen in general."

Our 1969, 1970 and 1971 Conventions, repeated the call for an end to the practice, with our 1971 Convention noting that under this practice "the public cannot be sure * * * who is a reporter and who is a secret agent" with "the result, in some cases * * * that the physical safety and the very lives of working newsmen have been placed in jeopardy."

Even if dependence on government agents and agencies for the issuance of press cards had not in any instance had a chilling effect on the press and its practicioners' ability to function freely, the practice is a form of licensing and as such contrary to the First Amendment. The practice should stop. The press should issue its own basic credentials of identification.

Despite the alarms raised by some in recent years over the press's real and imagined shortcomings, the First Amendment's guarantee of press freedom has served and continues to serve this nation well.

I would ask those who seem to favor making the press less free:

Do you really believe that the U.S. citizenry ought to have to depend on the willingness of newsmen to serve jail terms in order to continue to obtain information necessary to fulfill their function of governmental watchdogs?

Do you really believe that news which may be embarrassing to some in public positions ought be cleared with those same officials before it can be published?

Do you really believe that the government ought to have the power to decide who is qualified to gather news?

If anything is called for today, it seems to me, it is an even broader application of the free press protections under the First Amendment, such as has occurred in Supreme Court decisions in libel in recent years.

RESOLUTION BY THE 38TH ANNUAL CONVENTION, THE NEWSPAPER GUILD, AFL-CIO, CLC, ADOPTED JULY 15, 1971

FREEDOM OF THE PRESS

The principle of freedom of the press—which involves the inalienable right of the people to be informed and to make their own judgments on the policies and actions of their government—is under grave and unprecedented attack in the United States and Canada.

In the United Sates, this attack includes the incredible actions of the government in attempting to muzzle newspapers in the Pentagon Papers cases, the recently defeated move to cite Dr. Frank Stanton, President of CBS, for contempt of Congress for his refusal to turn over TV film outtakes prepared in connection with the program "The Selling of the Pentagon," and the various pronouncements of members of the Nixon Administration attempting to justify the administration's apparent policy that the best press is a kept press.

In Canada, even more gross violations of the principle of the free press occurred during the Quebec terrorist crisis of late 1970. One such violation was the prohibition of publication without police authority of photographs or statements issued by the terrorists, or even references thereto. In some instances, Canadian journalists and others were arrested and detained without charges and without bail. The homes of journalists were searched and news material in them seized.

That these events occurred in two countries which have long venerated and respected the principle of a free press has alarmed and dismayed free people throughout the world.

Even more dismaying to people in the United States was the fact that the attacks on the Constitutional guarantees of free press and free speech were carried out by the Attorney General of the United States. John Mitchell, a cabinet officer whose duty it is to preserve, protect and defend the Constitution —not to weaken its guarantees and destroy it.

The 38th Annual Convention of the American newspaper Guild condemns Mitchell's attempts to subvert the Constitution of the United States and demands his resignation or dismissal.

The 38th Annual Convention of the American Newspaper Guild declares that it is self-evident that guarantees of free speech and free press extend not only to print media, but to all media, including, but not limited to, radio and television.

The 38th Annual Convention of the American Newspaper Guild declares that it is its belief that freedom of the press and of speech is inviolable in all countries, and that it is opposed to attempts to censor, muzzle, intimidate or otherwise violate the integrity of the pess or of newsmen in any country—and particularly when such attempts occur in free countries such as Canada and the United States.

POLICE PRESS RELATIONS

For many years, the American Newspaper Guild has been concerned about abuses by some public agencies in their dealings with working newsmen and women.

While many editors, publishers and managers have been concerned with lofty principles, and while Guild Conventions have considered sweeping resolutions, to those men and women who are the foot soldiers in the battle to report the truth, freedom of the press becomes something less than an academic principle when it is abridged by a policeman's club or a rioter's fist.

It may be futile to demand that rioters stop rioting, bombers stop bombing and criminals stop committing crimes.

However, the 38th convention of the American Newspaper Guild demand that responsible authorities bring a halt to abuses against newsmen which include police, military and government agents who harass, intimidate and impersonate newsmen, and who seek to block reporters and photographers from reaching sources of news.

Abuses are legion: the Chicago police often impersonate newsmen—as documented by the Chicago Sun-Times; the Illinois Bureau of Investigation admits it has investigators pose as television news camera crews; Federal Bureau of Investigation agents have posed as reporters with phony credentials; military intelligence agents working on domestic assignments have impersonated television news crews; in San Jose, police have attempted to seize notes and material from reporters covering news activities; and some publishers have failed to resist these practices, and have condoned and encouraged them.

These odious practices undermine public confidence in persons engaged in collecting and reporting news. The public cannot be sure, if these practices continue, who is a newsman and who is a spy, who is a reporter and who is a secret agent. The result, in some cases, have been that the physical safety and the very lives of working newsmen have been placed in jeopardy.

The 38th Annual Convention of the American Newspaper Guild urges all working newsmen to expose such imposters, whenever and wherever they are found.

The 38th Annual Convention also strongly condemns interference by the military and law enforcement officials with newsmen by blocking their free access to areas and activities which are matters of public interest, and therefore, news. In cases where police lines have been established, newsmen must be allowed to determine for themselves that they wish to assume the risk of entering such areas if that is necessary to gather the news.

We congratulate managements and publishers who aggressively resist efforts to obtain information through unconstitutional use of search warrants, subpoenas, and requests to turn over photos and newsmen's notes to the police or to other bodies. But we condemn these other managements and publishers who are undermining the very principles they espouse when they speak of a free press by ordering their employes to turn over unpublished material to agencies outside the news industry.

The 38th Annual Convention reminds all persons in the news industry that the freedom and independence of the press is lost the moment the press becomes an arm of the police, the military or the government.

Mr. Baskir. The Senator has also asked me to say that the subcommittee will reconvene tomorrow at 10 a.m. in room 1318.

Thank you.

(Whereupon, at 12:45 p.m., the subcommittee was adjourned, to reconvene Wednesday, February 2, 1972, at 10 a.m.)

FREEDOM OF THE PRESS

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1972

U.S. SENATE,
OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY.
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to notice, at 10:15 a.m., in room 1318, New Senate Office Building, Senator Sam J. Ervin, Jr. (chairman of the subcommittee) presiding.

Present: Senators Ervin and Hruska.

Also present. Lawrence M. Baskir, chief counsel, and Bill Pursley, counsel; and Stanley Ebner, minority counsel.

Senator ERVIN. The subcommittee will come to order.

Yesterday during the hearings I made certain oral statements. There is always a hazard in making oral statements which is twofold. The person who makes an oral statement may not express himself correctly or he may not be correctly understood by some of his audience.

I refer to certain statements attributed to me, and if I made any remarks justifying those statements, they certainly were inadvertently made. I did not blame the FBI in any way for its investigation of CBS commentator Daniel Schorr. I don't think Mr. Schorr criticized the FBI in any way in respect to that investigation.

Under the laws and the Executive Office, the FBI is an agency of the executive branch of the Federal Government and it is required to make an investigation whenever ordered to do so either by the President as the head of the executive branch of the Government or any person whom it believes is authorized to speak for the President, and likewise when requested by the Department of Justice.

The FBI merely performed its duty in this case. I accept at face value the statement of Mr. J. Edgar Hoover that the FBI was requested by a properly authorized person in the White House to make the investigation of Mr. Schorr with a view to determining his fitness from the standpoint of character and loyalty to fill some Federal office which was not designated to the FBI or to anybody else.

I do agree with Mr. Schorr's observations that before any official, who is authorized by the executive department to request the FBI to make an investigation to determine fitness for the appointment to Federal office, acts, that official should inform the person being investigated of the investigation, of the objective of the investigation, and the office for which he is being considered.

With due respect to everybody concerned, I think there is a certain amount of stupidity demonstrated by investigating a man's fitness for appointment to Federal office without first consulting that individual and ascertaining whether he would accept the office if it is offered to him, but the FBI was not responsible in any way for that stupidity.

The FBI performs a most important function in our country. In the first place, it is necessary for those having appointive powers in the Federal Government to ascertain the loyalty and fitness of an American being considered for an appointment to a public office. Therefore, the FBI has that duty when requested to do so by a proper official.

Furthermore, the FBI is authorized to make investigations at the request of the Department of Justice. The Department of Justice is justified in making those requests whenever they have information which seems to indicate to them that some individual or some group has violated the law or is about to violate the law.

Now, if you had a law that said that the FBI or any other law enforcement agency of the government, Federal or State, couldn't investigate a person or group to ascertain whether circumstances reasonably indicated they were about to violate the law or had violated the law, unless that violation was first established, then in effect, you couldn't have any investigations at all. If the the FBI, or any other agency of government that has law enforcement powers. undertakes to investigate a charge that perhaps I have violated the law or am about to violate the law, they may wind up with a finding after an investigation that I hadn't violated the law and wasn't about to violate the law.

So I just wanted to make these remarks to clarify this situation and to defuse any emotions which might have resulted from anything I inadvertently said or inadvertently was suspected of having said.

Do you have any comments?

Senator HRUSKA. No, I haven't, Mr. Chairman, except to say I regret my inability to have been here yesterday. Other official duties of at least equal importance kept me away. Official duties.

Senator ERVIN. Your absence is fully understandable to the chairman of the subcommittee because the chairman of the subcommittee doesn't know of a single member of the Senate that works any harder than the Senator from Nebraska, and I might add that I know very few in the Congress who work any where near as hard.

Senator HRUSKA. You are very charitable. I hope that is not inadvertent.

(Laughter)

And I know it isn't.

(Laughter)

Senator ERVIN. No that was deliberately made.

Counsel will call the first witness.

Mr. BASKIR. Mr Chairman, our first witness this morning is Mr. Clay T. Whitehead, Director of the Office of Telecommunications Policy of the Executive Office of the President.

Senator ERVIN. Mr. Whitehead became the first Director of the Office of Telecommunications Policy in September 1970. A native of Kansas, Mr. Whitehead received his Ph. D. in management, from Massachusetts Institute of Technology, with concentration on policy analysis and economics.

He joined the White House staff in January 1969. As Special Assistant to the President, his responsibilities included the space program, atomic energy, maritime affairs, communications, liaison with regulatory agencies, and several specific economic and organizational matters.

I want to welcome you to the subcommittee and express our deep appreciation for your willingness to come and give us the benefit of your observations on what I consider one of the most important aspects of our national life.

STATEMENT OF CLAY T. WHITEHEAD, DIRECTOR OF THE OFFICE OF TELECOMMUNICATIONS POLICY; ACCOMPANIED BY ANTONIN SCALIA, GENERAL COUNSEL

Mr. Whitehead. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I am very pleased to be here with you today and to have this opportunity to discuss with the subcommittee some of the aspects of the first amendment which I consider to be an important concern of my office to protect.

I would like first of all to introduce to the subcommittee Mr. Antonin Scalia, sitting at my right, general counsel of the Office of Telecommunications Policy.

Senator Ervin. We are delighted to have him with us also.

Mr. Whitehead. I wish to address my remarks today specifically to the first amendment implications of the two most significant innovations in our mass communications system during the past decade.

The first of these is cable television. Coaxial cable and related technologies enable large numbers of electronic signals—television signals included—to be carried directly into the home by wire rather than being broadcast over the air. There is no particular limitation on the number of signals which can be provided; systems now being constructed typically have the capacity to carry about 20 television channels, and can be readily expanded to 40.

The original use for this technology was "CATV," or community antenna television. As its name implies, that involved no more than the use of cable to carry broadcast signals picked up by a high master antenna into homes in areas where reception was difficult. In recent years, however, use of the technology has progressed far beyond that. Many cable systems now use microwave relay systems to import television signals from far distant cities. Some originate programing of their own, and make unused channels available to private individuals, organizations, schools, and municipal agencies. Looking into the future, cable technology has the potential to bring into the home communications services other than television—for example, accounting and library services, remote medical diagnoses, access to computers, and perhaps even instantaneous facsimile reproduction of news and other printed material. But I wish to focus today upon the immediate consequences of cable, and in particular its impact upon mass communications.

I do not have to belabor the point that the provision of 20 to 40 television channels where once there were only four or five will drastically alter the character of the medium. It converts a medium of scarcity into a medium of abundance. As this subcommittee is aware from earlier testimony, one of the most severe problems which must be faced by broadcasters today is the allocation of limited broadcasting time—allocation among various types of programing, and allocation among many groups and individuals who demand time for their point of view. Cable, if it becomes widespread, may well change that by making the capacity of television, like that of the print media, indefinitely expandable, subject only to the economics of supply and demand.

Of course the new medium also brings its own problems, several of which are immediately related to first amendment concerns. Economic realities make it very unlikely that any particular community will have more than a single cable system. Unless some structural safeguard or regulatory prohibition is established, we could find a single individual or corporation sitting astride the major means of mass communication in many areas.

The second aspect of this new technology which bears on the first amendment is, to my mind, the more profound and fundamental, because it forces us to question not only where we are going in the future, but also where we have been in the past. That aspect consists of this: The basic premises which we have traditionally used to reconcile broadcasting regulation with the first amendment do not apply to cable.

In earlier sessions of these hearings, this subcommittee has heard three principal justifications for Government intrusion into the programing of broadcast communications: The first is the fact of Government licensing, justified by the need to prevent interference between broadcast signals. But with cable, there is nothing broadcast over the air, no possibility of interference, and hence no unavoidable need for Federal licensing. The second is "the public's ownership of the airwaves" which the broadcaster uses. But cable does not use the airwaves. The third is the physical limitation upon the number of channels which can be broadcast in any given area—meaning that there is oligopoly control over the electronic mass media, in effect conferred by Federal license. But the number of feasible cable channels far exceeds the anticipated demand for use, and there are various ways of dispersing any monopoly control over what is programed on cable channels short of controlling content.

In other words, cable television is now confronting our society with the embarrassing question: Are the reasons we have given in the past 40-odd years for denying to the broadcast media the same first amendment freedom enjoyed by the print media really reasons —or only rationalizations? Why is it that we now require (as we in effect do) that each radio and television station must present certain types of programing—news, religion, minority interest, agriculture, public affairs? Why is it that our courts repeatedly intervene to decide, or require the FCC to decide, what issues are controversial, how many sides of those controversies exist, and what "balance" should be required in their presentation? Is it really because the detailed governmental imposition of such requirements is made unavoidable by oligopoly control of media content or by the need to decide who is a responsible licensee? Or is it rather that we have, as a society, made the determination that such requirements are good and therefore should be imposed by the Government whenever it has a pretext to do so? And if it is the latter, is this remotely in accord with the principle of the first amendment, which (within the limitation of laws against obscenity, libel, deception, and criminal incitement) forbids the Government from determining what it is "good" and "not good" to say?

This stark question is inescapably posed by cable technology. The manner in which we choose to regulate cable systems and the content of cable programing will place us squarely on one side or the other of this issue. Perhaps the First Amendment was ill conceived. Or perhaps it was designed for a simpler society in which the power of mass media was not as immense as it is today. Or perhaps the First Amendment remains sound and means the same thing now as it did then. The answer to how we as a nation feel on these points will be framed as we establish the structure within which cable television will grow.

Because the President realizes that such fundamental issues are involved, he has determined that the desirable regulatory structure for the new technology deserves the closest and most conscientious consideration of the public and the executive and legislative branches of Government. For this reason, he established last June a Cabinet-level committee to examine the entire question and to develop various options for his consideration. Not surprisingly in view of the magnitude and importance of the subject, the work of the committee is not yet completed. I assure you, however, that the first amendment concerns such as those I have been discussing are prominent in our deliberations in the committee—as I hope they will be prominent in yours when the Congress ultimately considers this issue.

I now wish to turn to what I consider the second major innovation in our mass communications system during the past decade—the establishment of a corporation for public broadcasting, supported by Federal funds. The ideals sought by this enterprise are best expressed in an excerpt from the report of the Carnegie Commission on educational television:

> If we were to sum up our proposal with all the brevity at our command, we would say that what we recommend is freedom. We seek freedom from the constraints, however necessary in their context, of commercial television. We seek for eduational television freedom from the pressures of inadequate funds. We seek for the artist, the technician, the journalist, the scholar, and the public servant freedom to create, freedom to innovate, freedom to be heard in this most far-reaching medium. We seek for the citizen freedom to view, to see programs that the present system, by its incompleteness, denies him.

In addition to this promise, public television also holds some dangers, as was well recognized when it was established. I think most Americans would agree that it would be dangerous for the government itself to get into the business of running a broadcasting network. One might almost say that the free-speech clause of the first amendment has an implicit nonestablishment provision similar to the express nonestablishment restriction in the free-exercise-of-religion clause. Just as free exercise of religion is rendered more difficult when there is a state church, so also the full fruits of free speech cannot be harvested when the government establishes its own mass communications network. Obvious considerations such as these caused Federal support of public broadcasting to be fashioned in such a way as to insulate the system as far as possible from government interference.

The concern went, however, even further than this. Not only was there an intent to prevent the establishment of a Federal broadcasting system, but there was also a desire to avoid the creation of a large, centralized broadcasting system financed by Federal funds—that is, the Federal establishment of a particular network. The Public Broadcasting Act of 1967, like the Carnegie Commission Report which gave it birth, envisioned a system founded upon the bedrock of localism, the purpose of the national organization being to serve the needs of the individual local units. Thus it was that the national instrumentality created by the act—the Corporation for Public Broadcasting—was specifically excluded from producing any programs or owning any interconnection (or network) facilities.

Noncommercial radio has been with us for over 50 years and noncommercial television for 20. They have made an important contribution to the broader use of communications technology for the benefit of all. The new Corporation for Public Broadcasting has, for the most part, made a good start in expanding the quantity and quality of programming available to local noncommercial broadcasting stations. There remain important questions about the most desirable allocation of the corporation's funds among educational, instructional, artistic, entertainment, and public affairs programing. But most importantly, from the first amendment standpoint, there remains a question as to how successful the corporation has been in avoiding the pitfalls of centralization and thereby of government establishment. Now that we have a few years' experience under this new system, we see a strong tendency—understandable but nonetheless regrettable—towards a centralization of practical power and authority over all the programing developed and distributed with Federal funds. Although the Corporation for Public Broadcasting owns no interconnection facilities, which the act forbids, it funds entirely another organization which does so. Although it produces no programs itself, which the act forbids, the vast majority of the funds it receives are disbursed in grants to a relatively few production centers for such programs as the corporation itself deems desirable—which are then distributed over the corporation's wholly funded network. We have in fact witnessed the development of precisely that which the Congress sought to avoid—a fourth network so-called, patterned after the BBC.

There is, moreover, an increasing tendency on the part of the corporation to concentrate on precisely those areas of programing in which the objection to establishment is strongest, and in which the danger of provoking control through the political process is most clear. No citizen who feels strongly about one or another side of a matter of current public controversy enjoys watching the other side presented; but he enjoys it a good deal less when it is presented at his expense. His outrage—quite properly—is expressed to, and then through, his elected representatives who have voted his money for that purpose. And the result is an unfortunate, but nonetheless inevitable, politicization and distortion of an enterprise which should be above faction and controversy.

Many argue that centralization is necessary to achieve efficiency, but I think it is demonstrable that it does not make for efficiency in the attainment of the objectives for which public broadcasting was established. For those objectives are variety and diversity—almost inherently antithetical to unified control. To choose for public broadcasting the goal of becoming the fourth network is to choose for it the means which have brought success to the first three—notably, shownmanship and appeal to mass tastes. This is decidedly not to say that there should be no nationally produced programing for public television. Some types of programing not offered on commercial television require special talent, unique facilities, or extensive funds that can only be provided at the national level; it is indeed the proper role of the corporation to coordinate and help fund such programing. But both for reasons of efficiency and for the policy reasons I have discussed above, the focus of the system must remain upon the local stations, and its object must be to meet their needs and desires.

The First Amendment is not an isolated phenomenon within our social framework, but rather one facet of a more general concern which runs throughout. For want of a more descriptive term we might describe it as an openness to diversity. Another manifestation of the same fundamental principle within the Constitution itself is the very structure of the Nation which it established—not a monolithic whole, but a federation of separate States, each with the ability to adopt divergent laws governing the vast majority of its citizens' daily activities. This same ideal of variety and diversity has been apparent in some of the most enduring legislation enacted under the Federal Constitution. Among the most notable was the Communications Act of 1934. Unlike the centralized broadcasting systems of other nations, such as France and England, the heart of the American system was to be the local station, serving the needs and interests of its local community—and managed, not according to the uniform dictates of a central bureaucracy, but according to the diverse judgments of separate individuals and companies.

In 1967, when Congress enacted the Public Broadcasting Act, it did not abandon the ideal and discard the noble experiment of a broadcasting system based upon the local stations and oriented towards diversity. That would indeed have been a contradictory course, for the whole purpose of public broadcasting was to increase, rather than diminish, variety. It is the hope and objective of this administration to recall us to the original purposes of the act. I think it no exaggeration to say that in doing so we are following the spirit of the Constitution itself.

Mr. Chairman, that concludes my prepared statement. Thank you very much.

Senator Ervin. I want to commend you on your statement, which raises some of the most serious problems I think we have in understanding the first amendment. You have effectively pointed out that the justifications which we have employed for regulating the broadcasting medium is founded upon factors which do not apply in the case of cable television. I sometimes think we have only touched the outer fringes of what will be possible through cable television. I happen to live in the foothills of the Blue Ridge Mountains and owing to the configuration of the mountains or some other natural conditions that I don't fully understand, I was unable to get some very close TV stations. But by means of cable television, my capacity to hear and see has been vastly expanded. I get many stations that I couldn't get at all in time past. Certainly since cable television does not use the airwaves and since limited frequencies is not a problem for the cable television, I think you make an excitingly fine case for the propositions that whatever justifications there may be for regulations of the broadcasting media, which uses the airwaves, does not apply to cable television.

I think we all recognize that the main purpose of the First Amendment was to afford rights which would make Americans politically and intellectually and spiritually free. We can't escape the fact that the Federal Government regulation of the broadcasting media which used the airwaves results in two things which are somewhat dangerous to liberty. One is that it keeps the broadcasting media at all times under a Damocletian sword, and the other is that it tends to make the government succumb to the temptations to try to brainwash the American people.

The first amendment was designed to allow people to present both sides of a question. I have one illustration drawn from my own experience representing my State of North Carolina which, as you know, manufactures a great deal of tobacco. First we have a political doctor over in HEW who wants to dictate what the Americans should smoke, and I suspect, eat, drink, and wear, though he hasn't gotten to the last three things, and for some reason the FCC has succumbed to his blandishments. They now have a regulation which says in effect that while people can broadcast derogatory statements about tobacco, people who think that tobacco is pretty good can't say anything in favor of it over the air.

Nevertheless, the policy of the FCC is that it has the complete possession of all the truth on this subject and those who disagree with them have none.

I think if the Federal Government adopts such a policy that generally it destroys freedom of the mind. I think the First Amendment was written to implement the concept expressed by Thomas Jefferson when he said, "I have sworn upon the altar of God eternal hostility to all forms of tyranny over the minds of man."

So I certainly agree with you that we need reconsideration of some of these things and we don't want government domination.

Also I share your views about the centralization and control of the public broadcasting system. I am a sort of a lone voice crying in the very confused governmental wilderness at the present time. I don't believe in centralization of power. I am a disciple of Woodrow Wilson who said that liberty has never come from government. Liberty has always come from the subjects of it. The history of liberty is the history of the limitation of government not the increase of it. When we resist, therefore, the concentration of power we resist the processes of death because concentration of power always precedes the destruction of human liberties.

I think many of the liberties of American people have been destroyed by centralization of power.

The public broadcasting presents a real problem. We have some public broadcasting stations, I think we have one here in Washington, WETA, which does a marvelous job with the programs it presents. And, of course, public broadcasting also sits under a Damoclean sword if it is going to be dependent upon Federal appropriations. While many of us profess, as did Voltaire, the sentiment, "I don't agree with a thing you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it," as you pointed out so well in your statement, people don't want views that they don't like disseminated at public expense.

I think it is essential that we keep public broadcasting.

It has a real function to perform and we have got to find some way to make it secure in its financing and also to make it secure against Government control of the contents of what it broadcasts.

I will certainly await with interest your report of your study of these subjects because I think you have put your finger squarely on some of the most serious problems that we have in this field, and which are so closely intertwined with the First Amendment. I like your expression that the First Amendment, whatever you may say about it, it is designed to secure diversity of opinion.

Senator HRUSKA. Thank you, Mr. Whitehead, for your very fine statement. You put many questions very clearly, quite pertinently. I am especially interested in the impact of some of the activities of your office in the light of the First Amendment. In a little while I shall ask you some specific questions on that subject.

Before I do, however, I would like to ask you about this statement that you made during the course of your testimony this morning. It is at the bottom of page 2 of the statement. You say, "Unless some structural safeguard or regulatory prohibition is established, we could find a single individual or corporation sitting astride the major means of man's communication in many areas." Considering modern technology as having broadened the range of CATV, do you see any comparability or do you see any similarity between a corporation that would gather—all the programs that are available and have them for sale, or for distribution to local broadcasting systems or telecasting systems? Do you see any similarity between that kind of a mechanism and the structure that has been created through the years by the Associated Press and by the United Press International and other press services?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I think there is certainly the potential, Senator, for that kind of similarity to arise. Local cable television systems are going to have to obtain their programming from certain sources, their news from certain sources, and I think it is likely that some kind of centralized nationwide organization could spring up similar to what has happened with the Associated Press. This is a distant possibility.

Senator HRUSKA. Well, now, there was a time when the Associated Press and United Press International fell into the displeasure of those in Government who under our laws didn't like monopoly and the things that go with monopoly. That has been pretty well resolved now, hasn't it?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I think it has been in that case. I think there will have to be similar kinds of things considered with respect to cable television to avoid just the problem that I think you are referring to.

Senator HRUSKA. So that if there is a gathering, whether it is by one corporation or by two or by three, perhaps they will not be able to say we will give these programs only to certain stations and we will not give them to others. Perhaps they have gone into the public domain to the extent that AP and UPI have gone and they are not able to discriminate, are they, under the present system?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. That is certainly one very effective way of going about it and it avoids the dangers of direct regulation that we would be very sensitive to in that kind of area.

This is what I was referring to when I said certain kind of structural changes should be made or should be adopted. It is to avoid the very detailed regulatory programs and still avoid the dangers that are implicit in the monopoly kind of situations to which you refer.

Senator HRUSKA. In the quotation that you included from the report of Carnegie Commission on Educational Television, they say, "We seek for educational television freedom from the pressures of inadequate funds."

By what means can that be achieved? After all, we have two sources of funds, I presume. One is from private sources, an organization or a corporate entity of some kind that provides the services that television for education would like to have. There is another source and that is from the public funds over which under our Constitution, thank goodness, the committees and Members of the Congress and the two Houses of the Congress have control.

How can we achieve a freedom from pressures of inadequate funds?

Do you know?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I am afraid I don't know the full answer to that, Senator. The ideal, of course, would be unlimited funds with no restrictions. That is simply incompatible with the traditions of our society. People either have to use their own money or they have to convince other people to give them the money.

Public television today is obtaining funds through donations from corporations, from the listener and the viewer, and from foundations. They are also beginning to receive funds from the Federal Government. However, I think all of those people have a responsibility to ask what that money is being used for. There has to be an answerability, nevertheless. The answerability in the form of private donations is quite simple. If you do not like what you are listening to, you don't contribute any money.

In the case of Federal funds, however, there is a much more ticklish problem which I am referring to. I think we would all have to agree there simply cannot be unlimited funds, that we should provide adequate funds, that Federal Government should be a supplementary source but not the principal source of those funds, and that the Congress does have a responsibility to ask in broad form how those funds are being used and whether those uses serve the purposes the public would like to see served.

In short, I think their desire for unlimited funds has to be just a desire and goal rather than something that can be actually attained.

Senator. Hruska. Well, of course, your reference to the ideal situation being one where there would be unlimited funds provided, that wouldn't fit very well, would it? First of all, there isn't that much money. Secondly, in this country we don't like discrimination. The 14th amendment says everybody should be treated equally and a free press and even an educational television system is but one of our national goals. There have many other national goals, and if we are going to treat everybody equally and give them all unlimited funds, the dollars wouldn't be worth very much, would they?

Mr. Whitehead. We have to make the judgment.

Senator Hruska. You say the Government would want to know what the funds it provides are being spent for.

Sometimes there are prohibitions and restrictions put upon the expenditure of those funds and you say one of those prohibitions specifically excludes the Corporation for Public Broadcasting from producing any programs or owning any interconnection or network facilities.

How meaningful is that prohibition, Mr. Whitehead?

Mr. Whitehead. I think it is somewhat less meaningful than originally intended. Through the devise of wholly funding these activities, the corporation has discovered, not suprisingly, that it has rather great control over what programs are produced and which ones are distributed over the public broadcasting network.

I don't mean to imply that they use that control, for improper purposes, but I simply do refer to the point that one organization is in effect exercising the power that I believe the Congress did not want it to have, and this raises a problem with respect to how we proceed in providing Federal guidance and funding.

Senator Hruska. Do you feel that a system of grants and, of course, the use of the programs from organizations that receive those grants, constitutes an evasion or violation of the statutory prohibition excluding the corporation from producing any programs or owning any interconnection with network facilities?

Mr. Whitehead. No, sir. I don't consider it a violation nor would I consider it a purposeful evasion. I do think, though, that it reflects a rather different spirit than what I understand was intended by the 1967 act.

Senator Hruska. Well, what are your views on creating and implementing a national public TV news show anchored by former NBA newscaster Sander Vanocur for the robust salary of $85,000, presumably per year? I noted this item in the Newsweek of February 7th. What are your ideas on that in the light of the prohibition to which you alluded in your statement?

Mr. Whitehead. Senator, I would prefer not to comment on any particular individual or employee or even any particular show that is put on by public broadcasting.

Senator HRUSKA. Well, then, for the purposes of my question, I eliminate the name of Sander Vanocur.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Thank you, sir.

I think that that type of thing is illustrative of the general problem which I was referring to, to wit when public funds are being used, there has to be some concern about the uses to which the funds are being put. As to the level of salaries, for instance, I think the public generally feels that public services has its own rewards and the use of public funds for paying very large salaries is not compatible with that general feeling.

It raises other problems. Public television has traditionally made use of talents of artists, writers, directors, actors, and so forth, who could command rather great salaries in the commercial sector but who donate or make available their time at a very low level to participate in the very worthwhile activities of educational and public broadcasting. Obtaining large salaries through public funds is going to inevitably discourage that kind of thing and in the process it is going to change the spirit of public television.

Furthermore, I think that to the extent public television wants to be involved in the discussion of controversial political affairs, which is inevitably going to be provided, they simply have to take into account the fact that this is going to make public television itself controversial. They have to weigh the benefits of that and the costs of that.

Along with that is the question of whether Federal funds should be used for this kind of purpose and that raises simply the broad question of principle that I raised in my statement.

So I think there are a number of problems.

Senator HRUSKA. This is a direct attempt. When a grant is made to another entity at least it is not that direct, but when a man is hired as a newscaster, without references to personality, without reference to salaries, when there is created a national public TV news show, wouldn't that seem to be specifically within the prohibitions that say the corporation is excluded from producing any programs?

I don't know much about your telecommunications industry but to a layman it seems where there is a prohibition from producing any programs and then there is, according to this news article, the creation of a national public TV news show, I think they are talking about the same thing, don't you?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Sir, as I said, it is certainly not a violation of the act. It obviously is counter to the spirit of the act.

Senator HRUSKA. It is obviously what?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Counter to the spirit of the act. Technically they are not producing that program. They have given a grant to another entity that is producing the show.

Senator HRUSKA. Well, it wouldn't be my purpose to go into that further because I understand that other committees of this Congress are inqquiring into the matter. Perhaps they have a more specific oversight of the activities of the corporation. And I will entrust that part of the subject to their tender mercies. I think they will give it a good working over. They should.

Now, directing some questions to your statement proper, recently the Federal Trade Commission recommended that the Federal Communications Commission require "counter-advertising" under the Fairness Doctrine. Do you think there are any First Amendment problems with this proposal?

Mr. Whitehead. Yes, sir. I think there are. There are two important First Amendment considerations. One is the growing tendency to discriminate against the broadcasting media simply because of the fact of a Federal license. That raises broad First Amendment problems.

Perhaps more directly there is the question of who is going to oversee this process? How are we going to decide who gets to counter what and whether the person who is doing the counter-advertising is in fact not being deceptive?

Now, product advertising is not considered, I believe, to come under the free speech provisions of the First Amendment. It is not considered to be protected speech.

On the other hand, counter-advertising presumably would be. So there do arise very sensitive First Amendment problems of who is going to oversee the process, who gets to say what about advertising, who gets to do the counter-advertising? It merely moves the FTC's problem back one step and tries to pass over to the FCC what should really be the responsibility of the Federal Trade Commission.

We find this a very disturbing proposal and disagree with it.

Senator Hruska. In the example given by Senator Ervin about the evils of tobacco being considered in a sacrosanct position, no controversy about it at all. It was the FCC who said that, wasn't it?

Mr. Whitehead. That is correct.

Senator Hruska. So they have moved in and have answered the question you raised when you ask who will take charge of monitoring this. They have stepped into that void, haven't they?

Mr. Whitehead. They have.

Senator Hruska. Do you think that is where it should reside?

Mr. Whitehead. We think the decisions on advertising practices should properly reside with the Federal Trade Commission. If you want to regulate advertising, you should do it through your control of advertising, not through the device of Federal licensing and regulation.

Senator Hruska. Where it is a hybrid creature, and the advertising may be a viewpoint and the answer to it an opinion, then we get half and half, don't we?

Mr. Whitehead. That is right.

Senator Hruska. And we don't know whether we should be in one area or the other.

Mr. Whitehead. That is right.

Senator Hruska. Now, on the subject of CATV, I understand that your office had negotiated with interested parties and received various viewpoints on it, and recently a compromise was achieved which would retard CATV growth subsequently and especially in the top 50 markets. How does this square with what seems to be the bright future that is seen for the technology developed by CATV?

Mr. Whitehead. Well, the bright future of any new technology or any new industry always presents a bit of a chicken and egg problem. How do you get the thing geared up to be big enough so that the advantages can in fact come about. The way that the Federal Communications Commission wanted to adopt, is to give cable television some favored treatment on its ability to import distant signals.

Now, as soon as they do that, there are profound copyright questions that arise and the Federal Communications Commission approach is to authorize those distant signals to be imported and to allow special copyright provisions—a compulsory license as it is called.

The compromise that was later reached among the parties, the copyright owners, the cable television people, and the broadcasters, placed some restrictions on the terms and conditions under which this special treatment would be afforded in the top 50 markets. So that viewed in its proper perspective, it is not retarding of cable television in the top 50 markets but simply not giving it such favored treatment in the top 50 markets. The reason for that, in the economics of television production, is that the top 50 markets are essential to the continued profitability of the program production organizations. They have to be assured of making an appropriate profit in those markets if they are going to be able to produce programing at all. The agreement was intended to provide much more freedom and much more latitude for cable television in the markets below the top 50 and to keep the necessary copyright exclusivity provisions in the top 50 markets to assure the program suppliers' economic base would not seriously be damaged.

Senator HRUSKA. Of course, when there has been a negotiation with reference to an interpretation of the copyright laws we get into the field of legislation, the statutes, and then normally when there is a difference of opinion upon that, we refer it to the courts. We go into the courtroom and ask the judge, what do you think this really means? So I presume that this arrangement and compromise which was worked out would be subject to court interpretation?

It would also be subject would it not, to express legislation on the subject where a law enacted by Congress would say this is what shall be. Do I state the case fairly?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Absolutely.

Senator HRUSKA. Now, your office has a responsibility to develop policy for direct to home broadcast satellites. Are there any First Amendment implications of this for the U.S. broadcasters and if so, what are they?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Yes, there are First Amendment implications. On the one hand, we would generally view the expansion of any new outlet of communication as an expansion or opportunity to extend the workings of the First Amendment. However, in this case there is the possibility, because of the economic realities, that direct broadcasting from satellite to home would result in the establishment of a new centralized national television system. It would involve programing to the entire Nation and the economics of this would drive out local broacasting.

Now, this would work counter to the principle of the First Amendment where we want as many local and diverse voices as possible. You have those two competing kinds of First Amendment considerations that need to be weighed.

There is also the international problem which we have to keep in mind. Use of the radio spectrum in space is inherently an international of activity and the United States I am afraid is in the minority around the world in believing the world should be an open society—open to the freedom of information across national boundaries.

There is some movement abroad in international communications circles to try to limit or to forbid the use of satellites for this kind of purpose. We are very diligent in trying to avoid that taking place.

Fortunately this is a problem that is not going to be with us in the immediate future because the technology and the economics of the technology are such that it simply is too expensive for practical use in the foreseeable future.

Senator HRUSKA. Well, it is gratifying that the substances of your answer indicates that future decisions or considerations will be given within the framework of the first amendment. That is encouraging.

What is the administrative financing plan for the CPR? Is personal financing the goal as far as you know? What policy or what thought has your office on that subject?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. We along with most people feel very strongly that long-range financing is essential to setting up the kind of corporation, and kind of public broadcasting system that we want and need in this country. Unfortunately in setting up that kind of long range financing we have to resolve some of these very vexing questions that I discussed in my statement. We have concluded that it is simply not an appropriate time to try to push through a long range financing plan in this session of Congress. We have therefore submitted a one-year extention of the authority for funding of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting at an increased level of funds, up to $45 million from the previous year of $35 million to assure the corporation can continue to grow and continue the healthy development of public broadcasting.

In our bill, which I believe will be introduced today, we have provided that a certain amount of the funds, namely, $15 million, would go directly to the local stations as a matter of right.

Senator HRUSKA. Mr. Chairman, I have a series of additional questions that are along this line. I don't want to burden the record at this point nor to encroach on the time of other witnesses and staff and the Chairman. May I ask unanimous consent that these questions be propounded to Mr. Whitehead for his answers and insertion into the record?

Senator ERVIN. That will be fine. So ordered.

They will be directed to Mr. Whitehead and he can answer them in writing.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I will be pleased to do so.

Senator HRUSKA. I would prefer to do it that way and, if there is no objection, I would appreciate it.

SENATOR HRUSKA'S QUESTIONS FOR MR. WHITEHEAD

1. The Corporation for Public Broadcasting seems to put a lot of emphasis on British Broadcasting Corporation entertainment shows, cultural uplift and public affairs discussions and documentaries. What does this have to do with educational TV? Do you think the Corporation for Public Broadcasting is simply programing for an economic or cultural elite? Is it responsive to the needs of "middle Americans" of all races?

2. What do you consider to be the influence of foundations, such as the Ford Foundation, on public broadcasting programs, operations and policy making? Do you see any "free press" dangers in this? Should foundations be precluded from these activities?

3. How much money has the Ford Foundation directed to public broadcasting activities?

4. How could the Congress best keep tabs on the Corporation for Public Broadcasting's use of federal funds, just to see that there's fiscal responsibility and with no intent to exert improper influence?

5. You mentioned today that the Cabinet Committee on cable TV is studying this or the other fundamental issue and will soon make recommendations. What's holding the report up?

6. Do you know what the cable TV Cabinet Committee is considering to assure that cable development will enhance the opportunities for free expression which you described for us today?

7. What is the Office of Telecommunications Policy's role in advising the Federal Communications Commission on the First Amendment implications of its proposed rules regarding cable program content, access channels and the like?

RESPONSES OF CLAY T. WHITEHEAD TO QUESTIONS RAISED BY SENATOR ROMAN L. HRUSKA REGARDING FIRST AMENDMENT IMPLICATIONS OF PUBLIC BROADCASTING AND CABLE TELEVISION

Question No. 1.—The goals to be achieved for public broadcasting were initially derived from early educational radio and televsion services which developed in response to the educational needs of local communities and the instructional programs of state and local educational entities. The Carnegie Commission on Educational Television built on these educational broadcasting goals and created the concept of public broadcasting, which was intended to include more than classroom instructional services and other strictly educational broadcast services for use outside of the classroom. The intent was to have the Corporation fund programing in a wide variety of fields, including drama, culture, and art. The Congress followed this intent in the Public Broadcasting Act of 1967, although there was some uneasiness expressed about the Corporation's funding of entertainment programing.

In its programing operations, CPB has provided entertainment, "cultural uplift," public affairs and other types of programing. These do tend to appeal to a cultural and economic elite. I think, however, that there is no doubt that the more emphasis CPB gives to instructional services, adult education broadcasts, and programing for the learning needs of children, the more CPB is appealing to a broader, more diverse audience. Both types of programing are desirable; it is a question of emphasis. We believe that CPB should work more closely with the local educational stations to see where the balance should be struck between both types of program services to achieve the greatest benefit to the public.

Questions Nos. 2 and 3.—Foundations, in general, and the Ford Foundation, in particular, have contributed much of the financial support for the development of public broadcasting. No single private or public entity has contributed as much as the Ford Foundation—nearly $200,000,000 in all. Obviously, when any entity—including the Government—spends large sums of money upon an enterprise it looks to see that the enterprise is developing along the lines that it desires. There is nothing wrong about this; indeed, it would be irresponsible for any private or public donor to dispense money willy-nilly, without regard to success in achieving the desired goals.

On the other hand, it is certainly legitimate to question whether it is appropriate for a social institution as important as public broadcasting to be substantially directed along the lines desired by any single entity that is not accountable to the public. The Ford Foundation, for example, is well known to be particularly interested in public affairs programing. Naturally, this interest underlies the Foundation's funding decisions and affects the balance among various types of programs that are made available to the public.

The inappropriateness of dominant influence by a single private source—however benevolent that source may be—is one of the reasons the Administration believes that public financing for public broadcasting should be established on a sound, fiscally responsible and stable basis.

Question No. 4.—In 1967, when the Congress enacted the Public Broadcasting Act, a question was raised as to how the Congress could maintain responsibility for CPB's use of Federal funds. The matter was resolved by including a provision in the Act allowing for an audit of CPB by the General Accounting Office. To my knowledge, Congress has not used that provision.

Question No. 5.—The President's Cabinet committee on broadband cable television was formed in June 1971, and has spent a considerable amount of time analyzng the fundamental and difficult policy matters which it must resolve in order to make its recommendations to the President. There has been steady progress in the committee's work, and there is nothing "holding up" its recommendations except the complexity of the task.

Question No. 6.—The Cabinet committee has considered a number of different approaches for cable development which will enhance opportunities for free expression. While it would be inappropriate for me to discuss the details of the committee's current deliberations, I can highlight some of the First Amendment objectives that public policy should set for cable television. One of the most important objectives is to facilitate access to cable channels for both program production and program reception. Another objective is to guard against the dangers posed by the fact that, in most instances, provision of cable transmission services will be a natural monopoly. Furthermore, as cable develops over-the-air broadcasting must be allowed to continue to provide essential public services that will contribute to the total diversity of programing and program sources.

There are various ways to achieve these First Amendment objectives for broadband cable development. There could be broadcast-type regulation for cable, with use of the Fairness Doctrine, paid access requirements, program "anti-siphoning" rules, etc. A strict common carrier approach could also be chosen, which would require complete separation of program supply and distribution functions. Another approach may be to require vertical disintegration of the program production and program distribution functions, in order to avoid excessive concentration of control over the access to cable channels. Other approaches and variations on the above are also possible.

Whatever the approach ultimately chosen, the Cabinet committee will be guided by the fundamental goal of fostering the opportunities for free expression which broadband cable promises for the future.

Question No. 7.—OTP has not advised the Federal Communications Commission on the First Amendment implications of the FCC's new rules regarding access channels, cable program content, and other cable services not related to the retransmission of television broadcast signals. The Administration's views on these aspects of cable television will be based on the Cabinet committee report. As I noted earlier, free speech considerations are prominent in the committee's deliberations.

While we take no position at this time regarding those aspects of the FCC's proposed rules not related to retransmission of broadcast signals, we nevertheless support prompt implementation of the entire package, with broad industry support. We think this is essential to enable the development of this promising new technology to proceed.

The framework and national policy for cable regulation is a matter of crucial importance to our society, and it requires the most careful congressional consideration as a matter of mass media structure. The FCC rules will serve to permit cable growth while that deliberation is proceeding and yet not foreclose the opportunity for congressional review and readjustment of the long-run policy. Indeed we would not urge final implementation of the FCC's new cable rules if we thought that this would have the effect of foreclosing any practical evaluation of a broad, long-range policy for broadband cable technology. We believe, however, that implementation of the rules will not have this effect, and that the FCC rules could serve as a transitionary approach to the ultimate public policy treatment of cable technology.

Senator ERVIN. Mr. Whitehead, I will have to admit you have confused me a little by making the distinction between freedom of speech generally and freedom of advertising. I think you and I would both agree that the First Amendment gives every American the right to make a political speech in which he says my religious views are good for my country. Don't we?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. What provision of the Constitution says to an manufacturer, you are to be forbidden by a Federal agency to say that the goods you produce are good for the country?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I don't think there is any problem with that, sir, and my general counsel, has just flagged the same problem for me. Not being a lawyer I am a little bit at a loss in grasping all the technicalities.

Senator ERVIN. I will have to confess I can't see a valid distinction between a man saying, my political views are good for the country, and a man saying my product is good for the country.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I certainly have no problem with that in principle.

Senator ERVIN. You don't have a problem with it?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. No, sir.

Senator ERVIN. Nevertheless, you say the Federal Government can determine the truth of the latter but not of the former?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. No, sir, that is not what I am saying. I think the advertiser certainly has the right to say to the public what he wants to say. I just was under the impression that there were certain restrictions that were placed on that right and I may have been wrong.

Senator ERVIN. Well, the FCC has required certain people producing certain gasolines who advertise that their gasoline is good for the motor, to present as a part of their advertisement information indicating that their gasolines pollute the atmosphere.

Now, I don't know what your views are on that but my view is that action is polluting—that is, FCC requirements of that kind are polluting freedom. In my opinion, polluting freedom is worse than polluting the atmosphere, if we have to make a choice between those two very disagreeable things. If you allow the FCC, or any other governmental agency, to say this product is good and that product is bad, and an advertiser cannot speak up for the goodness of his own product in public broadcasts, I think you are very close to getting to the point of allowing the government to say to the American people, it would be good for you to read this book but it would be very bad for you to read that book because that book might give you some thoughts that the government thinks are improper.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Yes, sir; I agree completely with you in spirit.

Senator ERVIN. Thank you.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. And that was my reason for being so upset and opposing the FTC's proposal which I think carried this use of government regulation and licensing in broadcasting far beyond what was ever intended and far beyond what was sound.

Senator ERVIN. The trouble with governmental power is that those who have it have an insatiable appetite for more power and they abuse power. I think there is less danger in having people abuse freedom of speech than there is in having despotic governmental power because one perceives freedom even though the freedom is exercised and abused, and the other stifles freedom.

Thank you very much.

Do you have any questions?

Mr. Baskir. I would like to followup on some of those points which Senator Hruska and the chairman mentioned. In a speech in October, you had some very very critical things to say about Fairness Doctrine and other legal mechanisms to open up accesses to broadcasters; stronger, I might add, than any of the other witnesses we have heard. You said it was of government control, that the courts, and I guess the FCC, are making broadcasters government agents that to take away the licensee's First Amendment rights and giving the public an abridgable right of access, in essential is, I guess, the First Amendment then becomes what the FCC and the courts say it is.

You also had three proposals which were designed to change the situation. One was with respect to access. If I recall, you wanted to have a statutory right of access, with whoever paying for the time accommodated on a first come first served basis. I think when you made that speech and made those proposals, they were your personal views. I would like to ask you first, are they still your personal views and only your personal views, or do they represent something more from the administration?

Mr. Whitehead. Those are reflective of the broad concern of those in the administration and elsewhere that there are fundamental problems involved in the direction we are taking to regulate broadcasting. Those specific proposals you refer to were my personal proposals and remain my personal proposals. They were put forward because we felt very strongly that this was needed to stimulate public discussion of these very broad questions of how we are regulating broadcasting. Public discussions I think, had become rather bogged down and we felt a concrete proposal, presenting a rather different alternative, would be useful in stimulating public discussion. We thought they were responsible proposals and we continue to think so. However, we are not yet prepared to take action on them because I don't think we have had sufficient public discussion to justify pushing those specific proposals forward and trying to get them adopted at this time.

But we do think that these proposals and like proposals should receive very serious public consideration.

Mr. Baskir. On the right of access, your proposed statutory right of access in place of the Fairness Doctrine and various other things, as I recall, was based upon requiring the broadcasters to sell time to whoever asked for it and had the money to pay for it.

Now, the Federal Trade Commission has proposed to the FCC a similar proposal but they added another item, that some of this time should be offered free of charge. I wonder what your views are on that?

Mr. Whitehead. The problem of requiring a broadcaster to provide time free of charge is that the only place that can be done is the government. Therefore you get right back into the problem of government power over the content of speech that I was referring to earlier and the chairman alluded to.

This is just a very serious and very sensitive problem. The spirit of the proposal that you are talking about was to limit the Fairness Doctrine in its application to program time and not to use the Fairness Doctrine as a way of obtaining the right of access for an individual to have time to express his point of view. The Fairness Doctrine is intended to assure various points of view are expressed. It was never intended to be a mechanism whereby a person could claim the right of access to a television screen. The proposal I made was an attempt to illustrate that and provide a different access mechanism that would avoid the Federal Government getting involved in the very detailed determination of who gets that right of access. The proposal would also avoid undermining the economic structure of broadcasting by requiring all sorts of free time to counterbalance people who have paid for time or simply claimed right of access.

Mr. BASKIR. How would you handle the problem, which I gather the Trade Commission's proposal is aimed at, of getting points of view across from people who do not have enough money to buy time? There are very important points of view, I expect which cannot command funds in the public marketplace because——

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Well, first of all——

Mr. BASKIR. They are not attractive from the commercial points of view, so the people who hold them can't find the money to buy the time.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I think most points of view if they are sufficiently important do attract funds. But recognizing that that may not always be the case, that is precisely why we have the fairness obligation placed on the broadcaster as license.

As long as we have the current system of broadcasting with the limited number of channels, the FCC is going to have to decide who is the qualified licensee. I think in making that determination, a very important aspect of it is the question "has that licensee been fair?" Has he covered the controversial issues and has he made sure that all sides are fairly presented? We would like to have the licensee cover points of view and assure that they are covered if the money is not forthcoming to buy time for that purpose.

Mr. BASKIR. This is the second part of your proposal? The straight statutory purchase of time would not be the complete test.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Oh, no, of course not. When I made those proposals I made it very clear that they were interrelated. These are very complex matters and as you start discussing issues and proposals, you find that they begin to overlap and interlink so you can't always ascribe one issue to one particular proposal.

Mr. BASKIR. Your third proposal was that we start deregulation by taking some parts of broadcasting—I think you were suggesting certain major broadcasting markets perhaps certain portions of the FM band—and deregulate those. It seems to me that the logic of your speech and your statement today would suggest that you want to propose deregulating all of the broadcasting rather than just portions of it.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. There is unfortunately rarely a clear line that you can draw between something that has to be regulated and something that does not need to be regulated. In broadcasting it is more a matter of degree. I think that television, for many reasons is unique and probably is going to continue to have to have a significant amount of Federal regulation.

My proposal was on radio broadcasting. I pointed out that it is quite different from television. It is a case of the tail wagging the dog. We are now regulating radio as a kind of secondhand television. We don't think that is appropriate. But most appropriately of interest to this committee, we gave great weight to first amendment considerations in developing the proposals.

In radio we have a multiplicity of outlets. In almost every community there are more radio voices available than there are, say, newspaper voices. We have a strong belief in this country that the viewer, the listener, the consumer has a certain amount of good sense and can decide what he wants to listen to and what he doesn't want to listen to and discriminate between what he is hearing and what doesn't want to hear.

We simply felt from a First Amendment standpoint and from an economic standpoint, in view of the opportunity for competition in radio, that there was much less need to regulate radio in the great amount of detail that there is in television and probably much less need for all that red tape than you might think from having it there.

Unfortunately that is the kind of thing that is impossible to prove. We could study it for 10 years and never develop, I think, a convincing case one way or the other. We therefore propose to try an experiment in several areas of the country to move as far as we thought prudent within the law, of course, to remove as many of the regulations as seemed prudent and to follow the program, to see what happened. Does the service to the public improve? Or, does the Federal Government need to look over the public's shoulder and tell the public what they will have.

We simply think that kind of thing ought to be tried so that we will know which direction we ought to be going in.

Senator Ervin. Thank you very much for a very illuminating and very penetrating analysis of the many complex problems that arise in this field under the First Amendment.

Mr. Whitehead. Thank you, sir.

Senator Ervin. You may call the next witness.

Mr. Baskir. Mr. Chairman, our next witness this morning is Miss Edith Efron.

Senator Ervin. We are delighted to welcome you to the subcommittee and appreciate your willingness to express views which were very entertainingly set forth in your book, The News Twisters, You may proceed in your own way, Miss Efron.

STATEMENT OF MISS EDITH EFRON

Miss Efron. Just one prefatory comment. I speak here as a private citizen, not as a representative of my publication.

Mr. Chairman, members of the committee: A view has crystallized in this country that the bias controversy is a relatively new phenonmenon, spawned by a repressive Nixon administration, and bred in the dark shadows of right-wing conspiracies.

This view is a symptom of our antihistorical age, where memories are increasingly confined to the parameters of the daily press.

The bias controversy was actually born in the 1930's with the collectivist concept of public ownership of the airwaves. Until that time, if people did not like the bias of a publication or a news service, they solved the problem by refusing, individually, to buy it—a simple and rational system that still prevails in all media save broadcast news. It is when the people were informed by the U.S. Government that they collectively "owned" the airwaves, and were quasi-proprietors of the broadcast press, that they began to haggle collectively over the political orientation of that press.

The Government took its first drastic action to control bias in 1941, when the FCC, with its Mayflower decision, deprived all American broadcasters of their First Amendment rights by forbidding them to express their own views on controversial issues. This solved the bias problem satisfactorily: there were no longer any controversial views on the air to get excited about. Unfortunately, the solution was more deadly than the problem: it constituted a frontal lobotomy of the entire broadcast medium. America had to endure eight years of Government-induced vacancy in a major communications system—and the marks of the lobotomy have never disappeared—before the error was acknowledged and corrected.

The correction did not take the form of restoring unbreached First Amendment rights to the individual broadcaster: he remained a second-class citizen. It took the form, in 1949, of the fairness doctrine —which allowed the broadcaster to express his own opinions on major controversies, provided that he gave "equal," "equally forceful," and "nonpartisan" coverage to other points of view as well.

And from 1949 to this present day, there has been constant dissension in this country over the problem of fairness in broadcast news. It has been most acute with respect to network news which, by virtue of Government permission and protection, has acquired a monopoly over the nationwide dissemination of the facts and interpretations of American political life.

As a staff writer on TV Guide, I have been covering this constantly simmering antagonism to the political attitudes in network news for ten years. It was a serious problem in 1960. By 1964, under the Kennedy administration, the anger had become so intense that it inspired a congressional investigation. And by 1968, under the Johnson administration, this anger exploded like a bombshell—with nationwide protests being registered over network coverage of the race riots, the Republican convention, the Democratic convention, the antiwar riots in Chicago. The number of Americans by then who felt that network news was biased ranged between 57 and 70 percent, according to polls of the period.

Throughout this remarkable decade of mounting protest, network management has militantly refused to grant that there is the slightest basis in reality for these public reactions. It has attributed them to a variety of neurotic responses ranging from selective perception, through escapist intolerance of bad news, to a hostile desire to kill the messenger who brought the bad news. Apart from this parlor psychoanalysis of the majority of the population, the networks have had nothing to say save to attest with regularity to their own impeccably objective perceptions.

It was in 1968, at the height of the nationwide protests against network bias that I undertook to do a study of my own—a study of how the networks covered the critical two-thirds of the presidential campaign of 1968, the last 7 weeks until Election Day. I was given a small grant to cover taping, typing and research expenses by the New York Historical Research Foundation, and I set to work.

Time does not permit an extensive presentation of my theory and method, but I will mention three points:

First, I concentrated on prime-time news alone, because all studies indicate that these early-evening news programs are the most important source of political information for the majority of the country.

Second, I used an intrinsically journalistic observation as my key test for bias. There is one slanting device known to every editor and reporter in the land. It is this: if a reporter wishes to load coverage of a controversy in favor of a certain position, he will simply stuff his coverage with opinions from those who take the desired position, while giving little or no room to opinions from the other side. There are other far more subtle editorial slanting techniques—in The News Twisters, I name and illustrate 33 of them—but this is the central one on which my entire analysis is based: I did a systematic check on the equity of pro and con opinion on a group of controversial subjects. This test simultaneously served to check on the network's adherence to the fairness doctrine.

Third and last: I selected the major controversial subjects of the period: The presidential race, the war, black militancy, left-wing protest movements, and several sub-aspects of these broad subjects. In classifying opinion on these matters as pro and con, my basic rule was always to conform to the reporters' own classifications where they existed. If, for example, a reporter described an opinion as "heckling" or "opposition" or as "booing," I classified it as antagonistic opinion; if he described it as "endorsement" or "support" or as "cheering," I classified it as favorable or pro-opinion. The great bulk of opinion in the study turned out to be of this variety which already came pre-categorized in one way or another by the reporter. The opinion which I classified independently was usually covert or implicit opinion by reporters.

This, in essence, was my method. I applied it systematically to 7 weeks of network coverage—300,000 words. And the results appeared in The News Twisters. I will not report on all my findings here. Instead, I will give you a close-up view of the results of my investigations into two of the most important controversies of the 1968 period—The Nixon-Humphrey race and the war.

The results on Mr. Nixon alone have caused the greatest consternation. Speaking quantitatively, in terms of simple word-count, the pro and con opinion on the Republican candidate for the Presidency ran as follows: 16 to 1 against Nixon on CBS; 10 to 1 against Nixon on NBC; 8.5 to 1 against Nixon on ABC.

The anti-Nixon opinion is so voluminous in contrast to the pro-Nixon opinion that it verges on the ludicrous. The content of most of this criticism itself cannot be challenged. Most of the attacks on Nixon were journalistically legitimate. They came from Democratic Party and independent party challengers, from assorted Democratic Party politicians, from Democratic union chiefs, and, as such, were a valid part of the campaign.

What was bizarre was primarily the quantity and repetitiousness of the criticism, often in purely optional matters. To illustrate: on CBS, Nixon was charged with telling untruths seven times by political opponents—twice by Hubert Humphrey, twice by Wallace, once by Ramsey Clark, once by Clark Clifford, and once by Lawrence O'Brien. But NBC and ABC deemed such charges newsworthy only three times each. Thus, CBS viewers heard politicians charge Nixon with dishonesty more often than did the viewers on the other two networks put together. All one can conclude is that CBS particularly liked to air this charge.

Similarly, the degree of hostile editorialization about Nixon, his personality, his morality, his campaign techniques, and so on, was quite voluminous. ABC viewers were privileged to hear Mr. Nixon described as a man who went for his enemies' jugular and who would like to assault them with a meat-axe.

Startling as was the vast body of anti-Nixon opinion, even more startling were the pro-Nixon findings. In their way, these are the most deadly.

Here, for example, is a summary of all pro-Nixon opinion from the public and from Republican political figures, carried by CBS TV news during the 7 weeks of the campaign period studied: on only 6 days during the entire 7-week period did CBS news stories include opinion favorable to Mr. Nixon from members of the public.

On only 1 day during the 7-week period—on October 28, towards the very end of the campaign—did CBS news stories include any Republican political opinion which praised Richard Nixon. It came, specifically, from Dwight and Mamie Eisenhower, and from Nixon assistants Patrick Buchanan and Raymond Price.

The picture is even bleaker for Mr. Nixon on ABC–TV. ABC news stories also reported only six times in 7 weeks on opinions favoring Nixon from the public. And as for Republican political figures: once, on October 8, ABC news informed its viewers that Senator Javits supported Nixon. Unless one wants to count Bud Wilkinson as a Republican political figure—there was no more.

Of the three networks, NBC was the most generous. NBC viewers actually heard opinions favorable to Nixon from the public 12 times in 7 weeks. And NBC cited four Republican politicians, on 4 different days, as having favorable attitudes to Nixon. They were: Senator Dirksen, Representative Gerald Ford, vice presidential candidate Spiro Agnew, and State Senator David Stanley.

Given facts like these, one need hardly look at the anti-Nixon opinion at all to know that this was politically biased coverage. The opinions of American citizens who supported Nixon, and the opinions of the Republican Party representatives who were working to elect him President, were simply not on the air.

By contrast, the coverage of Humphrey was fair. Most network newsmen were not enamored of Humphrey—at least not until he had come out for a unilateral bombing halt and won the support of the antiwar groups; but by the end of the campaign period, pro and anti-Humphrey opinion was fairly equitable on all three networks —with ABC and CBS being a touch more friendly, and NBC a touch less. In general, the early sources of political antagonism to

Mr. Humphrey were thoroughly explored by the reporters; and the later sources of support were given a full airing.

My statistical findings on the presidential race have aroused something of an uproar in the country. And inevitably, a great many people are frantically denying their reality and are charging me with writing fiction, most particularly in the area of the Nixon findings. You will be interested, therefore, in the comments made in the winter issue of The Public Interest by Prof. Paul H. Weaver of the Harvard University Department of Government. He writes as follows:

> . . . there are three points to be made about this problem. First, my own inspection of two different samples of Miss Efron's file of anti-Nixon opinion convinces me that, by any reasonable standard, the large majority of such items are in fact quite clearly anti-Nixon opinion; no more than 20 or 30 percent of the anti-Nixon items might be questioned. Nobody has shown that the proportion of questionable items is larger; indeed, so far critics have merely adduced a few extreme examples, as if these were enough to invalidate the entire study. And this brings me to the second point. What is significant about Miss Efron's findings is not the absolute numbers of words pro and con; it is the relative size of the two bodies of opinion. In order to invalidate the finding of a huge disparity between pro-Nixon and anti-Nixon opinion, it is not enough to show that some anti-Nixon opinion has been incorrectly classified —one must show that most of it has been incorrectly classified. Even if one were to find that she had overestimated the amount of anti-Nixon opinion by 100 percent and underestimated the amount of pro-Nixon opinion by 50 percent, there would still be 2.5 times more anti-Nixon opinion than pro-Nixon opinion, a clearly unfair pattern. Needless to say, nobody has yet established errors of this magnitude, and it seems unlikely that anyone will.

You will also be interested in a briefer statement issued to the press on October 27 of last year by Dr. George Weinberg. Dr. Weinberg is a psychologist, a research consultant, a statistician, and author of one of the leading statistics texts in use in American colleges and universities for the past decade. Dr. Weinberg said:

> I saw Miss Efron's research before reading her book and before knowing her conclusions. I found that my judgments coincided with hers well over 90 percent of the time. The great majority of the statements she classifies as pro or con opinion could hardly be classified otherwise. Miss Efron is far more objective, systematic and explicit in her method than anyone known to me who has ever written a book about TV. After examining her data, I believe that any systematic tabulation by any method would result in essentially the same findings.

In brief, I have not been writing fiction.

Given these findings on Nixon the question inevitably comes up: Was this bias deliberate? The answer to this question is complex and I cannot do justice to it in a few words. But briefly my own answer is this: It was not deliberate in the sense of an organized plot or of a conscious cabel. But it was inevitable given the virtually all-liberal composition of network staffs.

During the campaign, Eric Sevareid acknowledged on the air that most newsmen were for Hubert Humphrey—leaving to implication the fact that most were against Richard Nixon. On February 8, 1970, Howard K. Smith brought this implication out into the open. He generally confirmed Vice President Agnew's charges of bias and said this about the newsmen's prejudices: Johnson was politically assassinated and some are trying to assassinate Nixon politically. They hate Richard Nixon irrationally.

I believe that my findings are evidence of such antagonism, that it was so deep and widespread that it contaminated professional decisions—and that network managements must be held responsible for the result.

Now, to examine another subject, briefly—the war.

In The News Twisters, opinion on the Vietnam war is classified under different headings, just as it appeared in network news stories. There is opinion on the U.S. war policy in general; and opinion on the U.S. bombing halt policy in particular.

And once again, we see precisely the same pattern of heavy loading of opinion on one side—and a virtual void of opinion on the other.

In the 7 weeks studied, the three networks carried 72 different stories in which opinion was heard condemning the U.S. policy on the war, and demanding a unilateral bombing halt in opposition to the Johnson policy of reciprocity. Seventy-two stories means that about 10 times every week, the networks were pounding America—and the Johnson administration—with opinion opposed to government policies on the war. This editorially selected outcry, subtly interlaced with editorial opinion, came from the following sources: Senators Fulbright, Javits, Morse, and McGovern; Paul O'Dwyer, John Gilligan; Eldridge Cleaver, Dick Gregory, the president of Yale, SDS leader Tom Hayden, actress Vanessa Redgrave; The Socialist Workers' Party, The Peace and Freedom Party, The Freedom and Peace Party, The Socialist Labor Party, The Communist Party; Arthur Goldberg, George Ball, Averill Harriman, Cyrus Vance; U Thant; Indira Gandhi; Xuan Thuy, the North Vietnamese negotiator; Soviet Premier Kosygin; British and Tokyo demonstrators—and assorted domestic students, demonstrators, black militants, soldiers, pacifists, artists, and so on.

Many of these sources were frequently repeated in successive newscasts. It is quite clear that the networks concentrated on the views of an assortment of Doves and Leftists, foreign and domestic, who were opposed to U.S. war policies.

And what did we hear on the other side? I'll summarize it for you precisely. It was to be found in only 13 stories—13 as opposed to 72, meaning: A 6 to 1 ratio against the Government: ABC aired only four opinions opposed to a unilateral bombing halt in 7 weeks—three from President Johnson, alone or in combination with Walt Rostow and Dean Rusk; and one from President Thieu of South Vietnam.

CBS aired only two such opinions—one from Ohio Republican William Saxbe, and a paraphrased opinion citing the generals in Vietnam and the Secretary of State.

And NBC also presented two opinions—one from President Thieu, and one from Iowa State Senator David Stanley.

That is: Eight opinions in 7 weeks opposing a unilateral bombing halt, on all three networks combined.

On the subject of the general war policy:

ABC aired four favorable opinions—those of President Johnson and/or Ambassador James Wiggins—twice each.

CBS aired only one such opinion—from President Johnson.

And NBC aired none.

That is: Five opinions in 7 weeks favoring the Johnson policies, on all three networks combined.

This is remarkable coverage indeed of the biggest controversy in the Nation. It totally failed to reflect the attitudes in the Nation, which at the time was giving President Johnson majority support. The administration's allies, both domestic and foreign, were simply not on the air.

On February 27, 1968, about 6 months before the period of my study, Walter Cronkite presented a special report from Vietnam. In it he said: "It seems now more certain than ever that the bloody experience of Vietnam is to end in a stalemate," and he predicted that the United States would not be victorious in this war. And on March 10, 1968, a few days later, Frank McGee presented a Sunday report in which he said that the enemy now has the initiative and that the war as the administration has defined it is being lost. Two days later the New York Times headlines read on March 12: "U.S. is losing war in Vietnam, NBC declares."

Apparently having decided that the war was being lost, these two networks, and ABC as well, resolved to give little or no air time to any view which supported President Johnson's policies.

Whatever one may think about the war, this is not balanced reporting of diverse opinions on a crucial controversy. It is disguised political advocacy.

Very much the same situation prevails in the other controversial areas which I investigated. Over and over again on all three networks—whether the subject was black militants, or the white middle class, or the left, or the right—this lopsided opinion can be found. It favored black power, it opposed the white middle class; it favored the left, it opposed the right. Almost always the opinion was loaded on the left-liberal side of the controversies. Almost always there was a vacuum, or a dramatic shortage, where strong opposition views could and should have been present.

Because of this acute shortage of opinion on one side of almost every controversy, one can state with extraordinary precision which groups in this country were deprived of representation on network news programs during the 1968 period of study. These groups were: The broad white middle class majority, Republican and Democrat—conservative and Republican leaders—the broad black majority—moderate black civil rights leaders—and the ideological pro-violence new left.

And these happen to be the very groups which in 1968 and 1969 charged the network repeatedly with bias. They, in fact, are exactly what remains when you subtract the left liberals from the American political spectrum. It is no great surprise that when Vice President Agnew delivered his speech on network bias a year after the period of this study, there was a volcanic eruption in the Nation—with some 57 percent of the public, including 60 percent of all college graduates, supporting him. This public explosion appears to have been a direct and cumulative response to the opinion loading, to the one-sided advocacy that passed for balanced reporting on controversies.

The Americans who protested are obviously the Americans whose views were chronically left out.

Omission—the crudest slanting technique in the journalistic repertoire—is the principal technique in network slanting. It is perhaps inevitable, therefore, that when CBS chose to attack The News Twisters, its attack was a monument to this very slanting technique.

In September, before The News Twisters was published, a 10-page document was distributed to the Nation's media by CBS. The mailing literally blanketed the country. It was a study of The News Twisters conducted by the CBS news department itself. It claimed to present hard, documentary evidence of the degree to which I had grossly distorted CBS transcripts. This evidence, said CBS, was based on a spot check of those transcripts.

This document is a fraud. Its fraudulence consists in a systematic omission of every conceivable piece of information either from CBS transcripts or from The News Twisters text which would make my classifications intelligible and would reveal the reasoning behind them. The effect of these omissions was to make my work seem arbitrary, irrational, and dishonest.

Seventeen charges were listed by CBS—a number that is statistically insignificant for my study; although CBS did not mention this fact to its readers—and of these 17 charges, 15 contained active misrepresentations of either CBS transcripts, The News Twisters text, or both. I have prepared a detailed report in which I identify every misrepresentation; restore every violated context; present the stories that CBS sought to conceal; and I have identified the precise principles by which CBS conducted its so-called random spot check. My analysis reveals that it was not a spot check at all but a carefully calculated smear planned to discredit my book before publication. I call this report "How CBS Tried To Kill A Book." I cannot cite from it here, textual analysis must be read. I have given a copy of this report to every member of the committee and I hope each member will read it. Incidentally, I have arranged for copies to be kept on file with this committee for inspection by the public.

I believe that this report will assist the committee in its examination on the conflicts that have arisen nationally over the network news.

Now, I respectfully submit that the very existence of an ideological oligopoly that controls the airwaves—let alone one which acts t destroy both criticism and critics—is an immense danger to thi country. A considerable awareness already exists in Congress of thi danger and some substantial proportion of Congressmen are a angered by the bias as are members of the public. But Congress i nonetheless afflicted by a characteristic paralysis when it comes t action in this area. Even an explosion of nationwide protest—a pro test that included three out of every five college graduates accordin to the Harris and Gallup polls—could not move Congress int action.

It is quite apparent why the Congress—and the FCC—are paralyzed. The misadventure of Congressman Staggers reveals the bitte truth: That their hands are permanently tied; that they cannot ac against this monolithic bias on the Nation airwaves; that the Fair ness Doctrine is an impotent ideal which cannot be enforced without violation of the First Amendment; that the First Amendment does not deny the right of a news service to be biased, it only states that the news service is free; that even the Supreme Court cannot talk the discrepancy between the Fairness Doctrine and the first amendment out of existence; and that the Nation, in fact, has no protection whatever from this ideological oligopoly.

The day must come when Congress acknowledges this truth—and more: When it acknowledges that it alone has created this situation, that it is by congressional permission alone that this oligopoly exists and has so long been sheltered from any challenge to its power. On that day, Congress will recognize that this artificial tyranny must be destroyed—by the Congress which brought it into being.

There is only one way to destroy it without violating the First Amendment. That way is not by the petty chivvying and nibbling and the proliferation of regulations that has gone on for years. It is for the government to acknowledge the sacred status of the first amendment in this country; to acknowledge that it has no business regulating an intellectual and artistic medium—that it never had any business doing so—that it never should have violated the first amendment rights of individual broadcasters and allowed 3 nationwide monopolies to form on this intellectually stagnant base—and that it should not, year after year, have blocked economic and technological competition in this area to protect the profits of these 3 giant monopolies.

The government must acknowledge all this however painful it may be. It must get out of broadcasting lock, stock, and barrel and let CATV, pay TV, and cassette technology rip, uncontrolled, unlicensed, unregulated uncensored, and uninhibited—dominated exclusively by the desire to win voluntary customers, and regulated by the law of supply and demand alone. Only this hurricane of fresh air will bring about in broadcasting the intellectual freedom and diversity that is now lacking.

What is desperately needed in broadcasting is the classical American system that prevails in all the other free media in this land—a free enterprise, pay system, in which each producer of intellectual and artistic commodities is absolutely sheltered by the first amendment; in which each individual consumer purchases only the products that please him and leaves those who have tastes and views alien to his strictly alone. It is the competitive system—free of the twin plagues of government intervention and nationwide monopolistic concentrations of power—which alone have given us the huge spectrum of intellectual and artistic alternatives in this country. It is this proved and honorable system which must be introduced into broadcasting.

Only one thing is needed to accomplish this and that is for government to withdraw from this media. Poetry does not need the government; plays do not need the government; movies do not need the government; documentaries, newspapers, magazines, novels, photographs, and sports events do not need the government. All this country has gotten from government intervention into this realm is the stupidest, most restricted, and most venal medium of communications in the country.

There may be chaos for a while if the government gets out. This chaos would be temporary and supportable. And when it settles, and when the long pent-up creative and competitive energies flow into this government-created vacuum—health will be restored to this medium.

In the process, those arrogant parasitical growths known as the networks will shrink down to the size of normal syndicated operations—selling their wares in an open market and feeling the bite of direct competition for the consumer dollar. This is, of course, precisely as it should be.

The irrational power of the networks today is purely a function of the freedom which has so long been denied to others. It is the government which must take that power back.

Senator Ervin. I found your statement, and I might add your book, very interesting and very intriguing. As a Member of Congress, I have observed for a long time that there are styles in legislatures just as there are styles in mini-skirts and maxi-coats. Politically powerful forces develop certain programs and unfortunately oftentimes they get a consensus from the most powerful media of communication both those who print the words, and those who broadcast that these programs are 100 percent good. Therefore, they will not do anything to militate against these "good" programs by giving people who disagree with them an opportunity to be heard.

I say this because I happen to be a southerner who has opposed civil rights bills. Most of the powerful media of communications in this country reached the conclusion that civil rights bills were the highest form of rightousness and they would not present opposing arguments. I have stood on the floor of the Senate, as have many other Senators, in opposition to these bills and the greatest newspapers of this country just mentioned the fact that some Senators from the South occupied the floor for so many hours, never giving any information about what was said.

Now, I happen to be a man who believes that all people of all races and all religions and all national origins should stand equal before the law. But, those who advocated the civil rights bills were so solicitous about the welfare of the minorities they reached the conclusion that the way to give equality was to subordinate the basic rights of the majority.

I don't think you can promote equality by making the legal rights of some people inferior to those of another.

Furthermore, many of these civil rights bills were of a character which tended to destroy the system of government we have had in this country for a long time. They attempted to transfer from the jurisdiction of local communities and the States to the jurisdiction of the Federal Government matters which can only be handled intelligently at the local level and which our Constitution clearly contemplates should be handled there.

They also took away basic legal rights from everybody, such as the right to make contracts with people you wanted to make contracts with, and the right to use your property in a way that you wanted to use it.

Well, I am honest in these beliefs. There is a bill over on the Senate floor now which would rob every employee in the United States in private industry, employing eight or more people, of the right to determine who he employs. Simply stated it denies every employer of eight or more employees who has invested his resources or talents in a business, the right to determine whom he should employ to make his business a success or a failure.

We have a bill over here that would place churches, educational institutions, and State and local officials under the domination of a Federal agency, the EEOC, on the grounds that we must convert the American dream into a nightmare in order to make it effective.

Now, I spoke out against these things, being a legislative fool who rushes in where legislative angels fear to tread, and I have found, from my own experience, that when these powerful media of communication arrive at a consensus, they exclude from their broadcasts and from their printed page opinions of those who don't think their views are 100 percent sacrosanct.

However, on one occasion they did decide they wanted somebody to express opposition to the civil rights bill advocated by President Kennedy on a morning television show. I went out there and was interviewed by Martin Agronsky who was very fair in his moderating of the program. I expressed the opinion, which any rational being in the United States would not dispute, I thought, that this particular bill was in large part politically inspired.

I have been around Washington a long time and I think when politicians advocate something they are politically inspired. But not so with Mr. Hugh Downs who had some communication from New York, on this program. He rudely interrupted my statement, denied me the right to present the views that I was invited there to present, in fact he insinuated that I was some kind of loathsome creature for even suggesting that a President who was the most adroit of politicians would advocate a measure partly inspired for political reasons. If I were running the network or had control over a program, since I believe in freedom of speech for everybody, including those who disagree with me, I would think that I would have had the common courtesy to have allowed my invited guest to present his viewpoint.

So, I realize that those human beings who have control of the networks and newspapers are not perfect. They are subject to some of the same infirmities that people like myself are. And I think there is some kind of obligation—I am not talking about legal obligations—some kind of a moral obligation that requires the news media to be fair.

But when I get into this problem of who is going to establish fairness, I am reminded of an old lawyer down in North Carolina who went into see a new judge in action one day. He came out of the courthouse and somebody asked the lawyer, "What do you think of the new judge?" The lawyer said, "Well, the Constitution of the United States gives everybody the right to make a damn fool of himself but I think this man is abusing his constitutional privilege."

Now, one thing has always troubled me about freedoms, especially about freedom of speech. It is that I don't know any way to grant people freedom and not have that freedom abused. I am a great believer in freedom of speech and freedom of the press and freedom of the broadcast media.

I am so devoted to this freedom that I have almost reached the same position as Isaiah when he said about Jehovah, "Though he smite me, yet will I praise him."

I have given a lot of thought to this question and no one knows better than I that many people abuse freedom of speech, freedom of the press and freedom of broadcast. I tend to agree with your observation that there are "news twisters" in the communications media, but the question which occurs to me is how are we going to keep the "news twisters" from twisting the news, and who is going to twist the "news twisters" into righteousness? That is very significant.

I would infer from your statement that one of your possible solutions, as far as the great network system is concerned, would be to remove Federal regulations.

Miss Efron. Yes. I suggested that it be removed from the whole broadcasting operations. I think that there is no rational way to tell men how to run their news services and the First Amendment actually forbids such a thing. The Fairness Doctrine is actually an amoral document. It is a debate concept. And to interfere in any way with the selectivity of newsmen in moral areas is actually to forbid them to make their own best, their most righteous judgment of what the truth is.

For example, if a newspaperman deems that the war is, by his best understanding, an error and that this information should be brought to the country, no government should step into that area of his moral judgment.

My concern is not so much with the phenomenon of liberal bias as such. It is the fact that you have three networks with one and the same political philosophy blanketing the country, that it is an oligopoly, and that Congress has frozen them into that power. We are in the grip of an ideological tyranny and there is no way to intervene without violating the first amendment.

Now, a great many people spend their time thinking of little corrections and little legislations and little regulations that serve merely to torture these men. My answer is, leave them alone. But the Government must get out so that it does not hold up any further competition in this area. Ultimately, I am for pay TV. Until this medium is run exactly like every other medium of artistic, intellectual and political communication in this country, the bias controversy can only grow more accute.

Senator Ervin. Of course, these laws and acts of Congress were passed with respect to the broadcast media, because of the very great shortage of channels at that time. Congress enacted the laws on the theory that the airwaves could be used to have a discussion of public problems as well as the dissemination of information, and if everybody who wanted to go into the broadcasting business would go into if you have something in the nature of a Tower of Babel—so much confusion in the airwaves that nobody could hear anything. That was the origin of the allocation of channels.

Then later they developed this fairness doctrine and even it can be very much abused. I think it has been abused in more than two instances by the FCC, but I would like to say I think on the whole they have administered it fairly well.

Well, then, the question occurs to me, if you establish somebody as a censor of the communications media to make it fair, you would have to have somebody else to make certain that the censors were fair.

So what we have to leave here in this field is a certain amount of legal chaos and see if we can't give acceptance to Thomas Jefferson's theory that a country has nothing to fear from freedom of speech as long as truth is free to combat error. And I say that despite some of the observations I made about the media and their characterization of those of us who opposed the civil rights bill as being the very negation of equality instead of the promotion of equality.

I really don't know how we can regulate the industry except by leaving them free to disseminate what they have to disseminate, and trust that in the longrun people will judge them correctly and that they will respond to the wishes of the people, at least, insofar as the people have truth on their side.

Senator Hruska. Mr. Chairman, during the course of her remarks, the witness requested that her report entitled, "How the CBS Tried to Kill a Book," be kept readily available by the subcommittee for members of the public to examine.

My suggestion is that that request be broadened so that it will include the CBS report itself, in order that the contents of both documents will be available to all interested parties.

Senator Ervin. The Senator from Nebraska like the Senator from North Carolina believes everybody is entitled to their say on both sides of the question.

Senator Hruska. That is the only way we can get the whole story and the only fair way in my judgment.

Now, your solutions to the network monopoly as contained in the concluding pages of testimony suggests that the whole field should be open to the forum of the market place, that is, full and free competition without Government interference.

Miss Efron. Yes.

Senator Hruska. That situation now applies to the printed news, to the printed media. Do we have any of the same problems with newspapers that you describe in your book? Is competition among newspapers creating more or fewer problems? What are your thoughts on that?

Miss Efron. The best way I know to answer this, and I say this with all due respect, is that the content of the newspapers isn't our business. It is the business of the newspapers and of those who wish to buy the newspapers. What one can say about the press is that it is possible to get publications with political viewpoints of every conceivable coloration, that the free market allows for the creation of everything from the far right press to the far left press and every shade in between, and that it is precisely by having a free press, that one ends up with this diversity and this choice.

Now, if in fact dominant publications have, let us say, a liberal philosophy, that is historically the development in this country, and unless one comes up with some brilliant new philosophical trend that will displace it, it will go right on being the dominant trend. Therefore, probably your media in freedom would be dominantly liberal, liberal-centrist, anyway, but under freedom, those who are not necessarily swimming in the main stream tide and who criticize it from many points of view have been able to have their publications.

And that is all that you can ask for in the broadcast medium.

Senator HRUSKA. Of course, in the free market of the newspapers world we have witnessed a constantly constricting number of competitors. There are fewer and fewer newspapers.

Why would no regulation of the networks not result in that same state?

Miss EFRON. Well, part of the restriction in one sense would be economic problems, not specifically journalistic problems.

Another thing is that there has been a tremendous proliferation of other kinds of press that didn't used to exist before.

This phenomenon is the underground press. There are all sorts of new publications coming into existence all the time. So that it isn't a static situation which is the case in broadcasting with networks-entrenched dominance of nationwide political coverage. It is just simply a rigid institution. NBC isn't going to wither away and some new type of press flower in its place. It is just frozen. And the Government has frozen it.

Senator HRUSKA. Now, during these hearings and elsewhere, even before these hearings, there have in some areas been frequent allusions to a conspiracy by the Nixon administration to silence criticism or to "twist the news," as you would put it.

Your statement and book indicate to the contrary in many respects. There are some people——

Miss EFRON. I don't believe I——

Senator HRUSKA. People who subscribe to the idea that the criticism that was voiced by Vice President Agnew was both valid and useful. There are others who contest that point of view.

Would you care to give your point of view in this regard.

Miss EFRON. Yes. I am sorry to have interrupted you.

There are two issues, I believe. One is the issue which is repeatedly being raised about which I have no information on it other than what I read in the papers, that this administration is increasingly intervening in the freedom of newsmen. I have no special knowledge in that realm. My book was not about that. My book would indicate that there is enough reason to have exacerbated the administration so that it might perhaps unwisely be retaliating, but that is purely speculative on my part.

I do not think that Vice President Agnew was wrong to speak. I think that he was factually correct. And nobody else was speaking for the public. But my own observations are that Congress makes—well, it can make a racket sometimes but it doesn't actually do anything, and I do not observe that anyone at the networks has been particularly silenced by congressional or executive action.

But I repeat, this is not my area of research and I do not know specifically what the government has or has not been doing.

Senator HRUSKA. Well, Mr. Agnew went out to Des Moines, Iowa, and delivered of himself some very emphatic and some very pronounced views——

Miss Efron. If you are speaking about that——

Senator Hruska. On the press.

Miss Efron. Yes.

Senator Hruska. And I would like to ask you if in your judgment you would consider that as evidence or as part of a conspiracy against the press—a statement of view on his part, a practice that the press and many commentators and all media have on their part, but somehow he was criticized for exercising that right.

Miss Efron. I thought I had made my view on that clear. I think he had the right and I think he was right and I think my study substantiates his charges very strongly. I do not consider any political leader in the country expressing his views about anything to be wrong. Why should that be wrong? I thought that your question was directed more at the FBI investigations and seeking to take people's notes and things of that kind. But as far as Mr. Agnew's statement, he was telling the truth. So I do not see that as any intervention in anybody's freedom.

Senator Hruska. Your book would indicate, and you have concluded, that there was a clear bias established in the areas in which you made inquiry in your survey——

Miss Efron. Yes.

Senator Hruska. During the election of 1968. Would you like to venture an opinion on how this type of loaded coverage affected the American vote and voters in that campaign?

Miss Efron. That would be speculative. We know that the American voters did not obey the bias. They did not follow it. The problem of how to evaluate people's responses to material is not one I deal with in my book. I think one can state in a kind of common sense way that wherever the views of a publication or a news service vary very, very sharply on basic moral issues from those of the public, the public will repudiate those views. But if there are technical matters or matters of great complexity where the individual citizen has no real means of using his life experience to check what he is hearing, then I think that biased coverage could influence people.

But in 1968, the issues were really very raw and primitive and they mainly involved violence as a means of expressing ones political disagreement with things. That was a very important theme, subliminally, in much of the coverage. Here the people had their own opinions and would not be influenced. That is all there is to it. But they certainly did vote for Mr. Nixon and the bias was against Mr. Nixon. So one can conclude that they were not brainwashed.

Senator Hruska. I want to thank you for your answers and also for your appearance here.

Senator Ervin. I thought at first that you and the TV broadcast system had reached a common solution, but I believe there is a fundamental distinction between your remedy and what media thinks should be done.

Miss Efron. And what?

Senator Ervin. As I construe testimony on behalf of the broadcast media, they think that the Government should retain the power to allocate channels but that the Government should not exercise any other control over the media. Their position is that that is necessary to give them complete freedom of speech as the Constitution contemplates. Now, your position is, I think, of significant difference.

Miss EFRON. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. You think the Government should to take its hand out of the regulating business entirely?

Miss EFRON. Yes, that is correct.

Senator ERVIN. And allow anybody who wanted to go into the business of the broadcast media to do so?

Miss EFRON. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. And grant them total immunity from Government control of any kind?

Miss EFRON. That is correct. My reason for disagreeing with the networks's position is simply that when they say that they want First Amendment protection, they are merely talking about freezing the status quo as it is, so that they don't really mean First Amendment protection for everybody who is in the business or wants to get in it. What they really mean is: Leave us alone with our oligopoly. And that I cannot grant.

If the government does protect this oligopoly, does maintain it, does not break it up, then some extraordinary kind of pressure short of blue-penciling copy would have to be undertaken to bully them into being fair. But I don't see the point of becoming authoritarian as a solution to an authoritarian situation.

Senator ERVIN. I think you would agree with me that there is no practical way by which we can give freedom of press or freedom of speech to unbiased persons and deny it to biased persons.

Miss EFRON. That is correct. You cannot.

Senator ERVIN. And I think you suggested one of the forces that operates to keep us somewhere within the field of what is reasonable —for example, in situations where the news media makes an unfair attack upon any individual or any program—is a certain sense of fairness held by the people which generally causes them to react adversely to these unfair situations. That is one thing that makes it possible for freedom of the press and freedom of the broadcast to accomplish good objectives. That is the same idea which Thomas Jefferson expressed when he said you don't have anything to fear from freedom of speech if you just leave truth free to combat error; sometimes the public reaction destroys the effect of the unfair treatment.

Miss EFRON. In principle that is true, but in a situation where you have an entrenched oligopoly, that will not necessarily work.

For example, the networks say, and I believe that many of them generally believe this, that regardless of their own political attitudes, cultural attitude, they try desperately to be professional and fair and that they are able to maintain this impartiality as professionally trained men.

Well, I wonder whether these same men would tolerate three networks full of conservatives who all argued that they were merely being professional, and after 57 percent of the people blew up over their conservative bias and charged them with being conservative on the air, with not letting liberals have a voice, rationalized this as selective perception on the public's part.

Given the situation as it presently stands Congress has frozen an oligopoly into place which has uniform political sympathies. At this point you cannot count on the normal give and take which does exist in the free market to rectify it.

If I may cite one example, in 1968, at one point 70 percent of the American people were indignant at the networks for the way they were covering certain situations. Had that been a free market operation, do you know what would have happened? They would have lost their customers and their stocks would have crashed and we wouldn't be talking about this today.

The problem is there is no public control at all in the form of the law of supply and demand and constantly, pressure is building up for a vicious type of control, namely censorship. It is because I am enormously afraid that if this basic discontent over the philosophical slant in network news department is not alleviated, that one of these days there will be a fantastic explosion and the first amendment really will be torn to shreds. Right now it is a rather peaceful time, but the latest pulse pole count indicates that there is a good 40 percent of Americans that are chronically antagonized by network bias. Well, that quantity can rise—you can't leave it that way.

Senator ERVIN. None of us likes to hear or read expressions of views we dislike. I will have to confess I don't like people to express opinions not in accord with my sound views, but I am perfectly willing to do so. Your recommendation is this: You think that the present Federal regulations which bar from the airwaves every person except those licensed by the FCC creates a monopoly, and you would institute the right of every person who desires to go into broadcasting to do so, if he had the financial ability.

Miss EFRON. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. And let the people by their reaction to what is broadcast, instead of the government, in effect regulate the broadcasters from economic standpoints?

Miss EFRON. That is right. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. Now, I would say that I think the great majority of news people I know are fair people; at least, they all try to be with rare exceptions. And I wasn't altogether displeased by some of the reactions in the news media against the speeches of Vice President Agnew. I wasn't displeased because it showed that they didn't like things adverse to their activities spoken any more than I do. As I indicated, it is quite human. I am a person who believes in freedom of speech, even for Vice President Agnew. I had the privilege of making a talk to the National Newspapers Association some time ago and I was asked what I thought about Vice President Agnew's news speeches. I said that I gave him freedom of speech and pointed out that any public official's, including the Vice President's right to criticize the news media was co-equal with the right of the news media to criticize him. When a public official criticizes the news media, I don't necessarily think it is an attack on the First Amendment, but merely an expression of opinion by a public official that the news media was not exercising its rights under the First Amendment in a way that the official thought they should be exercised. That is still my position.

I want to thank you. You have given us a most enlightening, interesting, thought-provoking, and I might add controversy provoking presentation of one of the most serious problems in the first amendment area. Thank you very much.

I regret the necessity of being on the Senate floor will prevent the chairman from hearing anymore witnesses today. We have two other witness scheduled but we will make arrangements to hear them just as quickly as possible.

The subcommittee will stand in recess until the 8th of February.

(Whereupon, at 12:40 p.m., the subcommittee was adjourned, to reconvene Tuesday, February 8, at 10 a.m.)

FREEDOM OF THE PRESS

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1972

U.S. SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS OF THE
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to recess, at 10:05 a.m., in room 1318, New Senate Office Building, Senator Sam J. Ervin, Jr. (chairman), presiding.

Present: Senator Ervin.

Also present: Lawrence M. Baskir, Chief Counsel and Staff Director, and William Pursley, Counsel.

Senator ERVIN. The subcommittee will come to order, and the counsel will call the first witness.

Mr. BASKIR. Mr. Chairman, our first witness this morning is Mr. Andrew Heiskell, chairman of the board of Time-Life, Inc.

Senator ERVIN. Mr. Heiskell, I wish to welcome you to the committee and to express to you the committee's thanks for your willingness to come and report and give us the benefit of your views and vast experience in the field we have been investigating.

STATEMENT OF MR. ANDREW HEISKELL, CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD, TIME-LIFE, INC.

Mr. HEISKELL. Thank you. Mr. Chairman, my name is Andrew Heiskell. I am chairman of the board of Time, Inc., publishers of Life, Time, Fortune, and Sports Illustrated magazines.

Let me first say that this subcommittee and its chairman are performing an important service to all Americans in examining the present state of the freedom of the press. One frequently hears that a free press is "guaranteed" by the First Amendment to our Constitution.

However, the framers of the Constitution and of the Bill of Rights were more realistic, for they recognized that no generation can guarantee freedom of the press for those which follow.

The Constitution had empowered Congress to levy and collect taxes, to regulate commerce, to establish post offices, and post roads, and to promote the progress of science and useful arts. Congress was further empowered to make all laws which should be necessary and proper for carrying out these and other powers.

The First Amendment restricted the exercise of these powers by providing that "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom . . . of the press . . ."

The framers of the Constitution and of the Bill of Rights knew, as this subcommittee is freshly reminding us, that a free press requires an environment of free inquiry and the encouragement of dissent; and this requires the affirmative commitment of our people and their government to an open society.

Thus, your chairman properly identifies as the "more general and more serious issue" what he characterized as "the growing deterioration of the relationship between press and Government."

Given the complex society in which we live, an effective free press requires much more than the absence of Government interference. It must have the active and continuing cooperation of government to function effectively. Similarly, a free government cannot endure without a strong and independent press.

One clear example of dependence of a free press upon Government is illustrated today by the broadcast media—radio and television. Networks, news services, individual stations, may collect news, analyze it, form opinion about it—but all of this is futile unless they can transmit it to the public.

This cannot occur without a license from Government, but it also cannot occur without an extensive system of governmental regulation to allocate frequencies, prevent interference, control monopoly, and thus ultimately to insure access and diversity.

My purpose in coming here is to remind the committee of the role of magazines in a free press and to underline the extent to which they too are dependent upon wise public policy and constructive Government support.

Of course, the American press today consists of four major elements—newspapers, magazines, radio, and television. An effective national press must be a composite of these media, for each performs a distinct service and no one of them could substitute for any other.

Magazines and network broadcasting, particularly television, speak to a national audience, while both newspapers and radio tend to be more local in their coverage. Although television journalism is national in scope, it cannot offer the detail, the depth of analysis, or the precision of reporting which are furnished by a good magazine.

Only magazines and good newspapers offer an opportunity for their reader to study at his leisure, to compare, to review, and to retain information, analysis, and opinion. Moreover, the national magazines of general circulation provide continuing public education in areas as diverse as art, religion, geography, economics and politics. Magazines also offer the best national outlet for investigative journalism, for photographic essays, for new arts and letters, for analysis of public issues, and for statements by public figures.

If magazines as we know them today were to disappear, the variety and depth of reporting which are critical to a free society would be lost, and I know of no way to replace them. Our political and social structure would be seriously weakened, and our national objective of enlarging educational opportunity significantly more difficult to attain.

Like every other element of a free press, magazines must enjoy certain rights and protections to go about their job. They must be permitted to collect news, information, and opinion, and this is often dependent on the attitude of Government. They must be free to develop and present news, information, and opinion free from harrassment or retribution by Government.

Magazines must be free to publish, then, but they also must be able to marshal the financial resources which permit them to publish and maintain the enormous manpower and facilities which are required to collect, to edit and to print. Finally, they must have the ability to distribute their product.

Everyone would recognize that a free press could be destroyed if conditions are created or allowed to develop in which a free press cannot function—cannot collect, cannot edit, cannot publish, or cannot distribute its output.

All would quickly condemn, as contrary to our Constitution and contrary to our national interest, the exercise of licensing power to prohibit broadcasting, to limit the scope or content of its news coverage, or to force broadcasters to espouse a particular political phiosophy.

All of us would recognize the unconstitutionality of confiscatory taxation which levied prohibitive fees on publication. However, we have not yet recognized that magazines can be killed by Government just as surely by denying them the revenues which they require to exist or by making it impossible for them to distribute their product.

For magazines the only feasible means of distribution is the postal system. Congress has traditionally set special rates for newspapers and magazines because it has recognized the importance of the post office in binding the Nation together. The philosophy which underlies that historic tradition was perhaps best expressed by a special commission appointed by the Congress in 1844 to study the purpose and value of the post office.

The commission reported:

> The United States Postal Service was created to render the citizen worthy, by proper knowledge and enlightenment, of his important privileges, as a sovereign constituent of his government; to diffuse enlightenment and social improvement and national fellowship; elevating our people in the scale of civilization and bringing them together in patriotic affection.

Magazines depend on Government for the provision of their means of distribution as surely and as completely as the broadcast media depend on Government to provide a clear frequency or channel for their use. If the cost of this distribution system becomes prohibitive, then magazines will disappear.

The U.S. postal Service has proposed a 142 percent increase in second class mail rates for magazines over the next 5 years. At Time Inc., the proposed increase would raise our mailing costs by $27 million over the 5-year period, based on 1970 circulation levels.

The profits of all our magazines before taxes in 1970, the last year for which figures are presently available, totaled $11 million—less than one-half the proposed increase in postal rates.

Our 1970 pretax earnings of $11 million, it should be added, were on revenues of $300 million, a profit margin of less than 4 percent. The financial situation of the magazine industry as a whole is even worse. Pretax earnings of the whole industry last year were only about $50 million. Under the present proposal magazines would pay $130 million more for mail service by 1976.

One of the great national magazines, Look, has suspended publication, in large part because they saw no hope of economic survival in the face of such an enormous increase in postal rates.

Newspapers which depend on the mails would also be hard hit by the proposed increases. Those papers—mostly smaller weeklies—distributed within the county of publication and, therefore, eligible for the so-called in-county rates face increases that could amount to as much as 500 percent over the next 10 years.

For most, the increase is likely to be somewhere between 100 percent and 200 percent—a substantial burden for any business, large or small. Other papers, of course, are subject to the same rates and would be subject to the same increases as magazines.

The amounts which the Government proposes to charge us to distribute the output of a free press—charges over which we have no control—will soon prevent the distribution of some national magazines.

We face these rising costs at a time when advertising revenues are seriously imperiled. Not only does television command an increasing share of advertising expenditures, but advertising itself is under persistent and pervasive assault by Government.

The city of New York has proposed to tax it. The Federal Trade Commission is increasingly attempting to restrict it. Many have proposed that advertising of a wide variety of products be banned entirely. Regardless of the purpose of the Government action, if it has the effect of reducing the amount of money spent on advertising it then has the further effect of worsening the financial plight of the Nation's magazines.

I do not suggest and I do not believe that any of this is the result of a great conspiracy by Government to destroy an essential element of the free press. I do suggest that no one has faced the basic questions of public policy: How much is a free press worth in a free society?

Is a free press not one of the most important assets to the survival and growth of free institutions? What is more urgent than the creation of an environment in which a free and independent press is economically viable?

Some of our critics have suggested that national magazines have an easy out as costs rise. They say that as costs rise, as postal rates triple, as advertising revenues decline, we can simply raise our price per copy or per subscription.

They argue that the people who want magazines should pay for them—whatever the cost. The newsstands today are full of specialized magazines, appealing to a limited audience, and priced at $1 or $1.25 or $1.50 or $2 per copy.

We publish one of the oldest and one of the most expensive, Fortune magazine, devoted to in-depth reporting on business, and it sells for $2 a copy and a subscription costs $16 per year.

But Fortune, like other specialized magazines, reaches a limited audience—600,000 buyers—obviously of very high income.

Even if some subscribers would pay this kind of price for every magazine of general interest and national circulation—and experience shows that few will—the nature of a free press would be radically altered. At a time when it is critical that all of our people share more equally in the benefits of our society, nothing would be more tragic than to have our national journals speak to and be available to only the well-to-do.

On what political or social theory does such a suggestion rest? Is it assumed that only the well-to-do desire or deserve to know what is happening in science, religion, art, literature, and politics in America and in the world?

Is it assumed that only the well-off and the comfortable need to be involved in the political and social dialogues of our time?

Surely there is a compelling argument that magazines contributing richness and diversity to the life of the average citizens are essential to the good health of our system. It would be tragic if what survived of the industry were specialized magazines for small audiences plus a few bigger magazines concerned with sex, scandal, and the sale of gadgets.

I would make one final observation as to the public stake in the survival of magazines and newspapers, as opposed to the regulated broadcast media. In their political role the printed media are largely proof against the manipulations of the demagogue. The magazine in particular is a vehicle for political sense, for the thoughtful discussion of public issues.

This is because it neither depends on the whims of various governmental decisions or the support of a few advertisers. The broader the range of advertising support the more likely the press is to remain free. Of all of the times in the Nation's history, we can now least afford to lose this quality of independence.

The Congress has effectively demonstrated its concern about the attrition rate among daily newspapers and the growth in the number of "one-newspaper cities." Through partial suspension of the antitrust laws, under the "Failing Newspaper Act", competing newspapers have been permitted to use joint printing facilities and to combine certain of their commercial operations.

But despite this unprecedented aid, more and more communities are becoming dependent upon the views of a single newspaper for editorial comment and the selection and analysis of newsworthy events. For a large segment of the American public, national magazines provide again the only other source of editorial views and analysis of national and international developments.

Without competition in the news field, the quality of the product will inevitably suffer as it does in any other field or enterprise. Giving the daily newspaper a virtual news monoply can promote neither a free press nor an informed public. Yet this is the inevitable result if access to the U.S. mails, the sole means of distribution available to the national magazine, is priced beyond reach.

Clearly, freedom of the press is not a private right. On the contrary, it is a public right. In the final analysis, what is at stake is the public's right to know, which depends in turn on a free press. As the Supreme Court put it in Time Inc. v. Hill:

> Those guarantees are not for the benefit of the press so much as for the benefit of all of us. A broadly defined freedom of the press assures the maintenance of our policial system and an open society.

My plea, sir, is that this committee go beyond condemnation of Government interference with a free press, and commit itself to the creation of an environment in which a free press can grow and flourish and expand. It is time that a major objective of public policy be to promote affirmatively the financial health, the multiplicity, the vigor, and the independence of every organ of opinion, of news, of analysis, and of continuing education which our people are capable of creating.

The intent of the First Amendment that "Congress shall make no law * * * abriding the freedom * * * of the press * * *" needs once again to be forecefully brought to the attention of the many governmental entities of this great Nation.

Benjamin Franklin no longer sits in the councils which guide our country's destiny; but his spirit needs to be revived. Government needs to return to that spirit. In its prosecution of crime, its regulation of commerce, its provision of a postal service, its every function —it should simultaneously weigh the consequences of its actions in terms of their impact on the viability of the press.

Thank you, sir.

Senator ERVIN. I think your statement clearly discloses that you agree with me that the First Amendment taken as a whole was designed to make Americans politically, intellectually, and spiritually free.

Mr. HEISKELL. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. And I also interpret your statement to be an expression of the view that the freedom of the press, as well as freedom of speech, was established for a two-fold purpose:

First, to express the philosophy of the drafters of the amendment that the fullest possible information and dissemination of ideas is necessary to keep the minds and spirits of men free; and secondly that the proper functioning of our institutions of government demand the fullest dissemination and information and ideas.

Mr. HEISKELL. Yes, sir, and I think the problem which I bring to your attention is that we face a new, active and different situation. In our history, until last year, the consideration concerning the costs to be borne by publishers in distributing magazines was determined in fact by the Congress and the Congress weighed all factors in making that determination; that, the public benefit, their right to know, the ability to pay, and so on and so on.

Now, we have set up an independent Postal Service, and to it has been delegated the power to set rates. As I read the phrases concerning that delegation, that power, it was clear to me, at least, that the Congress intended the Postal Service to also take into account all those factors, but in fact, in setting the rates, the Postal Service has simply taken its cost of doing business into account. I might say that the final proof of this is their having in a rather summary way, a year ago, suggested the increase of 142 percent for magazines—it would be 175 percent for ours, by the way.

This was recommended, after a meeting of the Board, the newly appointed Board, which surely didn't know very much, and then after 13,000 pages of testimony, the examiner last week managed to come to the brilliant conclusion that 142 percent was exactly the right figure.

I find this quite amazing, and I suggest to you, sir, that this has something to do with, perhaps, delegating too much power to executive agencies, and that the Congress might consider whether more careful phrasing is not needed since the Postal Service does not seem to understand general phrasing.

Senator Ervin. The concern of the First Amendment was for a free press rather than for a press. The first amendment recognized that if the Government established a press, it would not be free, did it not? It entrusted this great task of disseminating the information and the ideas necessary to keep the minds and spirits of our people free and to make our Government institutions work in what we call the free enterprise system, did it not?

Mr. Heiskell. That is correct, sir. It seems to me that the First Amendment clearly said that the press must be responsible for what it is doing, because no one else can be responsible for it. If you give that responsibility to any part of Government, you thereby automatically annul the First Amendment. The purpose is for the benefit of the people of the country, and so far it has worked pretty well.

Senator Ervin. I want to commend your pointing out so forcibly that newspapers and magazines and the broadcast media are quite different in their methods of operation, and that they compliment each other in the sense that they furnish us with a diversity of ways of disseminating information and ideas.

I think that the people who drew the First Amendment felt that out of a diversity of services, and also out of a diversity of information and ideas, the people would ultimately be able to tell what the truth is, and that the best test of truth was its ability to get itself accepted in the marketplace where different notions compete with each other for the minds of men.

To paraphrase Jefferson, we have nothing to fear from freedom of speech as long as we leave truth free to combat error.

I think you have rendered a great service to the country and to the subcommittee in pointing out that the First Amendment in and of itself is just words on a piece of paper which are not self-executing, and that it is impossible for one generation to give an absolute title to freedom to the next generation.

It can only be retained on the condition that the next generation loves freedom enough to see that there exists a climate which allows it to operate effectively.

One of the greatest expressions of the First Amendment I have ever read was by Judge Learned Hand, when in emphasizing this same idea, he said that as long as a love of freedom lives in the hearts of the people, that freedom is secure, but that if it ever dies there, that freedom cannot be saved by any constitution or by any law.

There are many people today responsible for governmental policies who undoubtedly believe in their hearts that they love freedom of speech and freedom of the press, but they adopt governmental policies which tend to defeat those freedoms. As you emphasized, the framers of the First Amendment committed the future of the First Amendment to the free enterprise system. It is necessary for this freedom, which is really for the public's benefit rather than those who exercise it, to exist. It is essential that those who are to perform this great public functions of enlightening the people, to be able to make enough to discharge this function. I certainly share your concern about the great increase in the postal rates.

I share the concern about the increased costs in the publication of newspapers. In most cities—at least in the smaller cities in the country, and I think in every city—in my State of North Carolina the same people own all the papers. This is really an undesirable result because of the need of diversity of opinions to keep this country free.

Mr. HEISKELL. Senator, it seems to me that the point that is often forgotten is that there is no one truth, that it is up to the individual to seek out the truth by the diversity of his viewing and reading. In some countries, like Russia, there is one truth, and it so happened that Pravda translated into English means just that, "the truth".

We want to have that diversity. My second point is that I don't think the people realize the cumulative impact of various acts of Government, when you combine the impact of subpena and the impact of the FTC and the impact of the postal costs and the special taxes on advertising.

When you combine all those, you are then really endangering the diversity, the multiplicity of views that the country really needs if it is to continue along its present path.

Senator ERVIN. I think that the report of the committee that studied this problem in 1844 emphasized that the Post Office Department is not intended to be a commercial organization, merely to be self-sustaining. It recognized that the Post Office Department, as you point out, just like the airwaves in the case of the broadcast media, is a great means of disseminating information and ideas which the framers of the first amendment recognized as essential to freedom of mind in this country and also the proper functioning of our governmental institutions.

The Supreme Court decided a case from Louisiana, in which it held that you can, by confiscatory taxation, destroy the freedom of the press, and you can do likewise just as effectively and perhaps more so, by a much more insidious approach of curtailing advertising revenues.

To some extent, I think some of the policies of the FCC and the FTC and others do that. By establishing exorbitant postal charges one can drive the free press out of existence.

Mr. HEISKELL. Yes, sir. As I look back over the years, the Congress in its wisdom did increase postal costs, but I think the average was 6 to 7 percent over the last 15 or 20 years.

As of the day that Congress turned over this power to an independent agency, it proposed increasing it by 35 percent a year. That is an impossible situation. That is the same as the power of taxation to destroy, and something must be done about that.

Senator ERVIN. Those who control policies of the Government, while professing to love the concept embodied in the expression "freedom of the press," can destroy the freedom of the press by exorbitant charges on distribution of materials.

I think you made that valid point.

Even if you could conceive that magazines could continue to exist merely on the subscription rates of people who had the money to purchase them regardless of the price, that would defeat the purpose of the first amendment.

The objective of freedom of the press is to disseminate ideas and information to all people, of all gradations of wealth, to the poorest as well as those who are affluent. It is essential that we do this if a country founded on the principles of freedom of thought and expression is to endure.

That is my judgment.

Mr. Heiskell. I agree with you.

Senator Ervin. I want to commend you on what has been a most helpful statement. I wish everybody in Congress would have access to it, and I will put it in the Congressional Record with your permission, and hope they might read it.

Mr. Heiskell. Thank you.

Senator Ervin. It will occupy a very fine place among the facts, which are so often surrounded by much fiction.

Mr. Heiskell. I appreciate the opportunity, Senator.

Thank you.

Senator Ervin. Counsel will call the next witness.

Mr. Baskir. Mr. Chairman, our next witnesses this morning are Mr. David Rintels and Mr. Norman Lear and Mr. Liam O'Brien representing the Writers Guild of America.

Senator Ervin. Yes, I want to welcome you to the committee and to express the committee's deep appreciation for your willingness to come forth and give us the benefit of your experience and observations with respect to what I consider perhaps the most important public question we have in America today.

STATEMENT ON BEHALF OF THE WRITERS GUILD OF AMERICA BY MR. DAVID RINTELS, MR. NORMAN LEAR AND MR. LIAM O'BRIEN

Mr. Rintels. We are happy to come and present evidence before you. My name is David Rintels. I am a writer, a member of the governing council of the Writers Guild of America, West, and the chairman of The Guild's Committee on Censorship. With me are Laim O'Brien and Norman Lear, both distinguished writers and longstanding members of the Guild.

The president of the WGAW, Ranald MacDougall, has written to you that "Insofar as the Writers Guild of America is traditionally, historically, and unalterably opposed to censorship in any form, the members appearing before you have our complete support in their presentation."

We deeply appreciate their support and confidence. Today however, we speak as individual writers about our personal experiences and working knowledge.

This subcommittee has heard testimony in these hearings directed to keeping the broadcast press, and specifically the news and public affairs departments of the television networks, free from Government censorship and intimidation. We fully support you in your wish to keep the news free from this censorship.

You have also heard testimony saying that the networks have a responsibility to present a free flow of ideas to the American people. That in their news and documentaries they must present a wide spectrum of thought and not merely reflect one narrow point of view. We fully support you in this pursuit as well.

As members of the Writers Guild of America, whose 3,000 members write every network television dramatic, comedy, and variety program produced in this country, we have a third concern. In our world of entertainment, which is a vast source of what we know and how we think about our world, ideas and information are as vitally important and as needful of protection as any other area of the press. But within this area of entertainment programing, it is our contention that the networks have deliberately and almost totally shut off this flow of ideas, have censored and continue to censor writers who work for them.

It is therefore our hope to convey to you our belief that there are two related issues which fall within the scope of these hearings and which demand your most urgent attention: First, the right of the men and women who write for television to deal in ideas and truths and realities free from the repressive censorship and program practices under which we do, in fact, write. Second, the right of the American people to be exposed to something more than an endless cycle of programs that mislead them and distort the realities of what is happening in America today.

That these two issues are related and of grave concern to all of us should be clearly demonstrated by the following statistics taken from a recent poll of our Guild. Of all who responded:

Eighty-six percent have found, from personal experience, that censorship exists in television. Many state, further, that they have never written a script, no matter how innocent, that has not been censored.

Eighty-one percent believe that television is presenting a distorted picture of what is happening in this country today—politically, economically, and racially.

Only eight percent believe that current television programing is "in the public interest, convenience and necessity," as required by the Federal Communications Act of 1934, title 47, U.S. Code, sections 307a and 307d.

Because these figures suggest strongly our conviction that the American people are being badly served by the television industry's use of the airwaves which they, the American people, own, it is proper to inquire as to the causes of these abuses.

We approach this inquiry not, as we hasten to add, in any spirit that all television must be educational or instructive or elevating, but rather from the following basis: Even granting for the moment the questionable argument advanced by those who control television —an argument we do not grant, for reasons we will later explore— that because so many of the American people are willing to settle for nonstop lowest common denominator programing, television must be doing something right, must it then follow that virtually 100 percent of all network dramatic and comedy programing must be aimed at the lowest aspirations of this audience virtually 100 percent of the time, even to the point of disregarding any reasonable standards of balance, quality, and reality?

Must anything which does not amuse and titillate the majority be censored out, as it is in fact, as we shall shortly document? This is where we wish to join the battle to enlist your support, over the question of whether current television programing and censorship practices and the inevitable resulting product are in the public interest, as the law requires.

We believe emphatically that they are not, and that while we are the first victims of these practices, the ultimate victims are the American people.

The situation in television today—how serious is it? How well does television fulfill its legal and moral obligation to serve the public interest?

First, it must be understood how all pervasive television has become in America. More than 95 percent of all homes are equipped with television, a substantially larger number than have indoor plumbing. A quarter of all homes have more than one set. The average home has its television on an astounding 6.43 hours a day. At any given time between 8–11 p.m. not less than 75 million people are watching television with 91 percent of them tuned to one of the three networks. Television has become the newspaper, the magazine, the town meeting, the high school, and the college of the country.

We look at these figures and are horrified because we know, first hand, that 75 million people are nightly being fed programs deliberately designed to have no resemblance at all to reality, nonsense whose only purpose is to sell snake oil and laxatives and underarm deodorants.

We know this but apparently the 75 million do not. This is what is so tragic: People believe what they are being told. As Archibald McLeish has said, "(broadcasting) * * * matters more over the long run * * * than what anybody else does because (it is) more persistently shaping the minds of more people than the rest of us put together."

Dr. Bradley S. Greenberg of Michigan State University said:

> Forty percent of the poor Black children and thirty percent of the poor white children (compared with 15 percent of the middle-class white youngsters) were ardent believers of the true-to-life nature of the television content.

So people watch television by the tens of millions. Many believe it literally. All of us are influenced by it to some extent. Increasingly television has become the literature of the country.

With such enormous influence comes enormous power, and with such power should come—must come, in the public interest—responsibility. We agree wholeheartedly with industry spokesmen who say that television has a responsibility to entertain. But we also believe that television has a responsibility not to deceive. A responsibility not to present one narrow view as the whole truth. A responsibility not to shy away from reality, from issues, from controversy, from substance, from public discussion of all matters in the public interest.

Yet it is our contention that in prime time entertainment television, which most of the people watch most of the time and which has by far the largest impact of all television, these responsibilities are being shirked, willfully and totally.

The following examples are typical of everyday occurrences in television.

My collaborator and I interested a producer in doing a script about a magazine photographer in Vietnam who was shooting a picture essay on 18-year-olds going into their first combat. The photographer, a man who likes to incite action as much as to observe it, follows one especially cocky boy until he comes face to face with a guerrilla and then takes a picture showing terror in the boy's eyes.

The boy acts bravely; he just looks afraid. On the next patrol the boy, who has been shown the pictures of himself by the photographer with the result that he now begins to question his own bravery, anxiously looks around to see where the photographer is and whether he is taking more damning photos. He turns once too often and is killed.

The producer likes the story well enough, a character study that would allow us to say something about truth and bravery, he kindly called it—to forward it to the network for its required approval. The network liked the story, too. They wanted only one change, because Vietnam, you know, is controversial in television.

My collaborator, wise in the ways of television, felt his heart sink. If they wanted the story moved to Korea, or Germany during World War II, the usual gambits, we were prepared to make a fight of it.

No, not at all. Keep the story fresh and contemporary by all means. Keep it in the present. Just change the locale to Spain, make it a bullfight instead of a war, and make the soldier into a matador. That way, then the bull charges, the matador can look to see whether the photographer is taking more pictures and . . .

For another example I was asked to write another episode of the series The FBI on a subject of my choice at about the time, 5 or 6 years ago, when the four little girls were killed by the bomb in the Birmingham Church. It had been announced that the FBI was involving itself in the case and I told the producer I wanted to write a fictional account of it. He checked with the sponsor, the Ford Motor Co., and with the FBI—every proposed show is cleared sequentially through the producing company, QM; the Federal Bureau of Investigation; the network, ABC; and the sponsor, Ford; and any of the four can veto any show for any reason, which it need not disclose—and reported back that they would be delighted to have me write about a church bombing subject only to 3 stipulations. The church must be in the north, there could be no Negroes involved, and the bombing could have nothing at all to do with civil rights.

After I said I wouldn't write that program, I asked if I could do a show on police brutality, also in the news at that time. Certainly, the answer came back, as long as the charge was trumped up, the policeman vindicated, and the man who brought the specious charge prosecuted.

For another example, Robert Collins, an established writer, was asked to write for The Senator, deservedly called the boldest and best dramatic series on recent television. Collins writes:

> The theme of the first story I submitted was the question of possible amnesty for draft evaders. The producer refused the story on the ground that advocacy of amnesty was not the consensus of the country and was therefore unacceptable.
> The second show I proposed concerned itself with the question of whether a homosexual in government was, by the fact of his homosexuality, a possible security risk. The producer was willing in this case—but because the treatment of the homosexual in my story was sympathetic and he was portrayed as neither nance nor psychopath, and I refused to treat him as such, the network refused the story.

Writers by the dozens report that they have written characters who are black and have seen them changed to white; they have written Jews and seen them converted to Gentiles; they have proposed shows about South African apartheid, Vietnam, old folks, mental disease, politics, business, labor, students, and minorities; and they have been chased out of studios.

This year, 1 year after The Senator was canceled, ABC and Universal Studios did a show starring Anthony Quinn called "The Man and the City." Producer Stanley Rubin says:

> Although the format cried out for relevancy we were flatly forbidden to make a relevant show. On a series about a contemporary Mexican-American Mayor of a southwestern city, no stories about the poor, about the old, radicals, Chicanos, Blacks, the whole field of urban life was expressly and by fiat, forbidden.

The writer has no more freedom in any series in television. Take the omnipresent medical shows as a group—"Marcus Welby, M.D.," on ABC; "Medical Center" on CBS; "The Doctors" segment of the "Bold Ones" on NBC. Anybody who watches these programs must of necessity believe the following about American medicine:

No patient is ever denied a hospital bed or required to wait until one is available.

No doctor ever charges for his services; no hospital ever bills a patient; no one ever has to go on charity, or do without care.

Almost every doctor cures almost every patient—if only the patient will let him. Occasionally someone dies, more likely out of boredom or pique than of the medical profession's inability to cure him. He is usually 107 when he goes.

The American Medical Association doesn't exist, and, of course, doesn't lobby. There is no need for it, to be sure, because no one on television ever suggests that we need more and better doctors, more and better hospitals, and more and better medical schools, lower cost health care or, heaven help us, national health insurance.

At least two Senators on this subcommittee—Senator Kennedy and Senator Scott—have strong feelings about the cost and availability of health care in this country; they stand up here, in one of the two most influential forums in the country, and they say so. It is their right, not to say their obligation. Many writers agree with them. Those who do are absolutely prohibited from standing up in the other most influential forum and suggesting that American medicine could be improved, its cost reduced, its scope expanded. Their work is more difficult because our television doctors are all heroes and above mistakes or the need for help or improvement.

They're doing fine, their patients are all in splendid shape at the end of the hour, and the viewer is content—what could possibly be wrong with American health care?

The consequences of this shallow one-sidedness are tragic. No debate ensues, no national awareness of a problem which some of you and some of us believe may have reached crisis proportions. Personally I don't know whether there is a health crisis in America; I would like to know; I do know that it is a gross disservice to the country to refuse to discuss whether such a crisis exists.

It is our contention that this refusal to allow us to deal with the real world is one of the basest and most virulent forms of censorship imaginable, that there are substantial First Amendment questions here, and that there is, as a consequence, an immediate need to examine the enormous gap between what the law requires—namely, that television program in the public interest—and the television industry's own and self-serving interpretation of the law—namely, that it feels free to put on practically anything that will attract a sufficient audience.

What has happened is that the broadcasters have rewritten the definition of "the public interest" as follows:

> Robert Sarnoff, in a speech while he was still chairman of the corporate NBC (he has since become chairman of the parent RCA Corporation) once ventured a definition. He said the public interest was what the public was interested in. It was patently a definition to justify broadcasting's excesses in commercial entertainment. A young child may be interested in lighting matches and an older one in experimenting with drugs, but any parent knows that neither is in their best interest.
> LES BROWN,
> In Television: the Business Behind the Box.

The narrowness of this definition of the public interest and its essential unfairness to the real public interest is suggested by former Senator William Benton.

Mr. Benton says:

> I can only ask, if this alleged "wasteland" is indeed what the American people want, is it all they want of television? . . . Is it all they are entitled to ? . . . Are not . . . these dwellers of the wasteland . . . the same Americans who have taxed themselves to create a vast educational system . . . are they not the same who have established an admirable system of justice, created a network of churches . . . when they turn their TV knobs, do they not by the millions have interests broader than the entertainment which is so complacently theirs? . . . I think the American people should expect that the greatest single instrument of human communication ever developed must make its due contribution to human security and human advancement . . . A high common denominator distinguishes our people—as well as a low one—and both denominators apply to the same men, women and youngsters. Television was crystallized into the low road. . . .

Television does not program in the public interest; it programs in its own interest and its sponsor's interest and against the public's interest.

We are asked what differences it might make if the shackles were removed, if we were allowed to deal in issues. Aren't we all writers of fiction anyway? Aren't illusion and fantasy our stock in trade?

The difference would be that whereas now we are required to foster, without critical examination, a mythology which states that a punch in the mouth solves all problems and doesn't really hurt anyone, that bullet wounds without killing, that ours is a society hampered in its strivings to improve its acknowledged greatness only by the efforts of a few sinister malcontents who seek to undermine us for their own perverse purposes, instead of this mythology we could proceed to an honest evaluation of who we are and where we are headed.

Once we become aware that in real life the cavalry does not always arrive in time, that the good guys do not always win, that it must hurt deeply to be black and unemployed, or to be hungry in a land of abundance, once we strip away the cliches and look at the realities, then we can make that new first step toward our great and shared goals.

We want desperately to aid in this effort, not hinder it.

We will raise a great many questions here today and we do not pretend to know all the answers. But it seems to us that the problems are so grave and the consequences for America so great that a new attempt to examine the course of television, drawing on the nation's best minds, must now be made.

We therefore hope that you will recommend creation of a citizens committee to examine television which can make the necessary study and detailed recommendations that will, hopefully, start us on the high road.

We ask partly for ourselves. Dostoevski has written,

> There is 1 punishment so terrible that even hardened convicts tremble at the prospect, and that is simply this: To take a man's lifework and render it meaningless.

But much more than for ourselves as writers, we ask for the country.

Senator Ervin. The written statement is so illuminating and intriguing that I want to have the entire written statement printed in the record, because what you said was most illuminating, and there are very many illuminating things in the written statement that you did not allude to, and I think they are worthy of consideration.

(The document referred to follows:)

STATEMENT OF DAVID W. RINTELS [1], BEFORE THE SENATE SUBCOMMITTEE ON CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS,—FEBRUARY 8, 1972

My name is David W. Rintels. I am a writer, a member of the governing Council of The Writers Guild of America, West, and the Chairman of the Guild's Committee on Censorship. With me are, Liam O'Brien, formerly Story Editor of "Hawaii 5-O", and Norman Lear, writer and producer of "All In the Family." The President of the WGAw. Ranald MacDougall, has written to you that "Insofar as the Writers Guild of America is traditionally, historically, and unalterably opposed to censorship in any form, the members appearing before you have our complete support in their presentation." We deeply appreciate their support and confidence. Today, however, we speak as individual writers about our personal experiences and working knowledge.

As members of the Writers Guild, whose 3,000 members write every network television dramatic, comedy and variety program produced in this country, we appreciate and support fully this Subcommittee's historic efforts to keep the printed and broadcast press free of the restrictions of censorship and intimidation. Your work is vital to insure an informed public, just as an informed public is vital to insure the successful working of democracy.

[1] Member of Writers Guild of America, West and Chairman of its Committee on Censorship.

It is our hope here to convey to you our heartfelt belief that there are two related issues which fall within the scope of these hearings and which demand your most urgent attention:

First, the right of the men and women who write for television to deal in ideals and truths and realities free from the repressive censorship and program practices under which we do, in fact, write.

Second, the right of the American people to be exposed to something more than an endless cycle of programs that mislead them and distort the realities of what is happening in America today.

That these two issues are related and of grave concern to all of us should be clearly demonstrated by the following statistics taken from a recent poll of our Guild. Of all who responded:

Eighty-six (86) percent have found, from personal experience, that censorship exists in television. Many state, further, that they have never written a script, no matter how innocent, that has not been censored.

Eighty-one (81) percent believe that television is presenting a distorted picture of what is happening in this country today—politically, economically and racially.

Only eight (8) percent believe that current television programming is "in the public interest, convenience and necessity," as required by The Federal Communications Act of 1934, Title 47, U.S. Code, Secs. 307a, 307d.

Because these figures suggest strongly our conviction that the American people are being badly served by the television industry's use of the airwaves which they, the American people, own, it is proper to inquire as to the causes of these abuses. We look at these same figures and are horrified because we know, first-hand, that 75,000,000 people are nightly being fed programs deliberately designed to have no resemblance at all to reality, nonsense whose only purpose is to sell snake-oil and laxatives and underarm deodorants. ARCHIBALD MACLEISH.

"(Carroll) O'Connor (of ALL IN THE FAMILY) is baffled by some letters which show people take TV so seriously they evidently feel the Bunkers are a real family. Some ask why he treats his wife as he does; one man called him a big, dumb S-O-B for so doing; another wrote asking why he didn't leave his wife because she was such a dumbell!"

VARIETY.

"Forty percent of the poor black children and thirty percent of the poor white children (compared with 15 percent of the middle-class white youngsters) were ardent believers of the true-to-life nature of the television content."

Dr. BRADLEY S. GREENBERG,
Michigan State University.

So people watch television by the tens of millions. Many believe it literally. All of us are influenced by it to some extent. Increasingly television has become the literature of the Seventies. It is the newspaper, the magazine, the town meeting, the high school, the college of the country.

With such enormous influence comes enormous power, and with such power should come—must come, in the public interest—responsibility. We agree wholeheartedly with industry spokesmen who say that television has a responsibility to entertain. But we also believe that television has a responsibility not to deceive. Yet it is our contention that in prime-time entertainment television, which most of the people watch most of the time and which has by far the largest impact of all television, these responsibilities are being shirked, wilfully and totally.

From thousands of examples consider the following:

My collaborator and I interested a producer in doing a script about a magazine photographer in Vietnam who was shooting a picture essay on 18-year-olds going into their first combat. The photographer, a man who likes to incite action as much as to observe it, follows one especially cocky boy until he comes face to face with a guerilla and then takes a picture showing terror in the boy's eyes. That way, when the bull charges, the matador can look to see whether the photographer is taking more pictures and. . . .

Last year John Bloch was Story Editor on an ABC-Paramount Studios series called "The Young Lawyers." He wrote a script in which the white male Young Lawyer was to be shown having a drink in a public place with the black female Young Lawyer. Just drinking and talking, with perfect and total innocence. Six times the producer, acting under the explicit direction of the Paramount Studios censor and network liaison-man, Henry Colman, requested that the black girl be rewritten into a white girl; six times Bloch refused. Finally he was promised that the change would not be made. His option was not picked up by the studio and, after he was let go, the film was shot—with a white girl playing the part.

Norman Felton, Executive Producer of Dr. Kildare, writes: "On one occasion, despite backing from the American Medical Association, the National Educational Association and the Surgeon General of the United States (who eventually sent a telegram to the network endorsing the project) we were not allowed to present a film concerned with venereal disease. It was developed with scrupulous attention to good taste. The advisors, as above, pointed out that people watched a program like "Dr. Kildare" more than documentaries, and it would be of great benefit to the people of America for the film to be made and shown. The network, however, was afraid of 'offending'."

Robert Collins, an established writer, was asked three times to write episodes of THE SENATOR, deservedly called the boldest and best dramatic series on recent television.

"The theme of the first story I submitted was the question of possible amnesty for draft evaders. The Producer refused the story on the ground that advocacy of amnesty was not the consensus of the country and was therefore unacceptable.

The second show I proposed concerned itself with the question of whether a homosexual in government was, by the fact of his homosexuality, a possible security risk. The Producer was willing in this case—but because the treatment of the homosexual in my story was sympathetic and he was portrayed as neither nance nor psychopath, and I refused to treat him as such, the network refused the story.

The third story I proposed, again with the Producer's approval, dealt with the Pentagon's storage of nerve gas near an urban area. A one-line memo from Jean Messerschmitt of NBC to the Producer said simply this story was unacceptable to the network. She gave no reason but the Producer told me he had heard the subject would offend sponsors who had dealings with the Pentagon. I don't know about that; I do know that NBC is RCA, and RCA is one of the biggest defense contractors."

I have been required, by NBC and also by ABC, to delete the word 'Pentagon' from scripts even in strictly factual references. I have been allowed, on occasion, to mention the word 'army'. I don't understand the logic.

But I do understand perfectly the logic of the following: On the ABC series "The Invaders," the Producers were ordered to delete the word 'integrated' from a script. The network's position, stated to the Producer, was that the word could be used on occasion but must never be spoken by the hero of a series.

Norman Felton, again concerning his experiences as Executive Producer of "Dr. Kildare":

"We once did a script on Kildare called 'Holiday Weekend'. A doctor had told us that holiday weekends were the worst time in a hospital due to auto crashes. We thought it would be a public service to make a show about this, dramatizing—painfully—the need for safer and saner driving, and put it on the air the Thursday before the Labor Day weekend. NBC fought us, long and bitterly, before finally giving in, on the grounds that we were an entertainment show and what, please was entertaining about auto crashes?"

Writers by the dozens report that they have written characters who are black and have seen them changed to white; they have written Jews and seen them converted to Gentiles; they have proposed shows about South African apartheid, Vietnam, old folks, mental disease, politics, business, labor, students, and minorities; and they have been chased out of studios.

This year, one year after "The Senator" was cancelled, ABC and Universal Studios did a show starring Anthony Quinn called "The Man and The City." Producer Stanley Rubin says: "Although the format cried out for relevancy we were flatly forbidden to make a relevant show. On a series about a contemporary Mexican-American Mayor of a southwestern city, no stories about the poor, about the old, radicals, Chicanos, Blacks—the whole field of urban life was, expressly and by fiat, forbidden."

Says Rubin, "I wanted to do one show about the refusal of a father to accept a posthumous medal for his son, killed in Vietnam. The issue of the war was background to the plot, which concerned the man and not the war. The network turned this story down. ABC does not recognize war."

There are thousands of other stories ranging from the ridiculous—as when Adrian Samish, who supervises all scripts for QM Productions, which is responsible for "The Fugitive," "The FBI," "Cannon," etc., objected to a political reference in a script of mine by slamming his fist on my desk and telling me, 'We hired you to write scripts, goddam it, not to put your ideas in them'—to the marvelously sublime, as when the Producer of the series "My Favorite Martian" required a writer to change a line on the grounds that "A Martian would never talk like that." The list is so long that it is impossible to believe for one moment that these are isolated instances, temporary abberations, foolishness on the part of a few myopic individuals. On the contrary, these instances are symptomatic of the rigorous and final institutionalization of censorship and thought control on television.

Let us now look at one whole series: ABC's "The FBI."

The FBI series, about to go into its eighth successful year under the official imprimatur of J. Edgar Hoover and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, formerly claimed that its programs were based on real FBI cases, when they frequently were not, and even now claims that its programs are 'inspired' by real FBI cases, which they frequently are not; that although the names and places are fictitious, everything you see on the air happened and they have even broadcast official-looking file numbers on the air to prove it; and, if this isn't enough, a narrator begins each program by announcing the exact date on which the crime was committed and ends each program by announcing, documentary-style, the federal prison terms meted out by federal courts to the criminals. They then show you the great seal of the FBI and thank the Bureau and Mr. Hoover for their cooperation. They strongly imply, in short, that they are telling you the truth about what the FBI does. The facts suggest something very different.

For example, I was offered a job writing on the series; when I asked them which case they wanted me to adapt, they told me to come up with a story of my own invention—no case needed. Other writers, including the President of the Television Branch of the Writers Guild of America, have had the same experience. It doesn't always work this way—sometimes the Producers invent and write out, with the cooperation of the resident FBI Agent assigned to the series, one page 'notions' which they then assign to writers; sometimes the shows are in fact based on real cases—but in many cases the story is not only not 'based on' or 'inspired' by real FBI cases, it is invented solely by the writer and/or producer, and inevitably the story details are fabricated from beginning to end. As William Randolph Hearst cabled the artist Frederic Remington in 1898 before hostilities broke out between the United States and Spain over Cuba, "You provide the pictures, I'll provide the war."

For a second example, I was asked to write another episode of THE FBI on a subject of my choice, at about the time, five or six years ago, when the four little Black girls were killed by the bomb in the Birmingham Church. It had been announced that the FBI was involving itself in the case and I told the producer I wanted to write a fictional account of it. He checked with the sponsor, the Ford Motor Company, and with the FBI—every proposed show is cleared sequentially through the producing company, QM; the Federal Bureau of Investigation; the network, ABC; and the sponsor, Ford; and any of the four can veto any show for any reason, which it need not disclose—and reported back that they would be delighted to have me write about a Church bombing subject only to these stipulations: The Church must be in the North, there could be no Negroes involved, and the bombing could have nothing at all to do with civil rights. After I said I wouldn't write that program, I asked if I could do a show on police brutality, also in the news at that time; certainly, the answer came back, as long as the charge was trumped up, the policeman vindicated, and the man who brought the specious charge prosecuted.

For a third example, and to lend credence to the second, in the seven years in which the series has been on the air, years of great change racially in this country, change in which the FBI has been centrally involved, the producers have never—not once—done a program about any aspect of the violation of the civil rights of a minority. There is dramatic material for a thousand shows in this area, and the writers would not, for a change, have to invent the details; scores of writers have asked if they could write about civil rights and each has been turned down. If you want to do a kidnaping, great; Communist espionage, wonderful; organized crime, marvelous; civil rights, never.

Fourth Example: On the series no FBI agent has ever bugged a house or tapped a phone or hired a paid informant. And no writer is ever allowed to suggest that these strategems are ever employed, or indeed that they exist. They may be invaluable to police work and the FBI certainly employs them, the argument goes, but they're bad public relations. The public can be spared these truths.

Fifth example: Should a writer want to write, say, about violations of anti-trust law, he is told to go elsewhere. In seven years not one episode of the FBI has allowed on this subject. The trouble is, of course, there is no other place for the writer to go in television—no other series will touch this subject, either—so no writer can write about it on television, and nobody who depends on television for his knowledge of the world will ever know that crime in the real world is sometimes committed by respectable white-collar types. Street crime and organized-gang crime and law-and-order crime exist because they are a staple of dramatic television. Anti-trust crime does not exist, in effect, because television says it does not exist, any more than violations of minority rights happen. The FBI in Washington of course does know that these crimes happen because it is charged with investigating them, in fact if not on television.

There are other misrepresentations made to the American people by this purportedly realistic series. Although the Director of the FBI, Mr. Hoover, has said publicly that La Cosa Nostra exists, the series chooses to call it The Organization, a criminal syndicate whose chief visible trait is that its membership is comprised of a lot of non-Italians named Smith keeping up with a lot of folks named Jones; again, although the FBI explicitly teaches its agents never to shoot except to kill, on the series nobody has been killed for years now—wounded by the carload, certainly, but never killed.

There is other, sadder evidence of the series' refusal to deal with the real world or even to acknowledge its existence—in seven years on the air, not one woman has ever been hired to write an episode, nor has any Black, despite the fact that on one occasion a white writer with four credits on the series recommended a black writer and said that he would rewrite the script for free if the black writer's script was not up to par; and, a matter which will concern the members of this Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights as much as it does us, namely that the producers acknowledge privately what has long been an open secret in the industry, that all actors and writers and directors are screened by the Federal Bureau of Investigation in Washington and only those who are "politically acceptable" to the FBI are hired—but by now the message should be clear. The American people are being force-fed a dishonest picture of the work of a Government agency and any writer who attempts to portray the real world, suggesting that white collar or business crime exists or that crimes against peoples' rights are as much a source of national concern as crimes against their persons, is simply not allowed to do so.

The writer has no more freedom to deviate from the official line in any series in television. Take the omnipesent medical shows as a group—"Marcus Welby, M.D." on ABC; "Medical Center" on CBS; "The Doctors" segment of "The Bold Ones" on NBC. Anybody who watches these programs must of necessity believe the following about American medicine:

No patient is ever denied a hospital bed or required to wait until one is available.

No doctor ever charges for his services; no hospital ever bills a patient; no one ever has to go on charity, or do without care.

Almost every doctor cures almost every patient—if only the patient lets him. Occasionally someone does die, more likely out of boredom or pique than of the medical profession's inability to cure him; he's usually 107 when he goes.

The American Medical Association doesn't exist, and of course doesn't lobby. There's no need for it, to be sure, because no one on television ever suggests that we need more and better doctors, more and better hospitals, more and better medical schools, lower-cost health care or, heaven help us, national health insurance.

The one man with more experience than any other in producing medical shows for television, Norman Felton, has been responsible for "Dr. Kildare," "The Eleventh Hour," and "The Psychiatrist." Felton says:

"Television does not reflect truth. On the DR. KILDARE series we were asked by NBC to get the approval and seal of the A.M.A. This meant that we submitted scripts for approval to the A.M.A. Although the organization gave us technical help, it goes without saying that we did not present an accurate picture of the practice of medicine, or the difficulties many people had in obtaining adequate medical care. . . . The network's censorship extended from preventing us from tackling whole subject matters to a myriad of smaller items, such as making us take out any reference to 'breast' or use of the word in a film concerned with mastectomy. Control of ideas exists down to the present in series such as 'Marcus Welby, M.D.,' and 'Medical Center.' "

At least two Senators on this Subcommittee—Senator Kennedy and Senator Scott—have strong feelings about the cost and availability of health care in this country; they stand up here, in one of the two most influential forums in the country, and they say so. It's their right, not to say their obligation. Many writers agree with them. Those who do are absolutely prohibited from standing up in the other most influential forum and suggesting that American medicine could be improved, its costs reduced, its scope expanded. Your work is more difficult because our television doctors are all heroes and above mistakes or the need for help or improvement. They're doing fine, their patients are all in splendid shape at the end of the hour, and the viewer is content—what could possibly be wrong with American health care?

The consequences of this shallow one-sidedness are tragic. No debate ensues, no national awareness of a problem which some of you and some of us believe may have reached crisis proportions. Personally, I don't know whether there is a health crisis in America; I'd like to know; I do know that it is a gross disservice to the country to refuse to discuss whether such a crisis exists.

Here, then, is the impossible situation we labor under. We want desperately to write about the subjects which interest us as writers and human beings, subjects which are not very different from those which interest you. But we cannot because the men who control television have decreed, we feel in gravest error, that these matters do not interest the public. Cops-and-robbers interest the public; large and happy families whose worst problem is whether Gramps will find his new set of teeth before the Saturday-night wingding at the Golden Age Home interest the public; dentists with chimpanzees and priests who solve crimes and lawyers who invariably defend minority-group children without fee and never lose a case—these interest the public. But life and truth do not interest the public and cannot be written about except in rare instances when we are allowed to explore controversial themses, but only under the most rigidly controlled conditions and only under the expressed condition that we still 'play it safe'.

It is our contention that this is one of the basest and most virulent forms of censorship imaginable, that there are substantial First Amendment questions here, and that there is, as a consequence, an immediate need to examine the enormous gap between what the law requires—namely, that television program in the public interest—and the television industry's own and self-serving interpretation of the law—namely, that it feels free to put on practically anything which will attract a sufficient audience.

The broadcasters have rewritten the definition of "the public interest" as follows:

"Robert Sarnoff, in a speech while he was still chairman of corporate NBC (he has since become chairman of the parent RCA Corporation), once ventured a definiton. He said the public interest was what the public was interested in. It was patently a definition to justify broadcasting's excesses in commercial entertainment. A young child may be interested in lighting matches and an older one in experimenting with drugs, but any parent knows that neither is in their best interest."

LES BROWN,
In Television: The Business Behind The Box.

". . . . a program in which a large part of the audience is interested is by that very fact . . . in the public interest."

DR. FRANK STANTON,
President, now Vice-Chairman of the Board of CBS, 1970.

"I believe that he (Stanton) despaired of the broadcast schedule about 1960; thereafter he did not bother to watch much of it except for news and special programs."

FRED FRIENDLY,
Former President, CBS News,

We do not have to watch, either; but we do write for it and under arbitrary and restrictive conditions imposed upon no other people in this country. We cannot explore, we cannot discuss, we cannot criticize. Lawyers and police and teachers and clergy all have the right publicly to explore their professions and to criticize where they feel criticism is merited. We cannot; writers in television are absolutely prohibited that right of speech. The NBC Radio and Television Broadcast Standards and Practices Book, Page 8, Paragraph 1, reads:

"Respect for lawyers, police, teachers and the clergy should not be diminished by undue and unnecessary emphasis on unfavorable aspects of members of these professions."

The Standards and Practices books do not spell out the many other restrictions under which we labor. Of course, they do not have to. We all know what the rules are by now and we know how to obey them if we hope to survive.

These unwritten rules, which were born out of the union between Television and Business and which limit so drastically our right to speak and your right to hear, were carved in granite long before 1959. But never have they been better expressed then in a memo of that year, when Hubbell Robinson was in charge of all Programming for CBS Television. The following is a letter he received from the general manager for radio and television of a major advertising agency:

"We have already passed along to your people something of the flareback that came to various members of the sponsor organization and, in turn, was passed along to us.

We know that your series is striving mightily to do things that are different and outstanding so that as a series it will rise above the general level of TV drama. This is fine but since the series is a vehicle for commercial advertisers, it must also be extremely sensitive to utilizing anything, however, dramatic, however different, however well done, if this will offend viewers. Creative people, of course, are constantly protesting against being stifled by what they may think are the narrow, limited or prejudiced views of other people, and certainly creative people must be offered an opportunity for the full development of their creative talents—but only under certain circumstances. This cannot be true in the case of a commercial vehicle.

You know that we can never lose sight of the fact that the sole purpose for which an advertiser spends money is to win friends and influence people. Anything that he might do, however meritorious in one direction, that makes enemies is a bad action and is to be assiduously avoided. As long as this series wishes commercial sponsorship, all of the creative people associated therewith must never forget that not to offend people must be an inviolate rule for guiding their operation. Narrow, prejudiced, ignorant, or what you will, though any part of the population may be, as a commercial vehicle the series must be ever alert not to alienate its viewers. I think you can gather that from the sponsor's point of view this matter is serious. We would like to hope that as a result of this second major flare-up in one season we are taking such steps as may be necessary to insure that no future program in this series violates the public concept of what is right."

ROBINSON,
Introduction to Electronic Drama.

Dollars, ratings, sponsors, affiliates, networks—the whole economic base of television has been so thoroughly documented that it requires no elaboration here. Suffice to say that in the same year Robinson received that letter, Walter Lippman wrote "While television is supposed to be 'free,' it has in fact become the creature, the servant and indeed the prostitute of merchandising."

What is in the sponsor's interest is clear. What is in the network's interest is also clear. We only get into difficulties when we ask, as the law invites us to, what is in the public interest?

Realistically and unsurprisingly, every writer who wants to make a living knows what the rules are: learning is the beginning of survival. As a consequence, censorship invariably and unhappily begins, like charity, at home. The unwritten rules are so well known that it is a recklessly brave and probably independently wealthy writer who attempts to buck The System in an attempt to get anything of substance on the air. The majority of writers who hope to sell know enough to come in with safe ideas.

If they do not, the network quickly tells them.

Writes William Froug:

"During the two years I served as an Executive Producer at CBS-TV it was repeatedly made clear to me that the network was in the business of 'pure entertainment', that nothing of a controversial, provocative or disturbing nature was to be permitted in programming. The philosophy, often explicitly expressed, always implicit in the day-to-day operations, was to provide the greatest number of people with the least offensive material. As noted writer Walter Brown Newman, author of the original GUNSMOKE script in radio from which the series originated, stated it to me: 'In television the writer's job is to write about nothing.' "

But if a writer screws up his courage and mortgages his house, he can try. Many do. They can go in and meet a Producer with a story they want to do. With what prospects? What is the Producer's function? Writes Froug:

"As the producer of many television series ('Twilight Zone,' 'Mr. Novak,' 'Playhouse 90,' 'Alcoa-Goodyear Theatre,' 'Bewitched,' 'Dick Powell Theatre,' etc.) it was a correlative of the work that a precise form of pre-censorship and self-censorship be exercised at all times. That is to say that my function was to discourage writers from thinking in areas which the networks would find too 'sensitive'."

Froug never was given a written copy of the unwritten rules, either. He never had to be:

"The rules existed and to my best knowledge still exist. They were the topic of many meetings with network officials and it was rarely necessary that they be written down. Everyone always clearly understood everyone else when it came to what could and what could not be dramatized on television. There was no chance for misunderstanding for, if a submitted story violated any of the precepts . . . it was quickly returned with a phone call to the effect that such-and-such could not be approved unless the offensive material were deleted."

Even writers who should know better censor themselves and each other when they get into positions of responsibility as producers and executives. Two weeks ago a writer-producer who serves on the Censorship Committee of the Writers Guild told another writer that he would not buy a script about the practice of some otherwise reputable drug companies which manufacture excess amphetamines for the illicit market on the grounds that, although the problem was factual and serious. "You can't get away with taking on a drug company on television and you know it." In other words, you can attack dope-pushers on television only up to the point where they become a vested interest; and then you must stop.

If the fact is that we do admittedly censor ourselves, if only to prevent the networks from doing it to us, why are we here criticizing The System and the networks?

The answer is that the network is to blame because it sets a climate, a tone, a standard which requires us to write only the material it will put on. The tone is set when they schedule only action-adventure melodramas and situation comedies and variety shows to write for; it grows through the meetings at which they expound the unwritten rules; and it reaches full flower when they hunt through our scripts looking for words and ideas and dreams to delete. Does anyone believe for a moment that if the networks actively sought creativity, ideas, provocative themes handled with conviction, that if they encouraged writers to use logic and reason and emotion and truth in our scripts instead of three shootouts, two auto crashes and a karate chop on the neck, we would not jump at the chance?

They say they are an entertainment medium although the law says they must program in the public interest. They say they are an entertainment medium and then define entertainment to rule out the actions and passions of our time. They allow laughter but not tears, fantasy but not reality, escapism but not truth. Television chooses almost never to stretch its boundaries to include serious drama, or indeed any drama that is not melodrama; chooses not to allow points of view not 'safe', not its own; chooses not to include art or music or literature in its giddy chase after what it considers entertainment.

We want to entertain; writers don't want to bore anyone any more than executives do. But why cannot entertainment be truthful? Free from distortion? Why cannot television ever reflect the real world? Why must it always be that television brings you a detective in a wheel chair and that is a success so next they bring you an insurance investigator who is blind and that is a success with the result that now ABC is trying to put together a new show about—I wouldn't kid about this—a Sheriff in the Old West with a stiff trigger finger. In the public interest, presumably.

Earlier we said we would challenge the whole premise that a clear majority of the people want this kind of programming and the corollary to that premise, which has become the credo and raison d'etre and justification of the television industry, that the people will watch no other kind. I hate, personally, being held in such base contempt by the television industry, and I don't believe them. When THE SENATOR was on, so briefly, it had an average 29-rating share for the year, which translates into imprecise millions but means that 29 out of each hundred television sets were turned to a show of significant content. On occasion THE SENATOR went over a 35-share, meaning that more than one-third of the national audience was watching this show. Or viewed another way, probably more people watched one episode of THE SENATOR on television than have seen, live in theatres, all the plays of Shakespeare produced in every language in every country of the world since they were written.

Does this not suggest that we are smarter, more aware, more eager to be informed and involved in the world around us than these men who program shows in such disregard for us can know or will admit? And isn't it vitally important to ask the question raised by former Senator William Benton, as cited by Commissioner Johnson of the Federal Communications Commission in his book How To Talk Back To Your Television Set:

"I can only ask, if this alleged 'wasteland' is indeed what the American people want, is it all they want of television? . . . Is it all they are entitled to? . . . Are not . . . these dwellers of the wasteland . . . the same Americans who have taxed themselves to create a vast educational system . . . are they not the same who have established an admirable system of justice, created a network of churches . . . when they turn their TV knobs, do they not by the millions have interests broader than the entertainment which is so complacently theirs? . . . I think the American people should expect that the greatest single instrument of human communication ever developed must make its due contribution to human security and human advancement. . . . A high common denominator distinguishes our people—as well as a low one—and both denominators apply to the same men, women and youngsters. Television has crystallized into the low road. . ."

There is still another collateral question which must be asked. Is television really giving us what we want, as its spokesmen claim, or has it, rather, simply conditioned us to accept and even appreciate, like Pavlov's dogs, what it programs for us? We can never truly know the price we have paid and continue to pay, individually and as a nation, for television's conditioning of us and our expectations. Like babies who have been fed nothing but Pablum, our taste has been dulled to the point that dry martinis and thick steaks taste somehow wrong.

It does not have to be this way. In Elizabethan England, the popular theatre of the day—their equivalent of our television—was Shakespeare and Marlowe. From the royalty in the galleries to the common people in the pits, it was what they got and it became what they wanted—or perhaps it was the other way 'round. We have not progressed culturally quite as far as we think in three-and-a-half centuries. Television is partly the evidence of this, and I suspect also partly the cause.

And yet, when they give us the few chances we get to see quality programming, as often as not we do respond. Dramatic subjects, provocative themes provocatively handled—these draw enormous audiences. Norman Lear is here to testify to that as Producer of "All in The Family"—and also to the three years of difficulty he had in getting the series on the air.

The Director of Sales and Marketing for Time-Life Films, Wynn Nathan, further substantiates the case for quality programming in a publication of the Broadcast Information Bureau, Inc.

"I have talked about 'quality' and specialized programs as though I assumed they would get poor ratings. And perhaps I have fallen into a trap I suggested the program makers have fallen into. Actually, when supposedly specialized programs have been tried in prime time lately, they have often done surprisingly well in the ratings. One good example was 'The Six Wives of Henry VIII,' a BBC-TV produced series of six ninety-minute plays—quite specialized in that it was about English history and was serious drama. Television programming for only a special highbrow audience, it seemed. While it was plainly quality programming, Henry VIII was not a safe programming idea for prime time. Here's what happened when it played: it increased CBS's audience for the time period 10% over the previous four weeks, getting a 25% share of the national audience; and in the key markets of Los Angeles and New York it consistently beat network A's movie in the ratings—by large margins."

So the public is truly interested in programs truly in the public interest. We can be delighted that CBS showed this series, even though someone else produced it. Still, why cannot CBS produce good television? Why did CBS, like NBC and ABC, reject the prize-winning British series 'Civilization,' hosted by Sir Kenneth Clark, when it was offered to them, and let PBS—Educational Television—carry it?

One answer is given by William Froug:

"A few years ago I was employed by CBS Television as Executive Producer in charge of Dramatic Programs. On my first day of work I reported to Hunt Stromberg, Jr., Vice President in charge of Programs for CBS, Hollywood, at that time. Mr. Stromberg briefed me on my duties with the following statement: 'Your job here is to produce s---.' "

And the British Broadcasting Corporation is left to produce "Civilization," "The Six Wives of Henry VIII" and "The Forsythe Saga."

It's a disgrace and a scandal but it's also something worse, a source of national sadness and concern for all of us that American television imports "Civilization," "The Six Wives of Henry VIII," and "Forsythe Saga," while American television exports "The Beverly Hillbillies," "Green Acres" and "Gilligan's Island." You are not the only ones in this country who have to worry about a Balance of Payments deficit.

And every year it gets worse.

Ours is not a new complaint. Television has long been delinquent in its responsibilities. Even its most ardent defenders concede that:

"Too often the machine runs away with itself . . . instead of keeping pace with the social needs it was created to serve."

WILLIAM S. PALEY,
Chairman of the Board, CBS, 1936.

What, if anything, is significant and new in our appeal?

The difference might be only that now the country seems of a mood to demand its rights. to ask for itself what it believes to be fair. There is a bright new spirit afoot which says that if air pollution is legal and institutionalized, it ought not to be. A protest must be made and must be listened to.

It is our belief that air pollution is no less a problem in television than it is in the automobile industry or a mill town or a crowded city, and that the public interest means that we can no more afford the one than the other.

The men who control television do not agree with us. But their view of the public interest was made painfully clear several years ago when, long after the Surgeon General issued his report conclusively linking cigarette smoking with cancer, they persisted in advertising cigarettes and stopped only when Congress passed a law forbidding it.

Their view of the public interest as being subservient to their private interests has not changed for the better. And now it seems clear that something must be done.

The solution could possibly lie in our hands as writers, if only our hands were untied. There is little wrong with television that could not be cured by diversity of ideas and programs, by the freedom to explore and discuss anything in this world free from the fears and structures which dominate our business. At least it would be a beginning.

We are sometimes asked what we really want, why the end of censorship is so important to us. Sometimes the question is meant to imply that we are little boys who want to write dirty words on bathroom walls.

Nothing could be further from the truth. What we want is the freedom that everyone else in this country has and which we alone are denied—the freedom not to have to distort the truth as we see it.

We are also asked what difference it will make. Aren't we all writers of fiction anyway? Aren't illusion and fantasy our stock in trade? Here the answer is easier.

Perhaps among us there is a Zola or a Dickens, a man who can see a wrong and by his skill and zeal require us to right it.

Perhaps we can stimulate and excite the country to care about its deeper heritage, its drama and art and music and history and poetry and literature and science, all the glories which television now denies us.

But the real difference would be that whereas now we are required to foster, without critical examination, a mythology which states that a punch in the mouth solves all problems and doesn't really hurt anyone, that bullets wound without killing, that ours is a society hampered in its strivings to improve its acknowledged greatness only by the efforts of a few sinister malcontents who seek to undermine us for their own perverse purposes, instead of this mythology we could proceed to an honest evaluation of who we are and where we are headed. Once we become aware that in real life the cavalry does not always arrive in time, that the good guys do not always win, that it must hurt deeply to be black and unemployed or to be hungry in land a of abundance, once we strip away the cliches and look at the problems, then we can make that new first step toward our great and shared goals.

We want desperately to aid in this effort, not hinder it.

A member of this Senate sees deep implications in refusing to make the necessary effort. Senator Robert Dole poses the following questions?

"Every day and every night for most of their lives your children and mine have watched (on television) the major problems of the universe solved in 30 to 60 minutes. Is it possible—and I throw this at you as a question, not a conclusion—is it possible part of the unrest in this country, part of the dissatisfaction with our leaders is that, as far as our children are concerned, they do not solve problems fast enough? The smog that is here today is here tomorrow. And so is the civil rights problem. And so is the war. And you name it. In real life problems are solved and go away very slowly. Are our children having trouble separating the immediacy of TV from the reality of life? Are they demanding more than we can ever deliver, or more than they will ever be able to deliver? Is TV creating a frustration with reality that can only be relieved by threats and demands for change, and that failing, by violence? I don't know the answer but I suggest that we think about it."

We, too, have raised a great many questions here today and, like Senator Dole, we do not pretend to know all the answers. But it seems to us that the problems we have discussed are so grave and the consequences for America so great that a new attempt to examine the course of television, drawing on the nation's best minds, must now be made. We therefore hope that you will recommend creation of a Citizens Committee to Examine Television which can make the necessary study and detailed recommendations that will, hopefully, start us on the high road.

We ask partly for ourselves. Doestoievski has written, "There is one punishment so terrible that even hardened convicts tremble at the prospect, and that is simply this: to take a man's lifework and render it meaningless." But much more than for ourselves as writers, we ask for the country.

Senator ERVIN. I certainly would agree with your observation that television is a most powerful instrument. As I ride around the country I notice houses which may have a broken-down car in the yard, or no car at all, which may look like they are about to fall into ruins, but there is always a television antenna sticking out of the roof, no matter how dilapidated the roof is.

On several occasions I have been very much astounded by the many quotations, even from commercials, that my 5-year-old granddaughter quotes verbatim.

I think that it is undoubtedly true that television does not present some things that I think should be presented. Furthermore, I get tired of the barrage of these commercials about underarm deodorants that keep you reliable all day, and things of that kind.

For that reason, I am tempted to turn off the commercial television and to to public broadcasting. But public broadcasting also has its problems, particularly in getting financed.

Mr. RINTELS. Yes. It can't get long-term financing.

Senator ERVIN. I was in hopes that you would have solutions to all these problems.

[Laughter.]

Mr. RINTELS. I was in hopes that you would, Senator.

Senator ERVIN. After all, television depends upon its receipts for its ability to survive. I am sure that none of us wants the government to be the exclusive agent of the broadcasting industry, because

I am sure the things they would broadcast would be as dull as the Congressional Record, and some of them would have as much fiction as the Congressional Record also has.

So we have a problem here. I sometimes fight some bills and advocate others, which television doesn't pay attention to. I wish they would entertain the same sound notions as I do on all subjects.

I do think we have a pragmatic problem here: None of us wants censorship, that is, we don't want official censorship by government, because we recognize that it would certainly be destructive to the absolute free dissemination of information. I mean free in the sense that a person could select from whatever information is disseminated, and ideas presented.

The question comes down to this: What is a practical way in which you can induce television to buy and disseminate ideas which it either does not like or which it deems unpopular?

Mr. RINTELS. It seems to me that an implicit bargain has been struck, that the government has granted to the networks and television stations the right to sell the time to advertisers, but the grant comes with a small condition to it, and that is that you must serve the public.

The question is raised, does a succession of action adventure melodramas and comedy shows and variety shows well serve the public interest?

I think that it does not, that it interests part of the public, but that there must be some accountability, by the networks, they must respond somewhat to the real public interest, to the interests of the people. They must not present one point of view, not present a narrow or distorted or a limited point of view.

This is what terrifies me so about television programing, that by refusing to deal with issues of substance and controversy, they are presenting a false picture of what is happening in this country today. They are gulling the American people by their refusal to deal with issues. That is what frightens me so.

Senator ERVIN. Certainly the laws and acts of commerce which relate to the licensing of broadcasting and assignment of frequencies contemplate that they will provide a public service and that they will present different points of view on controversial questions.

The opinion you have expressed was expressed, I think, by Fred Friendly who has had vast experience in the broadcasting industry and a very profound thinker in the field of journalism, and that is to the effect that the national broadcast systems are more concerned about their financial profits than the public service.

On the other hand some of the broadcasters come before us and say that the Fairness Doctrine prohibits their expression of views on controversial questions because they immediately have an inordinate demand for time by people who disagree with the broadcast.

Too much governmental regulations will tend to kill almost anything. On the other hand, you have the great privilege given to the broadcast industry, and there can be no doubt of the fact that it is the most powerful and potent force in the world today for the dissemination of ideas or lack of ideas.

Mr. RINTELS. Yes.

Senator Ervin. So you would think that the best way to approach this problem would be to establish some kind of commission composed of citizens to study the question and make recommendations with respect to broadcasting and with respect to commerce?

Mr. Rintels. That would be a good start, Senator. I will think about your question and make more detailed recommendations, if I may, to add to the record at a later date. Or, perhaps, hopefully, even come back.

Mr. Lear. Mr. Chairman, I am Mr. Lear; as Mr. Rintels said, and as writer and producer of "All in the Family," I seem to be enjoying a rather singular experience insofar as network censorship is concerned.

Senator Ervin. I will have to confess that I always enjoyed watching "All in the Family," because I think it presents so well and in such a dramatic fashion some of us people.

I confess that my next favorite program is Gunsmoke because the good guys always come out good in it——

[Laughter.]

Senator Ervin (continuing). And, that is so different from my own experience. I sometimes propose some good legislation and other guys don't enact it, and sometimes I am trying to kill bad legislation, and the bad guys pass it by an overwhelming majority.

Mr. Lear. I am indebted to you. A few weeks ago we did an episode that had I the right and opportunity to make a dedication, because the subject was on surveillance and the invasion of privacy, I would have dedicated it to you and to this committee.

Senator Ervin. I enjoyed it very much. While that program was on, Dr. Albert Coats of the University of North Carolina called me and said, "I want to be sure you are looking at 'All in the Family'."

STATEMENT OF NORMAN LEAR

Mr. Lear. I am happy to say that I am completely free to delve into any subject matter, no matter how sensitive, bound only by the limits of my own taste and discretion. This is not to say that program practices does not make suggestions, many of which I am happy to accept, but they are offered as suggestions only.

The history of "All in the Family" was not always so peaceful. The first pilot tape for this series was made by Tandem Productions, a company owned jointly by myself and partner Bud Yorkin. I wrote and directed this pilot for the American Broadcasting Co. The script was exactly the same as the one that eventually became the first show of the CBS series 4 years later.

This early pilot also starred Carroll O'Connor and Jean Stapleton, the present stars of "All In the Family." ABC reacted quite favorably to the first pilot, but they were concerned about the extent of its departure from the norm, and it failed to make their fall (1968–69) schedule.

I am taking the liberty of making some deletions in the interests of time.

There were only 3 ballparks in the network television, and we couldn't play in any of them, so I returned to making films for theatrical release.

Two and a half years later Mr. Robert D. Wood became the new president of the Columbia Broadcasting System and Fred Silverman, his vice president in charge of programing. Mr. Wood was eager to begin his regime with something innovative and when he expressed this desire they introduced him to "All in the Family."

I was editing the film I had written and directed in the intervening 2 years when the call came that CBS was interested in "All in the Family" and wished to meet with me to discuss it. In the ensuing months I spent literally dozens of hours in conversation with various members of the department of program practices, especially its head, Mr. William Tankersley, a vice president of the network. He is no longer with the network, by the way. He has been replaced very recently. But Mr. Tankersley was vice president of the network at the time.

In reflecting upon that first meeting, I realize that Mr. Tankersley and I had really not reached a meeting of the minds. We had enjoyed a lively discussion and had reached a degree of mutual respect which allowed each of us to think that the other fellow was so reasonable we could ultimately change his mind.

For example, in that first meeting Mr. Tankersley stated objections to certain areas of the pilot script, which he termed explicit sex.

In refuting his argument I told him I believed that explicit sex in an honest and real situation would not upset the American television audience and that personally I found it more tasteful than the kind of sex by innuendo that was presently allowed by program practices on various shows.

I might add that is on all three networks. All of my early talks with the department of program practices at CBS were on this ather esoteric, nonspecific plane, until a week before the show was heduled to premiere. By that time we were in production and had lready filmed four episodes.

Now I began to experience the kind of pressure that Mr. Rintels as referred to and Mr. O'Brien will refer to in his statement.

In the week prior to the premiere of "All in the Family," Mr. Tankersley first asked me if I would agree to plan the second show as the remiere episode. He felt the second show was a lot more tame than he first and would therefore offend fewer viewers and affiliates.

I neglected to mention that one of the network's prime concerns vas the affiliate stations around the country and their owner-managrs. They did not want to air a show which might cause these men o drop the series after one episode.

I explained to Mr. Tankersley that I had designed the first show o introduce Archie Bunker as fully as I knew how so that there as no doubt as to what he was. In my opinion CBS and "All in the amily" had to jump in the water together and get fully wet the first me out. I felt if we didn't do that with the very first episode the ries would never get further than wading.

And so, in hours of discussion on the subject I held firm to my sition that the first show—the pilot show—must air first.

Two days before the scheduled premiere program practices agreed o air the first show first. With two or three suggestions and trims, however, said trims or deletions were all in the area of what pr

gram practices called, explicit sex.

I refused to allow the trims and in literally hours and hours o cross-country conversation with Mr. Tankersley I held to my theor that the American public was ready to accept the degree of realit that "All in the Family" represented.

And I preferred not to go on the air at all if it meant tamperin with the reality one iota. I suppose again it was in the last hours o these discussions that Mr. Tankersley and I learned that neither o us was as reasonable as we had believed at the beginning. In an event, it wasn't until 7:05 p.m., California time, the day before "A in the Family" was to premiere that I could call my wife, France and tell her the show was going on the air.

The network was committed to making, or at least paying for 1 episodes, but until that moment when Mr. Tankersley agreed to a the first show with no deletions I had absolutely no reason to be ce tain that "All in the Family" would make it to the air at all.

I am aware from reading the statements prepared by David Ri tels for this committee that my own remarks regarding network cen sorship seem soft-pedaled. There are several reasons for this. First, am not censored. Second, I don't own a network so if Robert Wo had not backed me at the last minute, "All in the Family" would n have seen the light of day. Third, I think I understand wh accounts for the provincial, narrow attitudes of the executives wh occupy posts in the departments of program and practices at th three networks. Somewhere, some time ago, someone coined th fiction that the mentality of the American motion picture patro averages between 12 and 13 years of age. And in the thinktanks o all American business, not just in the mass media area, but in a
American business, this fiction has been accepted as truth and th truth has been extended to the American public as a whole.

Mr. Tankersley and his conferees are trapped by such myt
Another myth is: The average man doesn't want to come home fro a hard day's work and be faced with problems on television. H wants escapism, entertainment, and fluff. "All in the Family" has tac led many everyday problems and the average American, returni from his hard day's work, has not only accepted it but made it t
most popular show on TV.

We lose perspective if we fail to see the situation in network pr gram practices as only one part of the fabric of the think-tank ph losophy which also dictates what Americans will eat and drive a listen to, et cetera, et cetera. American think-tank leadership is o of touch with the American people.

My personal feeling is that this is also true in government, business and commerce, as well as in the mass media. Although t purpose of this hearing is to inquire into censorship in the televisi area only, I would feel remiss not to mention this connection.

Parenthetically, however, there are times when government a entertainment seem to be one. I could write steadily for 6 mont and fail to come up with one single invention, one single line
Archie Bunker as funny and outrageous as the recent remarks
Mr. H. R. Haldeman. I wish I had thought of it for Mr. Bunker!

Mr. Rintels. You will.

[Laughter.]

Mr. Lear. In any event, it was this think-tank mentality or philosophy which doomed "All in the Family" at ABC 5 years ago and came close to snuffing out its life before it was born on CBS last year.

As an indication of how out of touch—this think-tank leadership is with the needs and desires of the American people, the network hired extra switchboard operators to man the large switchboards at all its major affiliates across the country to handle what it thought would be an avalanche of protesting phone calls when the first episode of "All in the Family" was aired.

The avalanche never came. No States seceded from the Union. And no affiliates jumped off the network line. The phones rang to some degree but the calls were largely favorable.

The experience of "All in the Family" leads me to one question: What would happen if TV turned to other individual creators and went with their instincts as to what the American public will accept?

The public deserves to be allowed to see more of what its writers, directors, and producers really wish them to see. Right now they are only able to see what the think-tanks feel they will accept.

This has resulted in a level of entertainment that the country at large has deemed a disgrace through the years. This is not simply my opinion; we all know that season after season the critics and much of the public tell us we have arrived at another wasteland.

It is time, I feel, to take a new direction in television. There is nothing to lose and everything to gain. The American public is the final arbiter anyway, and it tells us very quickly what it likes and does not like. What it will be allowed to see, however, is another matter, and there the writer deserves the right to express life as he sees it.

Senator Ervin. I want to commend you on a very interesting statement. I have been very pleasantly surprised on many occasions by the fact that the network here which carries "All in the Family" has permitted Archie Bunker, his wife, his son-in-law and daughter, and their companions to discuss highly controversial subjects which the American people discuss every day.

I think that is very informative as well as very interesting, and you have proved in this program that TV is capable of broadcasting things which are serious in nature and can do so in a way which is very amusing and with a good deal of very general satire.

Archie Bunker is very much like a lot of folks I know. He has strong convictions which those who disagree with him think are prejudices, and which he is convinced are the ultimate truth. And I think in this program you show the generation gap between Archie and his son-in-law, which I think is very educational.

Mr. Lear. Senator, I wonder if you wouldn't agree that the largest tribute should be paid the American public which accepts this, which for so long has been told that it doesn't want to be faced with its problems in the evening, that it cannot think, it doesn't wish to reason, and that certain things are beyond its capability to understand?

Each week we have to run into this. We dealt recently for example with the subject of impotency on the show. It was very difficult to get the program made, even at this late date, but when it was made the reaction from the public was incredible. Even those people who felt that perhaps the subject was too adult for the time period, which, by the way, only the network controls—they were excited by what happened in the house—by the fact that when the show was over children were asking questions, and they were forced to answer, the parents were forced to answer questions and conversation was taking place in the homes where conversation in many cases had become kind of a forgotten art.

What I mean to say is that I think the public has been for so long underestimated, and whatever success we have, I owe to the public who understood the show in the first place.

Senator Ervin. I think the public is ready to accept more frank discussions on many subjects, both on TV and as to what politicans say. We had quite a prominent political figure in the country a few years ago, whose name I am not calling who addressed a meeting attended by a friend of mine. I ran into this friend right after this politician had addressed the meeting, and my friend said he had just heard the most remarkable speech he had ever heard. He was in rhapsodies about what a remarkable speech it was.

I said, "What did he talk about?" My friend looked kind of blank and said, "You know, he didn't say."

[Laughter.]

Senator Ervin (continuing.) I think most people would rather talk about a controversial issue. I think the American people are more intelligent than some of the broadcasters and some of the politicians think. Your series with Archie Bunker shows that because the American people have accepted it.

I will have to state that the few times I saw it, I was astounded by some of the subjects you dealt with, because the discussion of those subjects has been taboo. However, they were presented with such a wonderful amount of humor that I think it is one of the great public services, not only in amusement, but also in the themes that you deal with—themes that concern all of us.

Mr. Lear. Thank you, Senator.

STATEMENT OF LIAM O'BRIEN

Mr. O'Brien. Mr. Chairman, my name is Liam O'Brien. I have been a professional screenwriter and playwright for 30 years. I have written some 25 screenplays for feature films I have also written plays for the New York and London theater. Over the years I have encountered minimal censorship in feature films, dwindling to none at all in the most recent years. I have never ever encountered censorship in the legitimate theater.

In January of 1970 because the pickings were lean in both the theater and feature films, I took the plunge into network television. I signed on for 1 year as story editor to the CBS series, "Hawaii Five-O." "Five-O," a moderately successful series, had climbed in its second season to 28 on the Neilsen scale. It was approaching its third year on the air. Its executive producer and creator was and is Leonard Freeman, who wrote the original pilot story, as Mr. Lear wrote the pilot story for "All in the Family."

"Hawaii Five-O" is owned by Mr. Freeman in association with the CBS network.

I was to work under Mr. Freeman's supervision with a knowledgeable and experienced TV producer, Stanley Kallis. Mr. Kallis, among many outstanding TV credits, had most recently produced 2 years of the very successful series, "Mission Impossible."

Stan Kallis and I approached the production chores of the upcoming year, 1970–71, with enthusiasm. We were encouraged in our beginnings by our executive producer, Leonard Freeman, who stated the melodrama form, in his opinion, was wide open for a variety of subjects. "Go anthological," was the phrase Mr. Freeman used. We agreed we could and would.

After all the form, melodrama, had proved challenging to such disparate and talented writers as Edgar Allan Poe, Arthur Conan Doyle, Gilbert Keith Chesterton and Agatha Christie. They could be proud of their work. There was the possibility we could be proud of ours.

Let me state here a television year or season is a busy time for producer and story editor. Twenty-four 1-hour films must be conceptualized, then scripted with the aid of writers, reviewed in script form with network authorities, cast, produced, edited, scored, dubbed, reviewed again, as completed films with the same network authorities, then shipped for broadcast—all on a relentless, unyielding schedule. Air dates, one a week, must be met.

Our first air date was mid-September. Starting in January, the first 16 weeks were all honeymoon. We hired, in our opinion, our choice of the better writers. We soon had some 14 stories and teleplays in work, some completed, and some nearing completion.

All 14 stories, with the exception of one—a ripple of discontent to mar the honeymoon—had been approved by our executive producer, Leonard Freeman.

All 14 were also so approved by the personnel of the CBS programing department, including Russell Stoneham, CBS program executive and Paul King, CBS vice president, west coast nighttime programing. The same 14 stories and scripts, with that one exception, had also been carefully scrutinized, scrubbed and passed by Thomas Downer, chief, CBS program practices, west coast.

CBS program practices, west coast, is the network euphemism for house censor. All 3 networks have similar departments and they function, now and again cooperatively, now and again abrasively, with the so-called creative people, executive producers, producers, story editors, directors, et cetera.

We had also achieved, in our opinion, Leonard Freeman's, Stan Kallis' and mine, a variety of subject material. We had among the 14, a love story told in melodramatic terms, a la "Laura" of movie fame in which our policeman, McGarrett (Jack Lord), hankers after a lost love, and that love, a lady, may well be a murderess; a political story in which a Greek emigree, escaped to Hawaii, pledged to return to Greece to fight for democracy, becomes the target for an assassin's bullet; a cowboy story (yes, there are real cowboys and real ranches on several of the islands), of a minority figure, a pure Hawaiian cowpoke-ranch-owner, driven to accidental manslaughter under the economic pressure of mainland high rise developers invading the ranch land of his home island, Maui; a comedy melodrama, a la "The Lavender Hill Mob," of Alec Guiness fame, of an insurance investigator turned master thief against his former employers, a company he had served well for 30 years only to be fired because the same company deemed him superannuated at 50; a young veteran returned from Vietnam is found dead and his draft-resisting brother is accused of the murder. McGarrett discovers it is suicide, not murder. The elder brother, guilt stricken with his complicity in the My Lai type massacre, had taken his own life. A sampling. Now back to the story and teleplay that caused the first ripple of dissent in the honeymoon.

It was the Greek emigre story on democracy plus assassination as a political tool. It was titled "The Second Shot," written, in my opinion excellently, by Eric Bercovici. Thomas Downer, chief, program practices, first suggested we not name the country Greece.

Couldn't it be some fictional country—Transylvania? We demurred. Why not the country of Myopia, we asked. Then the assassin and the government that sent him must absolutely not be Greek. Gentlemen, we can't say Greeks murder Greeks. We demurred again. Greeks, on occasion, do murder Greeks for political reasons. Read the newspapers, Mr. Downer.

(Later, a feature film, made in Europe, entitled "Z", was to handle much the same generic material and become a prestigious and financial success worldwide.)

Because of our intransigence and with Leonard Freeman's enthusiastic support of his producer and story editor, the matter was relegated to Mr. William Tankersley, vice president, CBS program practices, east coast. Mr. Tankersley, recently retired from CBS, was then chief guardian, watchdog, censor, et cetera of all that appears on CBS' air.

Two days before "The Second Shot" was to go before the cameras in Hawaii, our first film to be shot that year. Mr. Tankersley called from New York, Leonard Freeman, Stan Kallis and I, on a conference phone in Hollywood, talked for over an hour with Mr. Tankersley in New York.

Mr. Tankersley went over the same ground most recently trod by Tom Downer: Don't say Greece, et cetera. Why can't we make it a fictional country . . . we absolutely cannot have the assassin be Greek and/or his mission be an assignment of the present military junta government in Greece, et cetera, et cetera. We countered: Greece has been specifically chosen as the story's background because that country was presently in the political headlines and because, as a speech in the script so stated, the very word democracy came to us from Greece and the Greek language. We couldn't or wouldn't eliminate Greece as the background country of our story or speeches, references to Greece as the etymological source of democracy, etc.

An hour or so's debate later, our executive-producer Leonard Freeman settled, against Stan Kallis' and my resistance, for compromise. Mr. Tankersley would permit us to name Greece as Greece, a real country.

We could include the speech and speeches on democracy but trim them and amend them. In exchange for these concessions, we must identify the assassin and the group that sent him as some amorphous, non-Greek, revolutionary group from nowhere. We agreed. At worst, a Pyrrhic victory. You win some, you lose some, in television.

But the honeymoon was still on, or so we thought. The second ripple of discontent came from Paul King, vice president CBS nighttime programing through channels via Russell Stoneham: our cowboy story was too soft. Not enough action. Action, I was to learn later, is the CBS euphemism for violence. I never heard anyone in the programing department use the word violence. But I heard Tom Downer of program practices, CBS, the other department use it often. He told us of his troubles with other CBS series, that year, and their addiction to gratuitous violence.

Michael Dann, CBS program chief east coast, arrived from New York to projection room view several upcoming CBS series offerings. Mike Dann, vice president Perry Laffeaty, vice president Paul King, and Russell Stoneham viewed 3 or 4 of our already filmed "Hawaii Five-O" episodes.

The most actionful of the 14 were carefully selected by Leonard Freeman. Word came back to us through Leonard Freeman of Mike Dann's deep disappointment, to wit: We had turned a damned good action, cops and robbers series into an anthology. Anthology is a dirty word in television.

We had all but destroyed the series by softening it, by writing people instead of action. Unless we changed course on the remaining 10 stories to be selected, the public would soon evidence its dissatisfaction with "Hawaii Five-O" on the Neilsen charts come September. When Mike Dann had returned East, a meeting was called in Leonard Freeman's office.

Paul King and Russell Stoneham firmly told us we were to go more action type stories. Violence, I inquired? Paul King said, I didn't say violence, Liam. I said action. Look at "Mannix." That is a great CBS series. Lots of action.

Later in the meeting Paul King said to me:

> Liam, the proof that you are not selecting the right story material for the series is that Tom Downer and Program Practices have approved all but one of your 14 teleplays. You should be fighting with Tom Downer and Program Practices on every script, fighting to hold on to the action.

One of our later actionful stories went before the cameras in Hawaii. It was called "Kono's Ransom." We instructed the director, Michael O'Herlihy, that CBS now wanted action. Michael understood. We got back a film of brutal and bloody footage wherein Kono, a regular on the cast of Hawaii Five-O was beaten over the head by the heavies with the butt end of a telephone besides being kicked in the groin several times. The screen ran red with tomato juice from Kono's bloody skull.

Thomas Downer of CBS program practices, on seeing the film, made loud and angry sounds. When he refused to approve the final cut version of Kono's ransom for air release and Stan Kallis and I were to recheck the film with him, Leonard Freeman advised us both: "Don't give him a frame, fellers, keep it all on the screen." Paul King later told us "Kono's Ransom" was our finest effort. He also said he was thinking seriously of running it for all CBS working producers and story editors as an example of what a good "action" episode should be. I did not agree with Paul King and told him so.

I found the enthusiasm I had begun the series with had dissipated. There was no challenge any longer for us to work, and we couldn't challenge the so-called second kind of writer, the action writer. We couldn't challenge him to do the work.

Leonard Freeman, who had encouraged us to be independent in the beginning of the year, now watched the films in the room with us. We didn't even know, finally, what was a "Five-O," because Leonard had different ideas than we did, obviously. And as for Mike Dann it is interesting that, since his resignation from CBS he has gone into children's productions.

The on-the-air season started. On opening night in September, after one public airing of the first episode of Executive Producer Leonard Freeman's second series, "The Storefront Lawyers," Fred Silverman suspended shooting. It was deemed "too relevant." Relevance, by now had become a dirty word in network language. Much of what was yet to come by "Hawaii Five-O" was "relevant." The network was afraid—but in a matter of weeks, "Hawaii Five-O" which heretofore, short of summer reruns, had been no higher than 28 on the Richter scale of Neilsen ratings, soon climbed into the first 10, then the first five, and wound up as Fred Silverman said in Life Magazine, "CBS top sharing show." Nobody could determine whether it was the effect of the first 14 shows or the latter "actionful" 10 that had boosted "Five-O" to preeminence in the ratings.

There was no comment to either Stan Kallis or myself from the CBS hierarchy on "Five-O's" new Neilsen position.

One of the shows we did, the film about the My Lai massacre, which they felt should not be shot, but had to be shot with the threat of a writer's strike, when it got on the air caused some few letters, 50 or 100 possibly. I was later told by Paul King that that show would never be aired again. It was obviously too controversial.

Stanley Kallis is now working at Universal Studios producing "Movies of the Week" anthologies and pilots for Universal and NBC. I am once again happily finishing up work on a new play for Broadway, and about to start an original screenplay for Warner Brothers—a motion picture. I have joyfully felt no censorship or dictation of taste but my own on either project.

Senator ERVIN. Well, I congratulate you on that today. Your experience indicates that sometimes there is a lot of controversy between those who have charge of determining the programs to keep them from becoming controversial.

Counsel?

Mr. BASKIR. From your examples and from your testimony I infer that you feel programs such as "All In The Family," which are controversial and frank, and say things the way they are, are not only possible but they can also be very popular.

Is that your belief, and has that been your experience?

Mr. Lear. It is true that television goes by the Neilsen rating, and "All In the Family" by some 7 points has for many, many weeks been the top show in the Nation.

So its popularity in terms of what television uses as a measuring rod is good.

Mr. Baskir. Some of the arguments you have heard appear to be economic. In order to survive economically on television, you must appeal to the broadest possible audience, and in order to do that you must offend as few people as possible and get the broadest kind of taste.

Otherwise, you can't get the kind of returns on the program which make television feasible, and this is an argument for not putting on programs such as yours.

Again, your experience is that you can offend people, if you will, and still attract them and still be a success.

Mr. Lear. You can offend them and find they are stimulated by being offended, enjoy things that they may not agree with, because it stimulates them to talk about it afterwards, and they don't have that experience very much in television.

Mr. Rintels. May I add something to that? People are not what count, or what ought to—but to the networks it's the money that matters. Richard Powell is former president of the television branch of the writers guild and he has a statement which I would ask permission to include in the records. He says in response to the question, "Is television only a commercial medium?"

"Why? Where is this engraved in marble and by whose hand? What law, other than the stale hand of custom gives the private sponsor the right to dictate the content and character of a public resource, administered supposedly by the networks in the public interest?"

What I am afraid has happened is that the networks have begun to program, or are continuing to program, in their own interests and in their sponsor's interests, but not in the public interest. It is not in the public interest to refuse to stimulate the public.

(The document referred to follows:)

STATEMENT OF RICHARD M. POWELL[1]

Whatever the aims and rationalizations of censorship, the end result is the removal from the censored work of all truth and reality. Surveying the field of commercial "entertainment" television, the conclusion is inescapable that censorship must be total, for almost nowhere in the countless hours programmed by the networks can there be found the slightest semblance of any reailty.

In a country whose current leading national product seems to be social problems, television grinds on nightly without involving the mind or troubling the conscience of the viewer. A current controversy may be occasionally mentioned but is never resolved. Both sides are always protrayed as wrong. In the unlikely event of a television drama examining the Indochina War, the plot line would take this invariable course: We may have been wrong in going there but They were certainly wrong in trying to keep us out.

Comedy suffers equally with drama from network television censorship. The three networks have taken the old truism that all comedy is based on reality and attempted to convert it to a new maxim: that all comedy is based on unreality. The attempt has never worked and never will. Excise social awareness from the comic genius of George Bernard Shaw and something will still remain. But it will not be "Pygmalion;" it will be television.

[1] Member of the Writers Guild of America, west, and a past president of its television branch.

Given the many hundreds of shows programmed yearly on network television and the total conformity of almost all of these shows, the logical assumption would be that a vast censoring organization exists at each of the networks, staffed by powerful and ruthless men. One would also assume that were these modern Torquemadas deprived of their power, television would immediately undergo revolutionary and life-giving change. Neither assumption is true.

The vast bulk of television programming is made up of episodic series. There are, in addition, a mix of old movies, new movies made for television, and specials, but the weekly half-hour and hour shows—"Doris Day," "Marcus Welby, M.D." "Mission Impossible"—make up most of the nightly schedule. These programs are censored directly, on occasion, but the most effective kind of censorship occurs before the first episode of the series is ever telecast; before the pilot film is shot and even before the script is written.

This censorship is built into the "format" of the series, or what the program is all about. If the program is essentially about nothing and if the format has no contact with reality then there is little need for continuing censorship on the series. "My Three Sons" is never going to become a battleground for the freedom of expression. The writer of Episode Number 211 of "Bonanza" is never going to become another John Peter Zenger. The average brainchild of the television writer comes out of the first story conference a hydrocephalic and out of the final rewrite a quadrupal amputee, and departs the cultural world without ever uttering a word retained by 20 million viewers past the closing commercial.

But if the format is the governing factor and if most tv series carry the name of a writer as creator of the format, why do writers bind themselves with creative straitjackets? Don't television writers have their own vision of truth that they wish to communicate—the raison d'etre of every writer?

The answer is this: it is virtually impossible for a writer to create a television format and have the resulting series even approximate the author's original concept. Network involvement in the creation of formats is total. And invariably, the involvement is destructive.

Here is a brief outline of a typical (and factual) case. Writer A, well known to the network for his work on previous television pilots, is called in by that network to discuss a project. An idea for a half-hour comedy series has been evolved through discussion between Writer B and network executives. A pilot script has been written but the network is unhappy with it. Several conferences follow between Writer A and network program executives. (These conferences take place in Hollywood, where almost all television pilots are written, cast, and produced.)

The series idea is this: a family from another planet—husband, wife, and 10-year-old son—are sent to Earth to observe and report back on our strange doings to their home planet. Writer A and the Hollywood network people agree that the approach should be satirical—how we look from outer space. A new story line is agreed upon, and Writer A completes a pilot script.

Reception to the script in Hollywood is good, and after a few revisions by Writer A the script is sent to New York. The overall head of network programming in New York sends back some suggestions which are relayed—with a trace of embarrassment—by the Hollywood network executives to Writer A. The man in New York is generally pleased, but wants three more children and a dog added to the family from outer space. The relayed reasoning is that this makes it more of a television family, with more elements on which to hang story pegs. Writer A states that you can't insert three more children and a dog into the format without throwing out all the satire; what you would end up with would be a "Brady Bunch From Outer Spaec." After nervous laughter, it is pointed out to Writer A that "The Brady Bunch" has become a successful show in the Neilson ratings, and that the network has been analyzing the elements responsible for its success. Writer A states that there is only one element responsible for its success—the fact that it precedes the very successful "Partridge Family." No one listens, since the power of decision is not in that room but in New York. And it is the obvious view of the man in New York that if the "Brady Bunch" has six kids the minimum for a family from outer space should be four kids and a dog. Writer A then resigns from the project.

From the above case, we can glean quite a few reasons why television is bland, banal, and downright bad. For openers, there is rarely if ever any direct contact between the creator in Hollywood and the decision-maker in New York. This insures that the head of programming in the East will be in a position to claim credit for a winner and pass off the blame for a loser. The process is creatively and economically disastrous, but then network television is a monopoly industry and not a competitive one.

In the case of creative conflict, the judgment of the executive in New York (who has never written, produced, acted, or directed) is automatically assumed to be superior to that of the creator in Hollywood. (Writer A, in the above case, has written 12 pilot scripts for television series in the past few years. 9 of these were rejected at the script stage by network executives. Of the 3 that were made into pilot films, 2 found a place on the schedule. One ran for six years and the other is now in its 3rd season.)

Program development at the executive network level is exclusively mechanical. A series is created by "putting together elements." It is a non-creator's play-it-safe approach to creativity. You put together two boys and a cat from one successful show with three girls and a chimp from another, and then turn loose the publicity department. It is also considered advisable to put in an element to attract the older audience, an element for the younger married audience, an element for the woman audience and an element for the man audience. This is known as "insuring" the show.

In the creative process, of course, no insurance is possible. A successful dramatic or comedic work comes from the characters, their point of view, and their interplay. It is a delicate piece of work, but always in balance. Subject it to massive organ transplants and it will fall to the floor and stay there. Graft on an extra head and it will still talk, but be forever incoherent.

None of this is even remotely understood by those men making the final creative decisions in television. They are a homogeneous, interchangeable group, and there is not a creator among them. Currently, those rising most often and most rapidly to the top have a background in network sales. They know, presumably, "what will sell." (So does a publisher, but very few of them write their own novels.)

The single talent of these men is for survival, and even at that they are incompetent. The top programming jobs are revolving doors at the networks, year after year. This is inevitable. The $100,000-a-year witch doctor can shake his rattle and mutter his Nielson incantations, but four out of every five patients he works on will die, and he has no way of knowing why.

There are those who will deny that all of this has anything to do with censorship. They will argue that a network should have the complete right to determine not only the type but the content of the shows they program, and that this is not an abridgement of free speech but merely a part of free enterprise. They will grant the mediocrity of most television programming but state that "this is what the public wants," and argue further that network programming practises are an integral and shrewdly-functioning part of the system of supplying to advertisers high-rated shows that will carry the banner of their products. "After all," the argument goes, "it's a commercial medium."

Why? Where is this engraved in marble, and by whose hand? What law, other than the stale hand of cutsom, gives a private sponsor the right to dictate the content and character of a public resource, administered—supposedly—by the networks in the public interest?

And, what does the public want? Who created the myth that the public's taste is always bad? Does a bad movie outdraw a good one? Does a bad play succeed and a good one fail? Is the nightly television choice between three degrees of bland a sufficient indicator of public taste? (Interestingly, the most popular show on television today is a comedy which offers the only contact with reality to be seen on the networks. It is also an import; had "All In The Family" not been a hit in England it would never have had the remotest chance of acceptance with any of the three American networks.)

Finally, we come down to this: television has become our culture. Past the age of 25, people in the United States do not, in any significant numbers, go to movies, attend plays, or spend their evenings at concerts. They watch television; they watch it because it is there. Our children are raised on it, and their behavior patterns are formed by it to an extent we have yet researched. Most adults do not read books; they watch television. It has become our cul> ture, and the question is this: Should the culture of a nation be a mere by-product of the selling of soap?

> As a nation, we are threatening to rip apart at the seams. We are angry, confused, and afraid. We need, vitally, the historic contribution of the theatre—to hold up to us the mirror of what we are and where we are; the artist's intuition of our reality. Television is now our theatre, and television is potentially the greatest theatre that man has known. It must be liberated from the censorship of small minds.

> "Censorship always protects and perpetuates every horror of the prevailing forms of oppression. With us, its subtle disguises increase its evils by creating delusions of safety, liberty, and democracy. It precludes that intelligence which is necessary to hasten a wholesome and natural social evolution. By that same ignorance it makes revolutions by violence more certain, more bloody, and less useful."

Mr. BASKIR. "All in the Family" is perhaps the only program of its kind on, despite its success. Do you have any idea why there aren't other programs as frank, if you want to put it that way?

Mr. LEAR. Well, we have only done 34 episodes, and I hope it will open up the possibility for other shows on that network and other networks.

David or Liam might have information in that area.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Baskir, I spoke to several writers who, encouraged by the program, "All in the Family," have gone to all three networks with ideas that say, "Let me do this kind of show," meaning a show such as that, without of course stealing the idea of "All in the Family." The networks' attitude is:

> We have that now, let it alone, let it stay over there in the corner. We made that one mistake in a sense. It is a tremendously handy and successful mistake, and it is the number 1 show in the country, far outstripping any other show, but let's not do that again, once is enough.

Now I don't think once is enough when there are three networks, and all the prime time hours. There should be more of that kind of freedom of discussion and freedom of ideas on our air, because as we say, it is for the public good.

Mr. BASKIR. If it is so successful, what are they worried about? It would seem to me that rather than putting on a whole week of westerns one year and a whole week of drama the next year, they might put on a whole week of "All in the Family" this year.

Mr. LEAR. It is a question of breaking down what I term this "think tank" philosophy. There have to be people, I suppose who assume they understand what America is all about, and what it will accept and what it will reject. They exist not just in television, in broadcasting, but in every area of business and government and so forth, and what they dictate as to what America will accept and reject is the only thing that becomes available when we talk about television for an audience to accept or reject.

In the case of "All in the Family," because of very particular circumstances, I was able to get on the air with something that I felt positive the American public would accept. It surprises me that more of that medium, television, as well as other areas of business and commerce, don't understand from the single example that this country is ready for a great deal more truth than it is getting everywhere, in all areas of public life.

It is ready to face its problems, and I don't think that is quite understood as yet.

Mr. Rintels. Could I add to that only that because old myths and fears and prejudices die rather slowly, what is required to kill these myths and fears are brave men, and with the exception of Norman Lear and a few like him, television suffers badly.

We have a shortage of brave men.

Senator Ervin. Gentlemen, I thank you for a most illuminating discussion of the kinds of programs that the American people have in some cases the privilege to see and in other cases are compelled to see.

Thank you very much.

Mr. Baskir. Our next witness is Mr. Chet Casselman, president of the Radio Television News Directors Association.

Senator Ervin. Thank you for appearing and giving us the benefit of your experience and observations in this field.

STATEMENT OF CHET CASSELMAN, PRESIDENT, RADIO TELEVISION NEWS DIRECTORS ASSOCIATION; ACCOMPANIED BY J. LAURENT SCHARFF, GENERAL COUNSEL

Mr. Casselman. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. My name is Chet Casselman. I am news and public affairs director of KSFO Radio in San Francisco, but I am appearing today as president of the Radio Television News Directors Association.

Appearing with me is Mr. J. Laurent Scharff of the law firm of Pierson, Ball and Dowd, general counsel of the association.

Senator Ervin. We are delighted to have Mr. Scharff with us today.

Mr. Casselman. We are most pleased and honored for this opportunity to give you our thoughts on the so very vital question you are exploring.

My feeling is that you would be most interested in how the organization I represent feels about the state of the patient we are examining together, a constitutional guarantee, and its right to survive. I mean that same constitutional guarantee of a free press, which you, Mr. Chairman, have pictured as perhaps on its death bed if first amendment principles are held not to apply to the broadcast media with the same degree of protection afforded the printed press.

Our association is comprised of approximately 1,000 professional journalists dedicated to the improvement of all aspects of broadcast news, to provide the information and understanding the public needs to participate effectively through government and society in the conduct of the life and business of all citizens.

Under our code of ethics, the members of the Radio Television News Directors Association agree that their prime responsibility as journalists is to give the public they serve a news service as accurate, full and prompt as human integrity and devotion can devise.

Article six of the RTNDA code of ethics says that broadcast newsmen shall seek actively to present all news which will serve the public interest, no matter what selfish, uninformed, or corrupt efforts attempt to color it, withhold it or prevent its presentation.

They acknowledge the newsman's ethic of protection of confidential information and sources, and urge unswerving observation of it except in instances it would clearly and unmistakably defy the public interest.

These excerpts from the RTNDA code of ethics seem very closely aligned with the provisions outlined in the twin bills being proposed by Senator Pearson and Representative Whalen (S. 1311 and H.R. 4271). RTNDA supports the bill with certain qualifications to be discussed in a moment. It is interesting to note that it has been a little more than 40 years since very similar legislation was introduced by Senator Arthur Capper. Radio, of course, was barely 10 years old at that time and television was a mere flicker on tiny experimental tubes.

Since then broadcast journalists, like newspaper, magazine and wire service reporters—have earned the confidence of persons who have valuable information to convey to the public, but will do so only if their names, and in some cases, other information, are kept secret.

It is truly regrettable the fact that radio and television were born so many years after the birth of the First Amendment. Had broadcasters been on hand to chronicle its framing, it is quite probable it would have read a bit differently.

Perhaps to the effect that:

> Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, print and electronic . . .

In this connection, we certainly would favor congressional adoption of the House Concurrent Resolution 502, recently submitted by Congressman Pepper, expressing the sense of Congress that the provisions of the First Amendment do apply to radio and television broadcasting.

And I wonder if it isn't much more accurate to view "freedom of the press" as freedom of the people. Not freedom for one class of person, the reporter, but freedom of the people to know what is going on in their various layers of Government, what is going on in their neighborhoods and in the world all about them.

No citizen of course, can make proper decisions without a proper flow of information. There cannot be a proper flow of information if all the sources of that information must be identified, against their wishes.

This is generally discussed in the context of great events involving the nation and the world. But the hundreds of radio and TV news directors in our organization are concerned about this at a much more local level.

They are covering news at the level closest to the people, the city, county, and State level. It has been said many people can name their mayor, Congressman, and U.S. Senator but not their city councilman or State legislator—the latter being political areas where the challenge to a proper flow of news is often greatest.

The city hall or statehouse reporter developing his news sources must develop in them the assurance that he will respect their confidence—a tip about a questionable contract, or the like, will hardly be forthcoming if the informant worries that he will be retaliated against, directly, or indirectly.

Some 19 States now have so called "shield" laws, which generally provide newsmen an immunity from being adjudged in contempt for refusing to disclose the source and/or substance of information given in confidence. But these State laws generally are not models for a truly effective newsman's privilege.

Not every State law covers both the source and confidential information; but, wisely, the pending Federal bills do. Not every State law applies to so complete a range of congressional, judicial, and other governmental proceedings as these bills do.

Not every State law applies to so broad a cross section of journalists in all media; but still we believe that the pending legislation should go even further to make clear that photographers and accompanying technicians are protected to the extent that they come into possession of confidential information in the course of their assignments.

We also urge Congress to encourage the development of professional journalism in community antenna television systems, by expanding the coverage of the Newsmen's Privilege Act to persons gathering and presenting news for CATV companies. RTNDA recently recognized the potential of CATV as a journalistic medium by broadcasting its membership categories to include CATV news personnel.

Further, to make the congressional intent perfectly clear on another point, the bills should be modified to protect from subpena such journalistic tools as notes, letters, calendars, phone indices, and other materials that could be used to determine the identity of a source and confidentially-disclosed information.

Section 4 of S. 1311 makes the protective provisions inapplicable in certain situations. Perhaps section 4 is necessary to gain enactment of Federal law on this subject. Our belief is that, although the Newsmen's Privilege Act would provide less than total privilege, it would permit us to operate more effectively in the public interest than is possible now. And it would serve as an acceptable model for further legislation by the States.

However, we believe that paragraph (2) of subsection (b) of section 4, if not eliminated, should be amended by omitting the words "or other," after the words "grand jury" and before the word "proceeding," in order to restrict the effect of the paragraph to grand jury proceedings.

Instead of subsection (c) of section 4, if not as a substitute for all of section 4, we prefer the substance of the position which we took in our amicus curiae brief filed in the Earl Caldwell case before the Supreme Court (United States v. Caldwell, Oct. term 1971, No. 70–57). Perhaps the Court itself will provide precise guidance as a matter of constitutional law, but, if not, Congress should surely not fail to act.

Our view is that, because of the virtual certainty that speech and press are effectively restrained when there exists a substantial possibility in the minds of informants that disclosure of information or source may be compelled later, there should be a standard which in the normal situation would raise no more than the slightest possibility of later disclosure.

To accomplish this purpose without unduly restricting the Government's subpena power in an extreme case of immediate need, the Newsmen's Privilege Act should demand that, before a newsman's confidential relationship with an informant can be breached by a grand jury, the Government must demonstrate convincingly (1) that the newsman is likely to have the information sought, (2) that the Government cannot elsewhere obtain the information sought, and (3) that, without the newsman's appearance and disclosure of the information sought, the gravest irreparable harm would likely occur to person or society. But by such a standard, informants and newsmen would be relatively certain of protection for their confidential relationships, and the public would be assured of a free flow of information from important, anonymous sources.

The suggested standard recognizes that there may be occasions on which human life—or the life of the community or nation—may be so clearly at stake that no reasonable person should expect newsmen, lawyers, physicians, or anyone else in a confidential relationship to withhold such information—for example, information about a murder plot or plans for violent civil insurrection.

Indeed, if such a test were adopted by the Court, it is not likely that courts would often find the need to compel newsmen's testimony on these matters. By way of contrast, in the pending Caldwell case, the Government's attempt to subpena the New York Times reporter on the basis of Black Panther rhetoric of revolution was not persuasive to the court of appeals and would not meet the test suggested here.

The hope here is that under these conditions a newsman will be able to perform his work without fear of official interference or intimidation.

It is the rare newsman these days who doesn't feel some intimidation occasionally, particularly the broadcast newsman, since his livelihood depends on the continuation of the license his station holds, and intimidation, obviously, can take many forms.

It can even be a simple criticism if delivered from a position considerably higher than the intimidated.

Now I certainly don't mean to imply that broadcast newsmen are above criticism or that the product they supply is completely free from fault. Far from it. I agree wholeheartedly with those critics who feel that we need to improve our product greatly. If I didn't, I personally wouldn't be investing so much time and effort in RTNDA, Sigma Delta Chi, the California Freedom of Information Committee, and several other professional improvement committees.

I do, however, feel that when verbal pressure is applied continuously on a sensitive industry by highly placed officers in the Government that may grant or deny the continuation of life in that regulated service, then there is cause for some concern.

There is is also the concern now that one experiences when he learns that a colleague, such as Daniel Schorr has suddenly become the center of a quiet, but at the same time, intimidating FBI investigation on the stated possibility that he may be offered an assignment by the very hand he has bitten.

Then what about the newsman covering very tense and well attended news events who discovers that some of the men next to him running recorders or cameras have had absolutely no experience in radio or televison but are lawmen on special assignment.

That newsman instantly knows two things: If he has spotted a phony, it won't be long before some of the principals of the event do, too. And he, as a working journalist, already has all the problems he needs these days without the added burden of being figured for an enemy by those same story principals.

Newsmen already are thought by many dissident factions to be tools of the establishment, particularly the law enforcement segment of the establishment, since our tapes and films of dissident faction activities may be used against the radicals by police.

An intriguing factor here is that at the same time we are believed to be so solidly in the camp of the establishment by the dissident factions in the nation, the establishment has us labeled as being closely allied with the dissidents since we put them on the air.

There are even those like Edith Efron who count every word uttered in news broadcasts upon occasion and in a rather free-swinging, highly personalized judgmental process determine which words are for, which are against, and without even getting all the words correct.

Here is where we get to the super-critical question of who should really decide what is news and what isn't, who is going to do the editing, just what is going to be edited, and how it is going to be edited. This was at the very heart of the CBS "Selling of the Pentagon" case.

Government intrusion into the editing process, whether it be by a direct prior restraint as in the "Pentagon Papers" incident or by an overly extended Fairness Doctrine can't help but have a debilitating, intimidating effect on news personnel. Even after RTNDA and several broadcast licensees succeeded in convincing a Federal Court of Appeals that the FCC personal attack and political editorializing rules were unconstitutional restraints on broadcast journalism, the Supreme Court decided otherwise in the Red Lion and RTNDA cases (Red Lion Broadcasting v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969), rev'g Radio Television News Directors Ass'n. v. United States, 400 F. 2d 1002 (7th Cir. 1968)). The Fairness Doctrine and the political candidate provisions of section 315 of the Communications Act have put radio and television in the roles of distant country cousins of the print media.

The Campaign Communications Reform Act (S. 382, title I), just passed by Congress, creates new discriminations between the broadcast and print media through compulsory favoritism for political advertising; most unfortunately, the conference committee omitted a key provision of the Senate bill which would have repealed the equal opportunities requirement of section 315 insofar as it applies to Federal elective offices.

This partial repeal would have been a good beginning to complete repeal of the equal-time requirement of section 315, a course which should be encouraged by this subcommittee.

Under section 315 a broadcaster is effectively prevented from broadcasting candidate debates and documentaries concerned with political contests with bulging fields of candidates. Let me give you an example. In the recent election in San Francisco, there were 11 persons running for mayor and 33 for county supervisor.

The print media have no such problems. In fact, as recently reported, they have been aided financially by Congress' discriminatory ban against cigarette commercials on radio and television.

Now, the Federal Trade Commission and some private groups are attempting to extend to all issues—expressed and implied in commercial announcements—the FCC government policy under which broadcasters were first ordered to carry anticigarette messages.

Some recent appellate court decisions have suggested that many commercial announcements may give rise to obligations on the part of broadcast licensees to provide members of the public with the opportunity to present counterprograming in the name of fairness.

These proposals for a right of free as well as paid public access to broadcast station microphones and cameras are presently before the FCC on its fairness inquiry (docket 19260), the first of such broad scope since 1949.

These and other proposals go well beyond the present Fairness Doctrine, and, if adopted, would threaten to destroy the profitability and workability of the commercial broadcast system. A financially healthy private broadcasting system is obviously needed for the support of a courageous and professional brand of broadcast journalist.

By minimizing or opposing the broadcaster's present role of selecting and editing significant contrasting views, the public access proposals—proposals for the removal of programing discretion from broadcasters—would further threaten the development, if not existence, of professional journalism in the electronic media.

FCC licensing procedure has been used as a justification for the agency supervision which denies broadcast journalism its proper status as part of the most modern embodiment of the press protected by the first amendment. If the present system for licensing broadcast stations cannot be squared with a free press, it should be changed, rather than permit—as has occurred—the sacrifice of press freedom to the logic of a poorly conceived licensing scheme.

We recommend that this subcommittee stand ready to review the Commission's policy decisions when they are rendered in the fairness inquiry and to conduct hearings at that time to determine whether any new Commission access requirements and the Fairness Doctrine in its increasingly more detailed form are in the best interests of an informed electorate.

That electorate is dependent upon a robust journalism unrestrained by governmental oversight.

If not eliminated the Fairness Doctrine should be reformed by clarifying legislation to codify the prior Commission policy recognizing broad discretion in licensees for the achievement of fairness in overall programing.

This was the policy of the Commission in 1959 when Congress amended section 315(a) to include what has been construed as the specific statutory authority for the Fairness Doctrine. The reinstituted policy would eliminate the fairness doctrine refinements which have been developed since the early 1960's. The more recent detailed rules and case-by-case rulings have encouraged the filing of an increasing flow of burdensome and intimidating fairness complaints, and they have narrowed the range of journalistic discretion in broadcasting.

This most commendable subcommittee is doing so very much to focus some desperately needed light onto some vital aspects of American life: The rights, duties, and responsibilities of the free.

RTNDA is encouraged to see that the subcommittee is interested in those rights, duties, and responsibilities as they apply to our profession of journalism, particularly with respect to the current problems of broadcast journalism.

We believe that the answer to the imperfections of journalism is not government supervision, but the exercise of a higher degree of self-disciplined professionalism by journalists and their publishers—print and broadcast alike. This is the only way to make certain that every citizen in this land has an uninterrupted and untainted flow of information, without which he cannot long remain free.

Your continued interest, effort, and assistance are important contributions to that goal, and we are forever grateful.

Senator ERVIN. I want to thank you for a very fine presentation of the problems confronting the broadcast industry.

You point out the fact that perhaps if the broadcasting industry had been in existence at the time of the phrasing of the First Amendment, the amendment might have been phrased differently. It seems to me that one of the geniuses of the Constitution is that the men who framed it had a rare capacity to frame a document which applies, according to its terms, to things which they couldn't even envisage ever coming into existence.

For example, at the time the interstate commerce clause was framed, the people who framed it didn't have any idea that there would be such things as railroads or telephones, or telegraphs, or radio, or television, and yet they framed a clause that covered all of those automatically as they came into existence. Certainly the men who framed the First Amendment had no concept of such marvelous instruments of communication as the radio or television, and yet their phraseology was sufficient to encompass those discoveries which they had never anticipated.

That is one reason why I am just a little reluctant for the Congress to act on the Pearson bill until the Supreme Court has passed on the Caldwell case.

I share your hope that the Supreme Court, in passing on the Caldwell case, and two companion cases which it now has before it, will manifest the same judicial statesmanship which the Circuit Court of Appeals manifested when it handed down its opinion in the Caldwell case.

I certainly agree with you that Congress should explore the desirability and I might say indeed the necessity of enacting legislation in the nature of a newsman's privilege bill if the Supreme Court does not exercise broad judicial statesmanship when it hands down its opinion in the Caldwell and related cases.

I had the privilege of speaking to the National Newspaper Association sometime ago, and I was asked about the furor that was aroused by the speeches of the Vice President on the media. I told them that I thought we had to keep things in proper perspective and had to recognize that the right of public officials to criticize the broadcast media is co-equal with the right of the broadcast media to criticize public officials.

Mr. CASSELMAN. That is exactly right.

Senator ERVIN. But I do recognize that there have been a lot of governmental actions and statements by people in high positions which have an intimidating and chilling effect on the exercise of first amendment rights by the news media, and——

Mr. CASSELMAN. That is true.

Senator ERVIN. In other words, a person in business has stockholders he has to produce dividends for. He is naturally quite reluctant to adopt a course of action which has a tendency to antagonize people in high governmental posts, and that is particularly true in the broadcast media since it has the Damocles sword hanging over them at all times in the form of renewal of their licenses to broadcast. I certainly agree that indiscriminate use of the Fairness Doctrine would tend to inhibit them rather than promote what the law was designed to encourage, that is, a discussion of controversial issues.

If the FCC grants to one group, displeased with an expression of an opinion, free time on an indiscriminate basis, they can certainly make it very hard for a broadcast medium to operate profitably because of the necessity of granting free time to other dissenting groups.

I certainly think that we have a lot of people in the United States who just are afraid of freedom. It is unfortunate. Some of these people are really people who profess to love our country the most. There is no doubt then in my mind that we have staked the very existence of this Nation on the proposition that a free press and free speech must continue to exist if this Nation is going to continue as a free society. I think that we need a good study here in the field of broadcasting, particularly, as to how we can make certain that the broadcasting industry will not be inhibited by governmental action.

We have had some surprising governmental action. I think you alluded to the Dan Schorr case. I was always impressed that Dan Schorr was a very objective broadcaster of news. But the nature of politicians, is that they would like for all the news media to spend the time picturing them in the most favorable light and to suppress any news that doesn't picture them in a favorable light.

Yet the solemn obligation that the First Amendment places on anyone who exercises First Amendment rights is to try to present the truth to the public so that their minds will be free and so that our governmental institutions will function.

I couldn't help but observe, and it was rather surprising to me, that anyone having the power to make appointments to the Federal service would set in motion an FBI investigation of anyone on the pretext that it is for an offer of an ultimate government job, when he didn't even consult with that individual as to whether he would take the job if it was offered to him. To my mind, that is just stupidity, if it is not duplicity.

I agree that we have too much subpenaing of newsmen to testify. I, as a lawyer, am astounded that it is abused so frequently. Many of the things newsmen know are more or less hearsay. Very few of them have first-hand knowledge of their information and would not be competent to testify to in a court of law. Yet we have had numbers of subpenas issued.

I am glad the Attorney General clarified that practice to some extent and to some extent limited it in his directive.

You have some difficult problems in this field. Frankly, I agree with your assessment with respect to subpena of nonbroadcast documents related to the "Selling of the Pentagon." I think it was nothing in the world except an effort on the part of a congressional committee to test the exercise of First Amendment freedom by CBS and point out eventually that CBS had abused its freedom. The trouble with regulating freedoms is that they are difficult to regulate without suppressing them. I certainly agree with your observation, and I think the public has to depend largely on self-discipline on the part of the broadcast media, because if there is anything that history shows to be true, it is that all freedoms will on occasion be abused.

Otherwise, they wouldn't be freedoms. If you are not free to act foolishly as well as wisely, you have no freedom. I don't know any way you can prevent an abuse of freedom, especially freedom that is exercised by so many people as freedom of the press and freedom of speech, without a muzzle, and I don't think our system of government would endure if these freedoms were seriously curtailed.

I want to thank you for your very fine statement you have made here, and which you presented so well, on the problems which the broadcast media face in an effort to exercise the same freedom that the printed word is entitled to exercise.

Thank you very much.

Mr. Casselman. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Ervin. The subcommittee will stand in recess until February 16th, when we hope to meet in room C–407 in the Capitol.

(Whereupon, at 12:20 p.m. the subcommittee adjourned, to reconvene at 10 a.m., Wednesday, February 16, 1972.)

FREEDOM OF THE PRESS

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1972

U.S. SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS OF THE
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to recess, at 9:50 a.m., in Room S-407, the Capitol Office Building, Senator Sam J. Ervin, Jr. (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senator Ervin (presiding).

Also present: Lawrence M. Baskir, chief counsel and staff director, William Pursley, counsel; and Stanley Ebner, minority counsel.

Senator ERVIN. The subcommittee will come to order.

Counsel will call the first witness.

Mr. BASKIR. Mr. Chairman, our witness this morning is Mr. Bill Monroe, correspondent for NBC News.

Senator ERVIN. I want to welcome you to the subcommittee and express our deep appreciation for your willingness to appear and give us the benefit of your experience and your observations and your philosophy on what I consider one of the most important matters confronting the American people.

STATEMENT OF BILL MONROE, CORRESPONDENT, NBC NEWS

Mr. MONROE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. The news media are very grateful to you for the concern and the understanding you have always shown in the past on this subject.

My name is Bill Monroe. I am a correspondent for NBC News and Washington editor of the "Today" program. I am testifying, however, not for NBC, but as an individual.

I appreciate this opportunity to participate in hearings which have an historic timeliness. It seems to me this country is already on the road, without realizing it, to a dual system of mass media: A printed press that is free but shrinking and an electronic press that is growing but unfree. This committee, and all of us, may want to ask whether we are, in fact, on this road and whether we should stay on it.

Your committee is interested in, among other things, the tendency of various officials to haul newsmen before governmental bodies to compel them to testify as to confidential information and confidential sources. I join those other witnesses before you who have already endorsed the bill of Senator Pearson and Representative Whelan to protect such confidentiality. Their bill would add a needed stone to the wall protecting independent journalism. It would also shield honorable journalists from jail terms unlikely to profit either them or the government.

But I would like to focus my remarks more sharply on what seems to me to be an ominous contrast: The clearcut quality of freedom that pervades the field of the printed press as opposed to a chill twilight of government regulation and government involvement that envelops broadcasting. This contrast has developed from a new double standard for the First Amendment: One interpretation for broadcasting and another for print. As a result, journalism of vigor and independence comes harder for broadcast editors than it once did; it increasingly requires acts of conscious courage.

The rise of this atmosphere seems particularly dangerous in the light of events that compel continued concentration of power in the government's executive branch. Nuclear weapons burden the President with awesome responsibilities. Modern arms are so intricate it's sometimes hard for the Congress to understand what the Pentagon is talking about. Popular pressures push government expansion into new areas of health, education, welfare, and housing. Economic crises force the White House toward a guided economy. Fear of local crime increases demands for the FBI, with its special skills in law enforcement and surveillance, to edge toward the status of a national police force. These trends obviously combine to put in jeopardy the citizen's ability to understand and control his own government. And it seems to me that the single realistic hope for accommodating such trends, and yet retaining democratic control of the executive, lies in keeping at least one part of the American machinery rigidly clear of Government influence—the channels of information.

But we have already allowed some Government pollution of those channels, and it has happened without substantial outcry from those who customarily act as sentries—intellectuals, newspapermen, legislators, lawyers, and judges. Even civil libertarians have made little protest.

There are, of course, factors that may account for this strange complacency.

The fantastic new technology and sudden impact of television may have misled us about its most vital function. Seeking to fit it into familiar categories, some of us have been impressed with the size and wealth of television, and have put it down simply as big business. Some of us have been impressed with its evening parade of singers, dancers, actors, and comedians, and have put it down as the new vaudeville. But nervous pictures that bring the White House, Capitol Hill, Vietnam, and London into our living rooms don't strike us immediately as the new front page. So we have missed the main fact about television: It is press. And if television and radio spend more time on entertainment and commercials than on news, so, in fact, do many newspapers with their acres of advertising, their sports pages, gossips, astrologists advice to the loveless and fat Sunday editions with the news tucked inside the colors of "Dick Tracy" and "Peanuts." Radio and television are, at bottom, instantaneous, warmblooded press. Like the printed press, they carry the flesh of commerce and entertainment on a hard skeleton of news. And like the printed press, they are massively engaged in exactly that kind of communication which the First Amendment was written to protect.

The requirement for licensing has encouraged the tendency to define broadcasting as nonpress. But the problem is not licensing itself, it is the method of licensing. If Congress and the courts had entered this area originally with a clear understanding of broadcasting as 20th century press, they could have devised licensing procedures that kept Government out of news and program decisions. But they didn't. They devised licensing procedures that encourage government intrusion. When we begin to recognize broadcasting as press, the legislature and the courts can then strip away the intrusions and reverse the Government-media entanglement.

Another version of the argument that what is licensed cannot be press holds that the public owns the airwaves, therefore the Government must police them and look over the shoulder of editors. This suggests that, because the public owns the airwaves, the public must be denied the most important benefits these airlanes can bestow: Information sources clear of Government contamination. The first amendment declares that private sources of information serve the public interest. Surely then, it also directs the Congress and the courts not to wield the concept of public ownership of the atmosphere as a weapon to rob the public of such private sources. What price ownership under these circumstances? It comes at a calamitous cost.

The whole licensing process began with radio, which came into the world as a little black music box. When radio developed into a vital news medium, the licensing formula was already set in concrete. Then came the new monster of television, which struck us initially as more like big business or like an explosion of vaudeville, not much like press. So we treated it as we had radio, as nonpress. We fit it into a licensing system that allows Government review of its performance. That system itself made television and radio look even less like press. But the system is now widely accepted, in part because of our hasty assumptions and in part because it serves the purpose of those who are nervous about the new media and want to tie strings on them that don't square with the first amendment.

There are liberal intellectuals who direct their natural instincts for regulation toward television in the hope that a paternal Government can make it do better—put on more talk shows, more opera, less Flip Wilson and less Matt Dillon. There are conservatives whose natural inclination might be to extend old-fashioned freedom to this new-fashioned medium. But many of them are fearful it has a liberal slant, so they settle for Government guidance instead. There are incumbent politicians who want to lay down rules to make their own life with television more comfortable and less prone to upset by challengers—rules they'd probably like to apply to newspapers as well if they could manage it. And there are the new media populists with an access doctrine they want to try out on television, then apply later to print, a doctrine that attacks free press under the banner of amplified free speech. They insist the Government must direct editors how to divide media time and space into little chunks for all.

So we arrive at a double standard for the First Amendment. The broadcaster must apply to a government body every three years for the right to stay in business. The publisher does not. The broadcaster, in his decisions on journalistic fairness and balance, has to go beyond his own conscience and the disciplines of public reaction; he has to consider also the attitudes of a government commission. The publisher does not. If a news program stirs up public or official criticism, the broadcaster may get a letter from a government commission directing him to explain and justify the program within 20 days. The publisher does not answer to any governmental body. The broadcaster is prevented, by statutory conditions, from presenting a debate among major candidates for the political enlightenment of his audience. The publisher is not. The cumulative restraints and inhibitions create an uneasy atmosphere which is hard for anybody outside of broadcasting to appreciate.

Fifteen years ago, long before broadcast regulation intensified to its present complexity, I had left an assistant editor's job on a newspaper to work for a television station as news director. I was astonished to note the infinite care with which one of the Nation's best television stations prepared its elaborate application for license renewal. Station executives spent hours, days, and weeks in assembling the proper documents. They combed station files exhaustively for documentation of community involvement, for proofs of programing eligible for gold stars from the Government, for confirmation of "public service" efforts known to be smiled on in Washington. They consulted lawyers at every step of the process. They enlisted department heads in the small and large details of the project. The superior record of this station made it one of the least likely in the Nation to have license trouble. But I began to realize that its owners, nevertheless, felt no solid assurance of a stable and precise licensing process that translated responsible station operation predictably into continued corporate existence. They had a sense of change and turbulence in Washington, an awareness of a Government mixing men and laws, an impression of a Federal Communications Commission with changing members appointed by changing Presidents—men of competence and goodwill, yes, but nevertheless so many Democrats and so many Republicans depending on who was in the White House. Here, I discovered, was a deep anxiety unknown to newspaper publishers—a built-in requirement for concern about the favors and penalties available from Government.

Since that time, the rules have multiplied, the uncertainties have worsened. Apprehension over license renewals, however unreasonable statistically, has risen. I was not surprised to learn recently that a major metropolitan TV station had decided to devote the full time of one of its executives, year in and year out, to preparation of its every-third-year application for license renewal.

I have no atrocity story to tell about outright Government censorship. I have never seen it happen. Perhaps it never has. But I know that what might be called indirect or unintended, Government censorship has happened. It cannot fail to happen in this atmosphere. And it happens by a natural process that keeps all incidents of suppression subterranean and invisible. If fear of Government inhibits a station executive from approving a new project perhaps in the news field, he is motivated not to admit that even to his own newsmen. He may blame it on money problems or other factors. In the first place, he is not proud of consulting his own anxieties. In the second place, any admission along these lines could eventually be held against him by FCC. The FCC takes the righteous position that its harassment of licensees is occasional and reasonable, and that the licensee's duty is to be of stout heart and make his decisions boldly just as if the harassment didn't exist. It becomes almost impossible, therefore, to cite cases documenting the atmosphere of repression.

I once asked four executives from four specially reputable TV and radio stations if they had ever been intimidated by Government or fear of Government.

"Intimidated," of course, is a loaded word. They all answered "No." Then I asked them, "Have you ever made decisions affecting news coverage or editorial policy in which you felt you had to consider, among other factors, how much of a problem a certain course might cause with Government?" They all answered "Yes."

I once suggested to my bosses at a television station an editorial criticizing Newton Minow, then Chairman of the FCC. They agreed. But, they said, "first let's consult our lawyers." The lawyers said to go ahead. (I should have known they would because I worked for people of courage and such people usually hire lawyers of courage.) But suppose the lawyers had said, "No, wait a minute, why make trouble?" The community would hardly have suffered substantially from the loss of our backtalk to Mr. Minow. The only loss would have been known to just a few: the tiniest sacrifice of freedom, a precedent perhaps, the melancholy consciousness that we had held our tongues out of vague and nameless fears. I couldn't help but wonder what lawyers for other stations say in such cases. And what do lawyers have to do with whether a station that criticizes the mayor can also criticize a Federal official? The answer is that broadcasters consult their lawyers about fears publishers don't have, fears of the Government that licenses them.

How much of the blandness in television and radio is due to keeping clear of Government involvement and how much is due to what Fred Friendly calls "dollar censorship?" Nobody knows. But we do know there are stations that don't do investigative reporting. There are stations that confine their documentaries to safe subjects. There are stations that don't editorialize. There are stations that do editorialize but don't say anything.

There are stations that do outspoken editorials but are scared to endorse candidates. My opinion is that much of this kind of caution, probably most of it, is due to a deep feeling that boldness equals trouble with Government, blandness equals peace.

Let me suggest a scenario which is fictitious but which I believe is typical of what is happening in hundreds of television stations today. A television producer goes into the office of the station manager. The producer has been given a budget to do four documentaries over the next year. He tells his boss about four subjects he would like to deal with. But the manager has an objection.

"Tom," he says to the producer, "I know these are all good, lively topics. But at least three of them are going to get me in the same hot water I wound up in 6 months ago when you did the program on 'The Poles of Extremism.' We made two congressmen mad. We got a letter of inquiry from the FCC. We had to make a long internal study of how fair, or unfair, that program was on certain points. Then, even though we were happy to stand behind it, we had to write dozens of letters, make phone calls to Washington lawyers, and I just can't go through that much of a hassle again next year on three more tough subjects." After 30 minutes of mild argument, the producer leaves with an agreement that he can tackle two sensitive subjects if he devotes the other two programs to travelogues that won't make waves.

NBC News Producer Fred Freed discussed this problem of Government harassment in an article he recently wrote for Variety. He said that documentary producers have both economic and political problems. Of the political problems, he said this:

> If you do something controversial, you know you will spend months defending yourself to the Government. That's not conducive to doing something controversial.
> We are not part of the free press. We are licensed by government and required always to justify ourselves to a Government agency. Anyone can complain about us, and a battery of network lawyers will be required just to keep us even.

What to do about the chilling effects of answerability to the Government in regard to both license renewal and editorial decisions?

Basic, clearcut reform to give broadcasting genuine first amendment integrity may take decades, if it comes about at all. Attitudes will have to catch up, as usual, with technology. Pretelevision judges will simply have to grow out of the myopia that applies the First Amendment to monopolistic print but not to competitive broadcasting. Intellectuals will have to get over their blanket hostility toward television. Legislators will have to lose some of their suspicions. The deep upperclass aversions to television, exacerbated certainly by the bumptiousness of the medium and the occasional arrogance of television people, apparently must run their course before we will be able to see this big-eyed thing clearly as, first and foremost, American press.

If press freedom is to mean freedom for all the press, I believe the newspapers will have to become engaged in the struggle for broadcast freedom. The courts will have to reverse decisions they're now making, some of them unanimous. The Congress will have to reform the licensing procedure and, if the courts don't do it first, forbid any imposition of government concepts of fairness or equal time on any media.

The newspapers have played a shameful and shortsighted role in the past few decades. They have been complacent witnesses to the weakening of first amendment rights for broadcasting. They have consistently consulted their own competitive interests instead of the long-range needs of the Nation, which they appeal to so loudly when print is attacked.

In fairness, many broadcasters have been complacent about their own First Amendment status. Not bred in the free press tradition, they have been inclined to approach their problems with Government more like businessmen than journalists. Recent events have begun to educate them to the historic responsibility they bear for the future quality of American press freedom. But it is small wonder, what with the indifferent concern of all the media, that Congress, the courts, and the White House have been less than attentive to broadcast freedom.

As we come to recognize, hopefully, that the First Amendment itself holds firm, or weakens, depending on its full application to broadcasting, then the legislative and judicial structures necessary to guarantee genuine free press status to the new media will come clear to us. They will almost certainly require the conversion of the present licensing proceess into a system of permanent franchises. The First Amendment clearly means that, for the sake of the public, the media shall not be answerable to Government. It is the license renewal factor, more than any other, which has breached the first amendment and introduced into the American system for the first time media answerability to Government. But if that whole, rugged First Amendment concept is, God help us, too revolutionary for our times, then license renewals should at least be made more automatic and more predictable, perhaps on an every-10-year basis.

Some critics argue peevishly against permanent licensing on the basis that a broadcast license is a permit to mint money. But on this point, what is the distinction between renewable and permanent licenses? All that the present perverse system manages to achieve is to turn broadcast profits against the public interest because it motivates broadcasters not to jeopardize those profits by offending the Government. On another level, the argument against profitability is no more relevant than an attack on the First Amendment itself because it has led to fortunes for Hearsts, McCormicks, Luces, Newhouses, Grahams, and others. The overriding concern is media freedom. It should be noted, however, that some of today's prosperous television stations operate on licenses originally granted when the risks were severe. Most of the early TV stations lost money so impressively over a period of years that some prospective competitors actually won licenses and then gave them up rather than accept the economic penalties of establishing the infant medium. Even today FCC figures show that, in 1970, 18 percent of U.S. television stations and 32 percent of radio stations (AM and FM) showed a loss.

The writers of the Constitution anticipated that enemies of press freedom would attack it by abridgment, by a thinning process. They did not anticipate today's Supreme Court, which is attempting to fatten the First Amendment. In the Red Lion case, the high court said that Government fairness rules "enhance rather than abridge the freedom of speech and press protected by the First Amendment." The court's "enhancement" took away from the broadcaster a right held basic by every newspaper editor: his right to decide issues of fairness without Government guidelines or Government referees. Reuven Frank, the head of NBC news, has suggested that the First Amendment may become "the first constitutional provision repealed by technological advance."

But for how long in this climate will the old media escape Government capture? If the First Amendment can be "enhanced," why not for print? The advocates of "access" want to fasten it on print and electronics with its unhealthy appendage of Federal arbiters. A former FCC commissioner has said that, when newspapers begin transmitting by cable, they'll be subject to FCC regulation. And if the belief spreads that official prodding of the media get better results for the public than media freedom, wouldn't it work best of all on monopolistic media?

The case against such experiments as Government-imposed fairness doctrines and equal time rules goes beyond the principle of nonanswerability under the First Amendment. It goes also to the absurdities of Government intrusion which are already visible and mounting.

We have already seen a network ordered to provide time to the Republicans to answer what the Democrats said in time granted them to answer several appearances by a Republican President. That bit of "fairness" was finally called foul—but not until CBS had to take it to court. The FCC and the courts are now grappling with demands for counter-advertising aimed, initially at least, at the broadcast media—the claim, for example, that commercials for large automobiles require balancing by antiautomobile messages from ecology groups. For the past 20 years, the FCC has been sending almost 200 fairness doctrine complaints per year to broadcasters around the country asking for explanations of their performance by specified deadlines. The possibilities for economic damage to broadcasters, for multiplication of Federal mediators of editorial content and for Government harassment of stations and networks extend as far as the eye can see.

With Congress turning "equal time" on and off as it sees fit, the networks have been allowed on one occasion, in 1960, to offer the major presidential candidates a radio-television platform for debates. The astonishing number of more than 100 million Americans watched those four debates on television. The public, in effect, voted overwhelmingly for campaign debates. But Congress shut them off for succeeding elections because the candidates wanted a law to hide behind rather than have to answer publicly yes or no to legal debate invitations. With the Government editing the electronic media, the public interest has been clobbered by politics.

But, without all this big brother regulation, what would assure the country of fair broadcast news? The answer is, the same mechanisms we've relied on for 200 years to discipline print: competition, diversity of ownership, multiple sources of information, public criticism. Like other democratic mechanisms, these are not perfect. They have permitted the existence of shabby, partisan newspapers in the past and in the present. They could not guarantee against all abuses by radio and television. But the old idea remains profoundly relevant: to choose the lesser danger over the greater, to provide stonewall protection against the Government for all organs of information and opinion, even when they're wrong or offensive, lest Government come to dominate them and its voice eventually override them all.

In broadcasting today competition is robust and growing. Here in Washington, for example, there are seven television stations and 41 radio stations, with more television outlets in the offing by cable transmission. (Perhaps I should say six active television stations. The seventh station ceased operating just a few days ago because it was losing money, leaving the license open if somebody wants to buy it.)

The typical American city enjoys an abundance of radio-TV competition alongside a daily newspaper monopoly. Additional national competition in news and information is available now in the possible development of a strong, well-financed system of public television insulated from Government influence, but both the White House and the Congress seem bent on discouraging it.

Some people are worried about the power of the commercial television networks. But there are two things to be said about that. One is this: If they're powerful, and they are, that's an argument for freedom, not regulation: better to have their opinion-molding force divided up among three networks than concentrated in one government. Second, they are hardly all-powerful. Local stations, for instance, outweigh the networks by far in total time devoted to news and in the size of news audiences.

Nor are the networks, for all their occasional touchiness, unresponsive to public criticism. CBS didn't win the battle over "The Selling of the Pentagon." Its critics also scored when the network put out a new guideline on film editing. Many network reporters, I among them, find ourselves traveling more than we did to do interviews and film stories in the South, the Midwest and the West—quiet acknowledgment of the complaint, in which Vice President Agnew was not alone, of too much focus on Washington, New York and the East.

But, in the final analysis, the continuing validity of the First Amendment doesn't depend on affection for, or trust in, the media. It depends on a healthy distrust of government. It depends on the knowledge that the government itself provides the only ultimate danger to any society of total censorship. It depends on recognition that a long, high wall is necessary to block the tendency of any government to influence then guide, then dominate the media. It depends on the simple arithmetic of freedom: multiple private sources of information versus a single official source.

The problem today is that the government, in all three of its branches, is seizing on the newness of broadcasting and the convenient handle of licensing to do what comes naturally to government: establish controls over the media. So, for the first time in American history, we have regulation of media content.

Within the familiar paragraphs of the Constitution there is an unfinished phase of the American Revolution waiting to be born. But it will not come to life for our children unless we believe in it. At present we face a conscious choice between allowing the First Amendment to wither or applying it to our times with all of the boldness and zeal for freedom that its authors wrote into it.

Senator ERVIN. It seems to me that we often lose sight of the fact that the First Amendment was written to benefit the people of the United States. In my opinion, the real purpose of the First Amendment is to do two things for the American people. The first is to implement what Thomas Jefferson meant when he said, "I have sworn upon the altar of God eternal, hostility to all forms of tyranny over the minds of man."

The First Amendment says Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press. The genius of the writers of that provision of the Constitution was that they wrote a provision whose words would fit and give rights to methods of communication of information which I guess they could not have envisioned would ever exist. Yet those words apply just as well to the broadcasting media, which was undreamed of in those days, as they do to the printed word.

I think that the object of the First Amendment was to make Americans politically, intellectually, and spiritually free. The drafters of that amendment recognized that a full flow of information and ideas and views was necessary to keep Americans free from the worse sort of tyranny—that is, tyranny over the mind.

Second, I think the reason for writing the First Amendment was that the institutions of government which the Constitution created would not function in the absence of a free flow of information, uncontrolled by government. I think your statement shows that you share these views in full measure.

Mr. MONROE. Thank you, sir. I have noticed previously your feeling that the First Amendment should apply to new technology if that technology is engaged in a spreading of information, as the printed press was originally, and still is. I do not think many people on Capitol Hill or in Washington or in journalism schools have a clear concept of the possibility of a full application of the First Amendment to these new media. I do not think that, in fact, we are now applying the First Amendment fully to the new media.

Senator ERVIN. Now, do you agree that the First Amendment was designed to make it certain that the people of the United States would have a free flow of ideas and information from all sources and that the government should not control the dissemination of these notions and views?

Mr. MONROE. Yes, sir, I certainly do.

Senator ERVIN. You mention in your statement the fact that when you start out with government regulation, as time goes on, the regulations apply to increasing numbers. And, for some strange reason—I do not know whether it is so strange—since the people who run the government are quite human and think they can manage other people's affairs better than the people can themselves, the government has an insatiable thirst for power. If you give them a little power, they want more power. Fortunately for the country, it has been impossible to regulate the printed word to any great degree, because the people understand the printed word. They understand a free press. Broadcasting was intended, as far as the words of the First Amendment are concerned, to be as free as the printed word in the dissemination of information and ideas.

Do you agree with that?

Mr. MONROE. I agree completely, Mr. Chairman.

Senator ERVIN. But the fact that there was an insufficient number of broadcasting frequencies did require Congress originally to step into the picture and to regulate the allotment of the existing broadcasting frequencies.

Mr. Monroe. Yes.

Senator Ervin. That was done, or at least was justified at that time, because if everyone who wanted to go into broadcasting was permitted to do so, you would have had such a confusion of words on the air waves that what was disseminated by means of the air waves would have been unintelligible.

Mr. Monroe. Yes.

Senator Ervin. So licensing is justified to the extent that it is necessary to make a distribution of available channels in order for the transmissions that are made to be intelligible to the hearers.

Mr. Monroe. I would like to find a way to do away with that much licensing, but I cannot find a way.

Senator Ervin. I think everybody professes in public to love the First Amendment, but a lot of people are afraid of the First Amendment. They are perfectly willing to have free speech for themselves, but they do not believe in free speech or free broadcasting of ideas which they think are unwise or disastrous to their political positions or their economic positions, or which disturbs their thinking.

Now, is it not true that the First Amendment was intended above all things to make the people who exercise this freedom free from Government control of the expression of their ideas?

Mr. Monroe. I think so, sir.

Senator Ervin. And one of the troubles incident to freedom is the fact that there is only one way to prevent the abuse of freedom and that is to destroy freedom. Is that not true?

Mr. Monroe. Yes.

Senator Ervin. And if the Government is going to control either directly or indirectly the ideas expressed or the information conveyed, it is going to destroy freedom—freedom of speech and freedom of the press and freedom of broadcast?

Mr. Monroe. It will indeed.

Senator Ervin. So you have a situation wherein the necessity of procuring a license every 3 years or renewing the license is a Damoclean sword hanging over broadcasters.

Mr. Monroe. If you have been in the print media and you transfer to the broadcast media, you are impressed by a sort of unfree atmosphere that comes primarily from the renewal process.

Senator Ervin. The proper function of both media is exactly the same—to inform the American people. The only way they can inform people is by the collection of information and its dissemination by the expression of ideas based on that information. There is such a thing, as you point out so well, as chilling the exercise of freedom. The First Amendment, I frequently say, was written for the timid as well as the bold, especially in view of the fact that the timid are pretty easily coerced by governmental acts.

I received a note with the observation that those of us in the public office do not like to be criticized. That shows we are quite human. And great pressures are brought on the broadcast media, particularly because it is so powerful, by Government to try to get the broadcast media to paint Government and public officials in the kind of light they would like to be painted in, instead of what the facts may justify in certain cases. So there is constant pressure on the broadcasting media. It has to obtain and renew its license every 3 years which renders it more susceptible than the printed word to governmental pressure.

I think you have made the finest presentation of the necessity of extending the First Amendment rights to the broadcasting media that has been made. That is a high tribute, because we have had some very fine presentations here. I think the broadcast media is entitled to the same rights as the printed page, because if the Government can deny a license to a broadcasting station because it does not like the ideas it expresses or the way it disseminates information, then the end of the First Amendment is in sight.

Mr. Monroe. Yes, sir.

Senator Ervin. I think that the First Amendment was written so that the Government could not say to the people of the United States, the Government has the possession of all the truth on a subject and those who disagree with the Government have none. So we have freedom of the press in order to have a diversity of opinion.

I happen to come from a State that produces tobacco and manufactures many cigarettes and the economic interests of my State are wrapped up in tobacco. Yet we have the FCC adopting a policy which says that it and the Surgeon General have all the truth with respect to smoking and those who disagree with them have none. Therefore, they will not permit any answers or they will not apply even what they call the fairness doctrine to the defense of smoking.

Mr. Monroe. Apparently they are now reconsidering what they have wrought, in the sense that they are not sure now they ought not to permit tobacco advertising to be back on the air so that anti-tobacco messages can be put on the air, which indicates that when people start trifling with the flow of information, they bring about results that they do not anticipate.

Senator Ervin. They have had some requirements affecting advertising. I think that advertising of products which are legal to be sold to the general public is an exercise of the right of freedom of speech, subject, of course, to restrictions respecting fraudulent advertising. But the limitations upon the exercise of the First Amendment rights are very limited. These include the limitation about the defamation of character, the limitation that freedom of speech must not be exercised in such a way as to create a clear and present danger that will incite others to crime and violence, and there is some controversy as to the limitation on the dissemination of information which jeopardizes the national security, a rather vague field which is dealt with in the "Pentagon Papers."

But if there is anything that is true about the freedom of the press, it is that eternal vigilance has always been the price of liberty. God grants freedom to those who love it and are always ready to guard and defend it.

I certainly agree with your proposition that we are going to have to recognize that the broadcast media, after being licensed, should have the same rights to freedom of speech over the airwaves that the newspapers have by the printed word.

Your statement is so excellent, I would like to have it as widely disseminated as possible, and since more people read the Congressional Record than one would suspect, I would like to have your permission to put it in the Congressional Record.

Mr. MONROE. I would be honored, sir.

Mr. BASKIR. You made reference to the Vice President's criticisms about broadcasting. Some of the witnesses before us have, in turn, been critical of the Vice President's speeches because they see them as an attempt by Government to intimidate the press and to influence the flow of news and ideas to be more favorable to the administration. I wonder if you would comment on your view of the propriety of the Vice President's making his criticism.

Mr. MONROE. I have mixed feelings about the Vice President's remarks about the media. On the one hand, I do feel he said some things, going back a couple of years ago, that I felt were a little unbalanced and went a little farther than a Vice President ought to go, particularly when he suggested that there might have to be some way to make the media accountable if the media did not do better. And in the same speech, he made reference to the fact that the electronic media are licensed. The proprietors of radio and television stations and of networks could hardly accept that in any way but some kind of a threat, because the Vice President suggested that we might have to go in the direction of using government—it sounded that way—to apply pressure on the media to behave better according to the government's views of behavior of the press and the media. And he mentioned licensing. And that looked like intimidation.

On the other hand, I am reluctant to go too far in criticizing the Vice President and his series of criticisms of the media because I feel the Vice President, like everybody else, has a right to criticize the media and that the media needs the criticism of public officials as well as others, and we should not be too touchy or unhappy about criticism, including harsh and consistent criticism. I think the Vice President has a right to criticize the media, but I think some of the impressions of a few of the things he said could be construed, and have been construed, by some of the people in the media as a form of intimidation.

Senator ERVIN. The policy we do not like is that the criticism comes in the context of government control.

Mr. MONROE. I think the Vice President himself is unaware of how difficult it would be for the people in the media to accept some of the things he said without considering them threats of intimidation. I think he went farther than he realized he was going, as his remarks had to be viewed by the people in the media.

Senator ERVIN. The fact of criticism itself is not harmful, because as you were saying in your statement, that is one of the controls imposed upon broadcasting and freedom. It is just criticism by a high government official in a context of control that is harmful.

Mr. MONROE. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. It would be better to have criticism and not the control.

Mr. BASKIR. We also heard testimony from a witness last week, Miss Edith Efron, who apparently had done a study of the content of news broadcasting during the 1968 campaign and she had some very harsh conclusions to draw about the bias in terms of the spread of views across the political spectrum. I think it was her conclusion, if my recollection of her term is correct, that it showed a left-liberal, pro-Hubert Humphrey, and antiwar bias, to the general exclusion of other points of view. I wonder if you have any comments about her criticism?

Mr. MONROE. I have read about three quarters of Miss Efron's book. I may manage to get through the rest of it someday. I found her book substantially useless.

Miss Efron's book suffers from grave defects of argument and of evidence. Continually throughout her book, in every chapter, she has a device of suggesting that a reporter on a particular night in a particular newscast did something which she would characterize as an attack on this or an attack on that; or similar derogatory words describing what the reporter did. In each case, she is referring to a passage amounting to a few sentences. And every time she used these phrases during her book, which is every second paragraph, I wanted to know what the reporter said. She was accusing reporters of doing things that they should not be doing.

"Reporters have no business in their reporting on campaigns attacking Mr. Nixon, attacking Mr. Humphrey. That is not the role of reporters, as I see it." And I wondered whether the reporters she was talking about had, in fact, done the thing she said they did.

But nowhere does she allow you in her book to see what the reporters actually said. She is making judgments as to whether the reporter in each case was attacking or was marking something down. or glorifying violence, as she says in parts of her book. She could easily have allowed the reader of her book, in 50 percent, or most, or all of these areas, in her index or in a few footnotes, or at least in a few of the cases, to see what the reporter said that she was characterizing. She does not do it anywhere. In order to find out whether her judgment itself is biased, you have to go beyond her book, which she invites you to do. She says you can see her research, go up to her place and look through it all.

Now, if someone writes a 325-page book claiming bias, I would expect her to do more than that, not just leave the proof to some papers that you have to go through.

The only counter I know to Miss Efron's book was done by Mr. Salant of CBS News, and I have read a report he put out in which he quoted something like 15, 16, or 17 passages from CBS reporters which she had in her book. She characterizes these as a reporter editorializing or attacking and so on. and you get nothing to draw your own conclusion from. In the passages in Mr. Salant's statement, where you get an idea of what the reporter said, they are not criticizing or attacking or editorializing. So I feel Miss Efron's book is a perfect example of bias itself, rather rampant bias.

I have talked to a good many print reporters, and a good many of them are happy to cut the throat of electronic journalism if they can do it. Most of these print reporters have the feeling that the book is such an example of bias and personal judgment that it is useless to read and many have given it up after a couple of chapters.

Mr. BASKIR. Now, would you agree that if a television correspondent has just a couple of seconds to report on, let's say, political affairs in Washington and he has a speech by the chairman of the Democratic committee and a speech by the Republican national committee, he has to make a choice? Ideally he could report both, but he has to choose between one or the other. And if you went through the news broadcasting of a network or of a station over a period of time and found that those choices tend to give opportunity, tend to air statements or positions on one side of an issue more than another—could you then say that the editorial policy or the station was giving more access to one point of view as opposed to another, and therefore you could conclude was biased in favor of the point of view it is giving air time to?

Mr. MONROE. I do not think it can be done on a strict arithmetic basis. I think if it developed over a period of time that one side to an argument had 60 percent of the air time and the other side had 40 percent, that would not of itself necessarily be an occasion of bias. It might be a situation in which the side that got 60 percent of air time was pushing its case more vigorously, where more spokesmen for that side were making speeches in various places, on the floor of the House or the Senate, and where there was more to cover on that side, and the side that got 40 percent coverage, had fewer persons speaking for it, or speaking less effectively or frequently.

I do not think that television or radio newsmen or print newsmen should be in the position of counting up, that since one side has now gotten 60 percent coverage and the other side 40 percent, for the next week or so, we had better give, the 40 percent side exclusive coverage and forget the 60 percent side until things even up. I do not think arithmetic balance makes that much sense.

Mr. BASKIR. I raised that question because in her testimony last week, she did come to the conclusion, again as I recall, in terms of news exposure. She had very distorted ratios—6 to 1, 9 to 1, even greater—in terms of, let's say, statements by the Republican candidate on the one hand as opposed to statements favoring the Democratic candidate, the same thing with the war issue, the same thing with other things, which leaves the public with the impression that somehow things that are being said are not getting over the air.

Mr. MONROE. In her book she said some coverage was favorable to one candidate or another candidate, and my impression of the coverage where she describes it is that one time it may turn out to be favorable, another unfavorable, and it is impossible to judge unless you do a poll following the newscast the next day.

Mr. BASKIR. One interesting thing about your testimony, although you seem to disagree very violently with respect to your assessment about news bias with Miss Efron's conclusion on this, was that the solution to this was not more government control or more government influence, but indeed less. In fact, she said none. I think she went even further than you in suggesting that the allocations of news frequencies could be taken out of the government's hands and accomplished in some other way or indeed not at all, and she seems to come down in favor of more freedom, total freedom, as a solution for the bias which she was describing. So in the end, the two of you, although coming from different points, seem to end up in the same place.

Mr. MONROE. I fully agree with Miss Efron's conclusions.

Mr. BASKIR. We also have testimony last week from a number of television writers of fiction programs. They agreed there was a lot of censorship with respect to the ideas conveyed in these programs. I wonder if you believe that the First Amendment is also as involved when you look at entertainment programs as with respect to news?

Mr. MONROE. No, I do not, Mr. Baskir. I think I would probably sympathize with some of these writers if I were in their shoes. I would probably chafe at some of the restraints they feel are imposed on them and I would probably feel that network or station program directors are a little fearful of reality in their programs, and I applaud the reality that is getting into some of the programs, as in the "All in The Family" series. I believe Mr. Lear was one of the people before your committee, but I do not look on a decision by a network program director, or whoever makes these decisions, that the entertainment has to be done in a particular way as censorship in the same sense as government censorship. It seems to me that there needs to be a very clear distinction between government censorship and decisions that have to be made in any medium by somebody.

Somebody has to run a newspaper, a big magazine, a network, a television station. Someone has to say this goes and this does not go. If the person making these decisions is a private person, that is totally different from the government saying this can go and this cannot go. So in a way, the word censorship is applicable, but not in a way that concerns me with the same concern I have about the government making editorial decisions.

I think these writers should be able to make their case in print, in forums, possibly before congressional committees. I do not see much of a First Amendment problem in it, but I think they ought to be able to criticize the networks for not allowing enough reality in these programs and make other criticisms that they want to. But I do not think there is any essential First Amendment problem.

Suppose you would turn over a night between and 8 and 9 o'clock to one of the writers testifying here and let him put anything he wanted in the program. That would be a little backward way of doing it, but in that case he would be making decisions about what went into the program, and he would be a censor between 8 and 9 o'clock the way he looks at it. Somebody needs to decide. If it is a private person, I do not look on it as government censorship that abridges the First Amendment.

Senator ERVIN. Is it not true that if a private medium refused to take a certain program which is good, or for which there is a demand at least, some other private medium will probably take it?

Mr. MONROE. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. So you get a diversity of programs from private mediums that you would not get at all if the Government exercised the censorship?

Mr. MONROE. Right.

Mr. EBNER. Mr. Monroe, I find your reactions to Mr. Baskir's questions about Edith Efron very interesting in that you take the same view as CBS, that her book in itself evidences a bias in the manner in which she approached her study.

I find it equally interesting that several reputable people in the field, such as Prof. Paul H. Weaver of Harvard University of Government and Dr. George Weinberg, who is a noted statistician, both support wholeheartedly her methodology in approaching this study. With that kind of difference of viewpoint, whom are we supposed to believe?

Mr. Monroe. I am sure those two gentlemen are better authorities in their field than I am, and if I were faced with the question between those two men and me, I suppose I would take their word for it.

Nevertheless, I cannot take their word that her methodology is any good, because her methodology looks atrocious to me and I do feel I have some credentials in judging when a thing is done objectively or relatively objectively. I agree there is no such thing as complete objectivity, but I do not believe in free wheeling advocacy journalism. Miss Efron's book is riddled with bias in every sentence and every paragraph, as far as I am concerned. It is a matter of astonishment to me that two authorities such as you cite can approve her methodology. I would like to know more about who they are and on what basis they approved it.

Mr. Ebner. Stating hypothetically, if we may, that her conclusions are accurate, at least as to the 1968 Presidential campaign, would you also agree with her conclusions that less government interference rather than more is the answer to this type of bias, again assuming it did exist?

Mr. Monroe. Yes, I would.

Senator Ervin. Could you tell us how that would have the effect of eliminating this sort of bias if there were, say, virtually no Government interference?

Mr. Monroe. I am not sure it would eliminate the bias, but I have a feeling that it would eliminate the bias because these media depend on audiences. If a single network began to be recognized as having a bias that was more pronounced in a particular direction than some other network, it is going to lose some of its audience. A local station, a network, depends on credibility, and the American people, if they become angry at a particular network or station out of a feeling that there is a consistent blatant bias being exhibited in its newscasts, some of them, enough to be important in terms of audiences, would disappear and go to another channel or to another network. So the network and the stations are not beyond the reach of the public in terms of having to be fair.

But even if this mechanism of competition would not guarantee an elimination of bias, the only way, the only other way, to approach it is by the Government attempting to eliminate the bias, and when the Government attempts to eliminate the bias, here is no way for the Government to do it without ending up imposing its own bias, which is much more dangerous than toleration of the bias in the media which may exist.

Mr. Ebner. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Ervin. Thank you for a most excellent statement.

Mr. MONROE. Thank you, sir.

Mr. BASKIR. Mr. Chairman, our next witness this morning is Mr. Charles A. Perlik, Jr., president of the Newspaper Guild.

Senator ERVIN. Mr. Perlik, I want to welcome you to the subcommittee and express our appreciation for your willingness to be here and give us your views and observations in a field in which you have had much experience.

STATEMENT OF CHARLES A. PERLIK, JR., PRESIDENT, THE NEWSPAPER GUILD, AFL-CIO, CLC; ACCOMPANIED BY JAMES M. CESNIK, DIRECTOR, RESEARCH AND INFORMATION

Mr. PERLIK, Thank you for that welcome, Mr. Chairman. Let me introduce a colleague of mine. Mr. James Cesnik, the director of research and information for the Newspaper Guild, who played a major role in the preparation of testimony we are about to give.

Senator ERVIN. We are delighted to have him with us, too.

Mr. PERLIK. Thank you. Let me add as a preface to our prepared testimony my appreciation for your arranging this additional appearance and additional sitting of this subcommittee to hear our testimony and that of Mr. Monroe. We are especially appreciative since we feel and know that we speak for the one organization which represents men and women who work for the media, who sometimes feel the brunt of the erosions of the First Amendment first. When I say feel, I really mean feel, and I hope our testimony will demonstrate that point.

The Newspaper Guild is the union which represents some 40,000 news and commercial department employees of newspapers, news services, magazines, and related enterprises in the United States, Canada, and Puerto Rico.

As the only national organization of working newspapermen in the United States—and let me note parenthetically that we use the term "newspapermen" generically—the Newspaper Guild since its founding in 1933 has had a deep and abiding concern and has worked to assure that the press by truly free of any influence that would subvert its right to gather and disseminate news and opinion—whether that influence be public or private and whether that influence be brought to bear directly or indirectly.

The Newspaper Guild's concern is practical, to be sure. Working newspapermen, it almost goes without saying, have a most immediate and direct interest in the maintenance and application of the First Amendment's guarantee of press freedom. Working newspapermen are the foot soldiers of the press. They most immediately and directly feel the effects of actions which threaten, slow or stop the free flow of information and opinion. Newsmen are threatened with jail—sometimes they are jailed—if they refuse to disclose their information and/or its sources to public authorities or private persons. They feel the displeasure and wrath—sometimes administered physically on their persons—of those who see them as agents of vested interests—public or private in nature—right, left, or somewhere between, in posture. They bear the frustration of restrictions imposed on the gathering and publication of news by press managements unable or unwilling to risk the financial burden that might be incurred through retaliatory action by those who might be offended or annoyed by that news.

The Newspaper Guild's concern for press freedom reflects more than our members' self interest, however. We share those convictions expressed so eloquently at the opening of these hearings in October by this subcommittee's chairman. We have long held that ours becomes less the free society we profess it to be—less a representative democracy—to the extent that there is abridgement of press freedom: Freedom to gather as well as publish news and opinion.

The Guild is dedicated to the maintenance and extension of the right of the press to gather and to publish, and to protect its information and its sources of information, without Government interference or hindrance.

Internally this is reflected in article II, section 1, of the Newspaper Guild's constitution, which reads:

> Guild membership shall be open to every eligible person without discrimination or penalty, nor shall any member be barred from membership or penalized by reason of age, sex, race, national origin, religious or political conviction or anything he writes for publication.

We have applied the emphasis to the latter qualification.

Externally, since the Guild's founding, this dedication has been advanced by the Newspaper Guild and its Local unions in a continuing series of actions at the national, regional and local levels and in repeated policy expressions by our annual conventions.

While the Guild is aware that conflicts periodically and inevitably arise under the First Amendment, our most recent convention held in Boston last July, addressed itself to many of the events and issues which gave rise to these hearings and concluded that: The principle of freedom of the press . . . is under grave and unprecedented attack in the United States and Canada.

Among the occurrences cited by our 1971 convention in arriving at this conclusion were subpenas for used and unused notes, films, tapes, photographs and files; attempts to compel disclosure of the sources of information and materials gathered; what the convention described as the incredible actions of the government in attempting to muzzle newspapers in the Pentagon Papers cases, abuses of press credentials by military and law enforcement agencies, and the physical abuse of newsmen by agents of the public and private citizens alike. The complete texts of the pertinent 1971 convention's resolutions, titled Freedom of the Press and Police Press Relations, are appended to this text, I offer them for the hearing record.

Senator ERVIN. The committee is delighted to receive them and they will be printed as part of the record.

Mr. PERLIK. Thank you, sir.

This committee is expert on the constitutional and sociological arguments favoring the full and free flow of news and opinion in a free society such as ours.

At the risk of belaboring the obvious, however, I would like to emphasize a point that all too often, I'm afraid, is forgotten by the very public whose freedoms the First Amendment is designed to ensure and protect.

The purpose of the First Amendment's free press guarantee is not to create a special privilege for newspapers and newspapermen. Its purpose is to ensure that the public may be informed of events which may affect it and of what its government is doing in its name and be free to express itself thereon, for good or for ill. Flowing from that, to the extent necessary to ensure that the public may be informed, we believe that the First Amendment does create unique rights for newspapers and newspapermen in our society.

One of these rights, championed by the Guild for the past 37 years, is the right of newsmen to protect their information and materials as well as their sources from forced disclosure—a right presently being challenged by the government before the Supreme Court, as you are aware. (The Guild has filed an amicus brief with the Court.)

It is the Newspaper Guild's position that this right is absolute and unqualified, and that it applies to any information or source, confidential or not.

Demands for disclosure of newsmen's notes, tapes, films, photographs or files, or for disclosure of their sources, whether made by the government or by private persons, endanger the trust between newsman and news source. And that trust is essential both to the ability of the press to provide the public the information to which it has a right under the first amendment and to the newsman's ability to carry out his function under the First Amendment.

The basis for our position was laid down by the Guild's first annual convention in 1934, when it adopted a code of ethics affirming the newsman's obligation to refuse to reveal confidences or disclose sources of confidential information in court or before other judicial or investigating bodies. That position was reaffirmed by our 1959 convention, which noted that a newsman who discloses confidences and/or sources can expect to soon be unable to collect the information necessary to give meaning to a free press. . . .

The 1969 Guild convention, reacting to the first signs of what became a trend, cited its belief that the Bill of Rights should permit a newsgatherer to protect both the ethics of his craft and his own future ability to practice it and condemned any attempt by the courts or law enforcement agencies to use newsgatherers as arms of the court.

By the time the 1970 Guild convention met we were in the middle of a virtual flood of demands that newsmen disclose their information, materials and sources not only to law enforcement bodies but to defendants as well. And some newspaper managements had been turning over files, containing published and unpublished photographs, verified and unverified information, the names of sources, etc., to governmental agencies—sometimes without any subpena being involved—without so much as the courtesy of informing the newsmen involved. The subcommittee has heard from at least one publisher who apparently sees no possible problem in this type of activity. Some subpenaed newsmen had also been refused support by their publishers in resisting subpenas.

These events resulted in a pair of actions by our 1970 convention.

In one we committed the Guild to negotiating specific contractual provisions to forbid a publisher to disclose file materials without permission of the newsgatherers involved and to require a publisher to support a newsman refusing to honor a demand for disclosure and to guarantee that the newsman will not lose his income and employment as a result of that refusal.

At the same time the 1970 convention, while calling for enactment of legislation to protect a newsman's rights against forced disclosure when careful study indicates conditions to be favorable to its passage, cautioned that legislation crippled by qualifications may be worse than no law at all.

Senate bill 1311 in its present form, in our opinion, falls into the category I just mentioned: legislation that may be worse than no law at all.

Senate bill 1311, like bills introduced in the last Congress, is in our opinion so full of exceptions and qualifications that we fear it would invite prosecution against newsmen rather than protect their rights—that it could contribute to the destruction of the purpose it purports to serve. Senate bill 1311 in fact appears to us to be more restrictive than rulings by some courts in recent years.

In any event, it is our opinion that enactment of any privilege legislation while the Supreme Court is considering the matter, is premature. We do not believe in legislation for legislation's sake.

Briefly, some of the difficulties we see in Senate bill 1311: It would restrict the privilege against compulsory disclosure of information to information which is confidential. We are at a loss to see how in a great many instances a newsman or anyone else can properly sort out that which is confidential from that which is not. Not much information gathered by a newsman in the course of his daily activity comes neatly labeled.

I would like to draw the subcommittee's attention at this point to a clipping from the January 28, 1972, New York Times, bearing the headline, "Village Voice Loses Court Test to Protect Source." The article goes on to describe how the Village Voice, published in New York, attempting to resist demands that it turn over an original manuscript under the banner of the New York legislation in this area, which is considered to be among the most liberal laws in the privilege area, how under that law, a publisher was indeed forced to turn over an original manuscript. I would like to have that appended to my testimony as well.

[From the New York Times, Jan. 28, 1972]

VILLAGE VOICE LOSES COURT TEST TO PROTECT SOURCE

(By Lesley Oelsner)

In one of the first judicial tests of the state's "newsman's privilege" statute, the Village Voice has just been overruled in its attempt to avoid a subpoena directing it to turn over the original manuscript of an article it had published.

The article was purportedly written by an inmate who was later indicted for his alleged role in the 1970 riots at the Manhattan House of Detention for Men, called the Tombs, and the Manhattan District Attorney's office wants it for use in his trial.

The case has far-reaching significance becuse the decision, by State Supreme Court Justice Harold Birns, sets forth specific limits on the newsman's right to claim his newly won privilege—limits which, according to lawyers for the Voice and other media, are inconsistent with the purpose of the law.

Justice Birns, in an opinion published yesterday, said reporters may claim their privilege to withhold information they have gained on the job or the sources of that information only when they obtained it "under the cloak of confidentiality"—when the information has been given the reporter with an "understanding" that the "information or its sources not be disclosed."

As the manuscript given to the Voice reporter, Mary Breasted, was subsequently published under the byline of the purported author, Ricardo de Leon. There was no "cloak of confidentiality" at all, Justice Birns reasoned.

The prosecution wants the original manuscript because it could be far better evidence against Mr. de Leon than the printed article. The printed article would have to be verified by the Voice, which could cause additional legal battles, whereas the original manuscript, if submitted along with evidence by a handwriting expert that it was written by Mr. de Leon, would be clearly admissible.

STATE LAW CITED

The state law, which went into effect in May, 1970, makes no mention of the word "confidentiality." It simply says that no "professional journalist may be held in contempt for refusing "to disclose any news or the sources of any such news coming into his possession in the course of gathering news" for publication or broadcast.

And thus, media lawyers argued yesterday, the statute was meant to have a broader reach than yesterday's decision would allow. "The words of the statute are that all news is protected," said Nathaniel J. Bickford, attorney for the Greenwich Village weekly. "We feel the Legislature knew what it was doing," he went on, in a view echoed by attorneys for several other press groups yesterday. "If they wanted the word 'confidential,' they would have put it in."

The effect of Justice Birns' interpretation of the statute, such lawyers feel. would be to allow the Government to interfere, with the "internal operations," as one lawyer put it, of the media.

As for the man who sponsored the bill in the Legislature, he said he did not know if the lawmakers had intended "confidentiality" to be a factor or not—"I'll have to study the memos and read the opinion," said Assemblyman Emeel Betros, Republican of Dutchess County.

"I will say, though, it was at the time considered a very broad law," he said. It was "intended—and in fact it—one of the broadest," a characterization echoed by those who have studied the newsman-privilege laws of the 18 states that have them.

The case comes at a time when courts from the United States Supreme Court on down are considering suits raising various aspects of press freedom.

And though there have been a scattering of other opinions on the New York law—lawyers interviewed yesterday cited three others—Justice Birn's decision, the lawyers said, was the first in-depth interpretation of the law. The Voice—which considers the decision, as its editor, Daniel Wolf, put it, "thoroughly regrettable"—is now reviewing the matter to decide whether to appeal.

In its opposition to the subpoena, as Mr. Bickford noted yesterday, the Voice had made such points as these: that sources would not give information to the media if they thought the media would be playing the "double role" of aiding the prosecution as well as reporting news; that if the media had to worry about endangering a person who gave them information, they would not publish it, and thus would be giving the public less information than it should.

The Voice, though it relied largely on the new state law, also argued that it was protected by the First Amendment. Several lawyers on both sides of the free speech debate, however, suggested that as the amendment was now interpreted in the courts, that argument would not be upheld—by printing the article, they said, The Voice could be held to have waived its First Amendment rights.

Senator ERVIN. I hate to interrupt, but could you suspend for just a moment? I have to go to the Judiciary Committee for a time.

I have read your statement and it is an excellent statement. I would like to say before I go that I share your misgivings about the advisability of legislating with respect to what is called the newsman's privilege, until we see what the Supreme Court of the United States may decide in the Caldwell and the other two cases that it has agreed to hear. I do not mean to cast a reflection on my colleagues or myself, but I think the men who wrote the first amendment had a better gift for language than possibly we have and the trouble with legislation is that sometimes you may limit a right rather than secure it. So I would prefer the Congress to delay any legislation in this field until after the Supreme Court has handed down its decisions, because if the Supreme Court hands down as enlightened a decision as was made by the ninth circuit in the Caldwell case, I think it will protect the rights of news gatherers better than any act that Congress may pass.

Please excuse me, you may proceed.

Mr. PERLIK. Thank you, sir. We are sorry you cannot remain for the rest of the testimony. We appreciate the opportunity, however, and I will continue to read it for the record.

Had this bill been law last summer, it seems to me, its explicit denial of privilege for information "which has at any time been published * * *" might well have enabled the Government to "inspect and copy" the Pentagon Papers in the New York Times' possession as it sought to do. Once the first story on the papers had been published U.S. district court Judge Murray I. Gurfein might well have been precluded from refusing as he did to allow a Government "fishing expedition" (his words) into the Times' files.

The bill's explicit exemption from protection of the source of information required by law to be kept secret would seem to invite prosecution in many instances, such as those involving grand jury investigations, while hampering the press' ability to continue to carry out its traditional role of exposing the subversion of the public good to private interest, as has been known to occur behind legally closed doors.

And the bill's provisions for total divestiture of privilege for both source and information in cases involving "threat to human life, espionage or foreign aggression" are much broader than recent court rulings. In the Caldwell case, for instance, the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that there must be a clear showing of a compelling and overriding public need that cannot be served by any alternative means before disclosure can be required.

The bill seems to us to invite investigators to seek to let newsmen gather their evidence, turning reporters and photographers into unwilling agents of the Government or other interested third parties.

If at some time, soon or not so soon, legislation to protect newsmen's rights against forced disclosure seems necessary, this bill might accomplish what it sets out to do if the word "confidential" were stricken from its statement of purpose and from line 9 and at the same time all of section 4 and references to it in sections 2 and 3 were deleted.

We fail to see how anything less than absolute privilege can be justified under the First Amendment. I am not aware of any foreign aggression against the United States, espionage against our Nation, miscarriages of justice or lives lost because the press refused to disclose information it had gathered or its sources and which might demonstrate otherwise.

The point I emphasized earlier on the purpose of the Constitution's press freedom guarantee applies equally to the issue of prior restraint on publication raised by last summer's Pentagon Papers cases as it does to newsmen's rights against forced disclosure.

In analyzing the actions surrounding publication of the Pentagon Papers there is a corollary that seems especially appropriate: That just as the public has the right to know about the operations of its Government, so do its elected representatives in the Congress.

Once Government censorship of the press and denial of information to the public's elected representatives abridges the public's right to know, two equally disastrous consequences are inevitable.

First, as I pointed out earlier, we become, to the extent of that abridgement, less a representative democracy than we profess to be.

And not only the credibility of the press, but also, more importantly, the credibility of the Government itself, is destroyed.

We do not contend, of course, that the Government does not sometimes need to act in confidence and even classify some of its papers against disclosure, particularly in matters involving the national defense.

But any system for the classification of such documents: (1) Must be narrowly defined and responsibly applied, (2) must insure periodic review and declassification, and (3) must provide for effective challenge of, and relief from, the decisions of those officials who have the initial responsibility for administering it.

We think the system's declassification process would operate best under an independent review unit with the power to make public any document classified for 2 years unless the necessity for maintenance of the classification is demonstrated by the classifying agency. Any document for which such proof is not made or offered should be automatically declassified.

The Government's present classification system, though improved and reformed in recent years, does not meet the above criteria. Classification is imposed on some information unnecessarily, and on other information mistakenly, and the Government has not been above utilizing it to attempt to manage the news. In fact, as pointed out in the press at the time of the Pentagon Papers incident, the substance and some of the precise details of nearly everything printed from the Pentagon Papers was published while it was happening, apparently deliberately leaked by persons in the administration.

While it may once more be belaboring the obvious, we must never forget that our system of Government is based on a delicate system of checks and balances between legitimately contending interests. And under our system classification and publication are and must remain separate questions; the first regulated by law, the second protected by the First Amendment.

It would be foolhardy, of course, to deny the hypothetical possibility that there might be occasions justifying prior restraint on publication. The courts, including the Supreme Court, have suggested and the defendants in the Pentagon Paper cases have conceded that prior restraint might conceivably be justified in cases involving such matters as current information on wartime battle plans, troop movements and the like.

However, it would be equally irresponsible to forget that voluntary press censorship has served our Nation well during wartime, without the necessity of prior restraints on publication, and can be expected to continue to do so if the occasion arises in the future. Like the Government, newspapers have their own systems of internal checks and balances that serve to restrain them from precipitate action.

As the chairman noted in the first round of these hearings last fall, tensions of yet another kind have arisen between newsmen and public officials in recent years in some parts of the country—tensions over abuses of press credentials, involving both their issuance and use.

A press credential—or press card, if you will—is, or at least is supposed to be, simply a document which a working newsman can use to readily identify himself as such in a situation where it is necessary to establish that identification.

Press cards differ in form and format from locale to locale and the method by which they are issued or obtained, as well as their source, also differs from one city or part of the country to another.

Tension surrounding the issuance of press cards is most prevalent in places where law enforcement officials have a hand in their issuance, and seems, where it exists, usually to vary in intensity in direct proportion to the degree of those officials' involvement.

Press cards generally are issued in one of three ways. Some papers design and issue their own.

The chairman noted in his remarks last fall that members of the newspaper guild in Madison, Wis., last summer voted unanimously to destroy their press cards that had been isued by the Madison police department.

The paper for which those guild members work, the Capital Times, is now one of those which issues its own press cards. These new cards, like those similarly issued, carry the designation "Press Card" at the top of one side, state the newsman's name and the fact that he is a newsgatherer in the employ of the Capital Times. There is a place at the bottom for the signature of the executive editor. On the reverse side is space for the newsman's photo and signature along with vital statistics: height, weight, color of hair, eyes, and so forth.

When we checked with Madison members last week, they reported no more problem establishing their identity with their new press cards than they had had with the old.

I would like to offer for inclusion in the record a copy of the press card issued now by the Capital Times, directly by the newspaper, to each of its reporters and to its newsmen who are qualified to make use of it in the coverage of the news in behalf of the paper.

Mr. Baskir. Subject to the Senator's review, that will be accepted.

Mr. Perlik. Thank you.

Mr. Perlik. Under a second method, a newsman receives from his employer a press card carrying both his and his employer's identity, but bearing the signature of a public official, most often a police chief or commissioner, attesting to those items of information. In these instances the public official, who issues the card, sends a number of signed cards to someone in a newspaper's management ranks—like a managing editor—and he has a newsman's name, et cetera, put on the card before the newsman receives it.

Under a third method of issuing press cards, the issuing public agency, again most often a law enforcement body, is requested to issue a card to a newsman identified in the application and the card comes to the newsman minus perhaps only his signature and/or photo. In some instances managements request and receive the card on the newsman's behalf and give it to him. In other instances the newsman himself requests and receives the card directly from the issuing official or agency.

The California Highway Patrol issues a press card under the third method. We understand it is used widely in the state. On the front of the card it issued in 1971 the legend "1971/Press/California/Highway Patrol" is superimposed on a reproduction of a police badge and appears more prominently than the name of the newsman and the paper which employs him. Again I would like to offer a photostatic copy of the California Highway Patrol press card, again under the same limitation you have put on the others.

Mr. BASKIR. Subject to the Senator's approval, that will be accepted also.

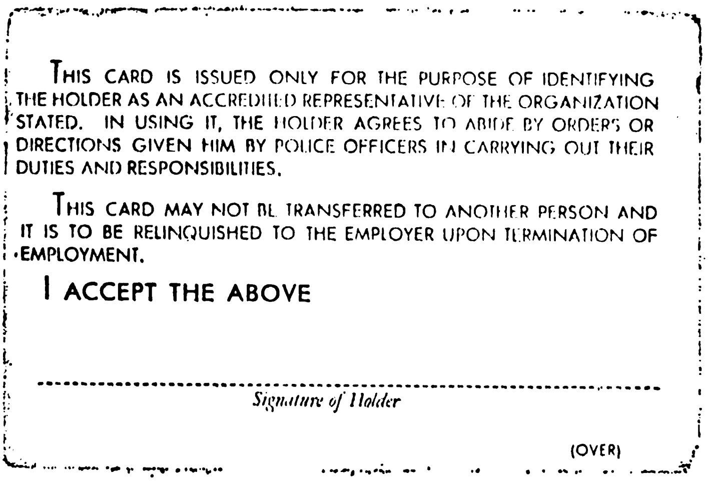
COMMISSIONER (OVER)



THIS CARD IS ISSUED ONLY FOR THE PURPOSE OF IDENTIFYING THE HOLDER AS AN ACCREDITED REPRESENTATIVE OF THE ORGANIZATION STATED. IN USING IT, THE HOLDER AGREES TO ABIDE BY ORDERS OR DIRECTIONS GIVEN HIM BY POLICE OFFICERS IN CARRYING OUT THEIR DUTIES AND RESPONSIBILITIES.

THIS CARD MAY NOT BE TRANSFERRED TO ANOTHER PERSON AND IT IS TO BE RELINQUISHED TO THE EMPLOYER UPON TERMINATION OF EMPLOYMENT.

Signature of Holder

(OVER)

Mr. Perlik. The reverse side of cards issued under both the second and third methods usually contains a statement to the effect that it has been issued for identification purposes only, a pledge that the holder will abide by orders or directions given him by police in carrying out their duties and perhaps a second pledge that the newsman will return the card if he leaves his present employer. Below all this is a place for the newsman to indicate his acquiesence to those conditions with his signature.

Press cards falling into the third category have produced most of the tension that has risen among newsmen over press cards in recent years.

When newsmen must depend on Government agents or agencies to obtain press cards—the basic document of their identity and acceptability—it is in fact a form of licensing and as such is subject to the same sort of abuses as any other kind of licensing.

When the Newspaper Guild, in a resolution by its 1968 convention, first took official notice of problems involving the issuance of press cards we called for them to be "issued without discrimination to persons employed in gathering news" and condemned their being "withheld (as reportedly occurring in Los Angeles) simply because a law enforcement officer does not like what the reporter writes."

A veteran newspaperman who recently joined the Guild's staff reports that several years ago when he worked in Las Vegas, Nev., two reporters were denied press cards issued there, at least then, by the police because a "routine" police check revealed that they had police records. They lost their jobs because they couldn't get a police press card, he tells us. (There was and is no Guild contract in Las Vegas to protect newsmen from such treatment, by the way.)

Tension also has arisen over press cards issued by law enforcement agencies when in several instances the agencies apparently have not been averse to issuing some to their own agents, enabling them to masquerade as working newsmen.

In several instances law enforcement officials have admitted employing this sort of ruse. In one of the most brazen of these admissions, just about a year ago, the California Justice Department's chief of law enforcement, backed by the State's attorney general, stated that he would not hesitate to have one of his agents pose as a newsman in order to gather information.

Our 1968 convention voiced the Guild's condemnation of this practice, too, "not only because of its doubtful ethics but because it believes such conduct could destroy news sources and the willingness of the public to be interviewed by authentic members of the press * * * as well as the trust of newsmen in general."

Our 1969, 1970, and 1971 conventions, repeated the call for an end to the practice, with our 1971 convention noting that under this practice "the public cannot be sure * * * who is a reporter and who is a secret agent" with "the result, in some cases * * * that the physical safety and the very lives of working newsmen have been placed in jeopardy."

Even if dependence on Government agents and agencies for the issuance of press cards had not in any instance had a chilling effect on the press and its practitioners' ability to function freely, the practice is a form of licensing and as such contrary to the first amendment. The practice should stop. The press should issue its own basic credentials of identification.

Despite the alarms raised by some in recent years over the press' real and imagined shortcomings, the First Amendment guarantee of press freedom has served and continues to serve this Nation well.

I would ask those who seem to favor making the press less free:

Do you really believe that the U.S. citizenry ought to have to depend on the willingness of newsmen to serve jail terms in order to continue to obtain information necessary to fulfill their function of governmental watchdogs?

Do you really believe that news which may be embarrassing to some in public positions ought be cleared with those same officials before it can be published?

Do you really believe that the Government ought to have the power to decide who is qualified to gather news?

If anything is called for today, it seems to me, it is an even broader application of the free press protections under the First Amendment, such as occurred in Supreme Court decisions on libel in recent years.

(Attached to Mr. Perlik's statement is a copy of a resolution by the 38th Annual Convention, The Newspaper Guild, which is printed on page 465.)

Mr. Baskir. Thank you, Mr. Perlik.

In discussing the issue of credentials, you mention some difficulties that members of the press have had in various areas, and I believe you suggested that you prefer to have these credentials issued by the newspapers themselves rather than from any official bodies. We have had some testimony as well as other information to the effect that whatever the difficulties are with respect to the regular working members of the establishment press, the difficulties are far more severe for members of the so-called underground press and for college newspapers. I wonder if you feel that your comments with respect to press credentials apply any differently to those aspects of the press?

Mr. Perlik. No, sir, they do not. We think for an industry to control the method of issuing press credentials, such credentials should be available to anybody who can demonstrate that he is an authentic news gatherer, no matter what forum he may wish to use the news he gathers in.

Mr. Baskir. Do you have any instances of the extent of difficulties with respect to the college press or the underground press, or would you be able to supply them to the subcommittee later?

Mr. Perlik. We are certainly aware of certain incidents, yes. I do not happen to have with me any precise details I would care to put on the record as a statement of sufficient accuracy. But if you would receive further submissions of that sort, we would be happy to supply them.

Mr. Baskir. Is my understanding correct that in the Senate press gallery, the practice is to have members of the Senate press corps admit people into membership as sort of——

Mr. Perlik. In my understanding, there is a committee elected by the correspondents, which is the regulating body in determining who else shall sit in the Senate press gallery.

Mr. Baskir. I seem to recall that sometime ago there was a controversy because some members of the underground press wanted to gain admittance. Can you refresh our memory as to what that incident was all about and how it eventually turned out?

Mr. Cesnik. I am Jim Cesnik, director of research and information with the Guild.

Eventually, at least one member of the so-called underground press was admitted. I think it was the same gentleman who was more recently denied access to the White House Press Corps, whatever the credential is that you need to get into the White House. I am not thoroughly conversant with all the details of the flap that surrounded the certification or the admission into the Senate press gallery.

There are some problems that arise in some areas which I do not know that it necessarily applies to the Senate press gallery, because there are certainly a great number of people accredited to the Senate press gallery. But there are from time to time such things as available physical space if everybody who is accredited shows up at the same time. But we think this is a kind of separate question. It does not really go to the question of whether or not access, given space, ought to be available.

Mr. Baskir. Of course, if you have the press corps itself issuing credentials, you will also run into the difficulty of that group of people excluding other members of the press, presumably the college press or underground press, for political reasons. The effect would be the same as if the official body had excluded those members.

Mr. Cesnik. I do not think ultimately, no. I think members of the press are more likely to be ultimately persuaded of the correctness of the—of the error of their ways than someone in an official capacity. I think generally speaking, people in the press, or at least in a body, are more apt to admit that they have made an error than is a police department. If, for instance, you had to have 51 members of the Senate vote to admit you to the Senate press gallery, perhaps you would stand a better chance with the working press in the Senate admitting they made a mistake, than you do with the Senate itself admitting it made a mistake, if that is not too far out.

Mr. Baskir. Certainly the people about whom mistakes are made are the people whose interest it is to point out the mistakes.

Mr. Cesnik. Yes, certainly.

Mr. Baskir. I suppose the other world of difference is it is one thing to have censorship by a private body, but the First Amendment applies to government and if the effect might be the same, still the principle is different.

Mr. Perlik. Of course.

Mr. Baskir. You mentioned the use of press covers. The subcommittee in other hearings had a lot of testimony about the use of press covers by investigative agencies. Do you find that this is a problem which is continuing, getting worse, lessening because of the publicity during the last couple of years.

Mr. Perlik. If I had to characterize it, I think the publicity is beginning to take hold, it is beginning to lessen. As my testimony indicated, we condemned it roundly in our last several conventions. Our members and nonmembers alike—we do not have as members every newsman in the country as I am sure you are well aware—are taking more courage and showing more willingness to expose agents and agencies so that they can be properly brought before persons who can do something to remedy the condition. But it still shows up from time to time. I just have the impression that it is not with the intensity that it was.

Mr. CESNIK. Perhaps you are aware that about a year and a half or so ago, the staff at the Washington Star, at least, got together and said, we are going to, in any instance where we discover an infiltrator, someone masquerading as a newsman who is not, we will expose him on the spot. I think this had had perhaps some effect. People are a little more reluctant, at least in some instances, to risk instantaneous exposure.

Mr. BASKIR. I would like to turn to the question of the Pentagon Papers. That case, of course, had to do with prior censorship of the newspapers in publishing classified material and left open the question of subsequent punishment of newspapers and newspapermen. I wonder if you feel that a newspaperman who violates the law—presumably violates the law by publishing classified information—can properly be punished for doing that, or whether you have the same problems with respect to the first amendment and the chilling effect as with prior restraint. Will subsequent punishment, in effect, have the same impact as prior restraint?

Mr. PERLIK. Yes, I think it has that result. The question of whether there is ultimately going to be punishment for the Pentagon Papers is still far from resolved. Grand juries at both ends of the country are looking into the aspects of it. But there is no question that punishment violates that—prior restraint has the prospect of the same impact, in our judgment, the same impact as the subpena power.

Mr. BASKIR. Are you prepared to say that in your opinion, newspapermen should not be punished for publishing classified information?

Mr. PERLIK. Well, first of all, I think it should be voluntary. I am not saying that he should not be, if he wishes as a citizen to exercise his right as a citizen to testify——

Mr. BASKIR. No, I am thinking in terms of publishing, punishment for disclosing, publishing classified information.

Mr. PERLIK. Our position, of course, as our testimony indicates, is that there is a very restricted area in which, of course, there is punishment available—publication of battle plans, respective engagements and things in war time, of course. But we insist that the history of the press's performance during war time has justified a reliance upon that type of self-restraint to further protect the country in those kinds of circumstances and we do not believe that any prior restraint ought to be exercised beyond that level.

Mr. BASKIR. Do I understand your remarks to be to the effect that prior restraint should be limited to the categories you just mentioned, very narrow categories, and that subsequent criminal penalty for publishing information should also be restricted to the publishing of immediate troop movements, battle plans, perhaps details of the construction of weapons, things of that nature?

Mr. PERLIK. Things so closely tinged with the national defense.

Mr. BASKIR. So you would have the same narrow definition, both for injunctions against publishing and also subsequent punishment of the publisher.

Mr. PERLIK. Well, I am not so sure that we would apply the definitions to injunctions for prior publication. Prior restraint seems to be never ending if it ever starts. It is my own personal view, frankly, that I think the New York Times and the Washington Post should have gone in and published them and been willing to take the consequences rather than await the judicial determination that did result.

Mr. BASKIR. As you mentioned, the question of subsequent punishment is now very much alive because of the two grand juries. The espionage laws are somewhat confusing, because there is at least one interpretation that seems to rest the punishment for publishing classified information on a matter of intent—intent to harm the Nation's interest, which could be interpreted, and some people have interpreted it, as saying that you can be punished for disclosing classified information only if you give it to somebody from a foreign nation. If you publish it in a newspaper for the public, you are presumably not engaged in espionage. This problem has led to some suggestions that the law be changed. I think even last week, there was a report of such a suggestion to the effect that the criminal laws say that the transfer of any classified information to an unauthorized person would be a violation of the criminal law, even though you gave it to a Congressman who should not get it, if you gave it to a news manager or a publisher or published it in a newspaper. This would include anything that bears a stamp of classification. I wonder, although this is not uniformly proposed, I wonder if you are prepared to give testimony on such a change in the law?

Mr. PERLIK. I think we did testify in our statement on our attitude toward the whole system of classification. We think it is far too broadly applied and must be more narrowly defined, much more narrowly enforced and applied in the future and it must be self-eliminating, classification of a document. This would go a long way toward eliminating problems that might arise on a person who makes available classified information to some party who is not by law entitled to it. But we try to separate, too, the questions. One is a matter of law, the law of classification, the Government's right to have certain classifications, classified documents, and the other is a matter of the first amendment; when it does become available to the press by some means or other, what are its obligations to the First Amendment, to make use of it, and the protections the First Amendment gives to the press and to the media to make use of it.

Mr. CESNIK. The whole thing presumes that there is a proper system of classification, the proposal that you outlined. Perhaps if there were a proper system of classification, there might be some room for something like this. But, you know, there is a story that gets told a lot about the case of the space monkey that was on display over at the National Zoo for 2 or 3 years, but his existence or the fact that he had gone up in space was still classified information as far as the Defense Department was concerned. Well, that is a pretty ridiculous system of classification. Ostensibly, the guy who might have said that it was still classified over there would be subject to penalty under that proposal.

I think first you have to revise and improve the whole mechanism before you can start talking too much about rapping people when they expose a system for what it is.

Mr. Baskir. How do you deal with the objection raised by the publication of the "Pentagon papers" and the "Anderson papers," that presumably tomorrow it will be somebody else's papers, concerning secret negotiations and dealings with foreign nations which could affect and injure those negotiations? Indeed, when it is concerned with the matter of a war, either the Indo-China War or the Indo-Pakistan War, it does result in great national harm and great worldwide harm because it interferes with efforts to achieve peace.

Mr. Perlik. Those are, of course, considerations which the press has made it known it takes into account in publishing every story, event stories that come off the police blotter, what impact they have. These are matters of degree. I happen to believe in the fundamental good faith of the press of the country in making judicious and judicial judgements of that kind to protect the national interests. It is obviously a wide open door through which many tanks and battleships may ultimately be driven, but it is our judgment that the First Amendment's inviolatability as a necessity for the overall structure of this country is so precious and so necessary that the risks are worth taking and should be taken.

Mr. Baskir. I gather what you are saying is that you believe the President of the United States is not the only one who may make a judgment as to what is in the national interest or what harms national security. The press, from what you are saying, has the same right and an equal right, and indeed, an independent right to make a judgment and a different judgment?

Mr. Perlik. I would add obligation to the right.

Mr. Cesnik. So does Congress.

Mr. Baskir. Thank you.

Mr. Ebner. Mr. Perlik, I am curious as to how you or the Guild, I guess, feel about the Caldwell decision at the Ninth Circuit level.

Mr. Perlik. The Ninth Circuit level—our formal position, as I have stated, is unqualified and absolute privilege. But at the Ninth Circuit level, certainly, if that were not narrowed in any sense, that would be a livable erosion of absolute unqualified privilege.

Mr. Ebner. I appreciate that. That was the reason for my question, because you did state the guild position about the absolute nature of this privilege, which of course, would even transcend the First Amendment. As you know, the First Amendment has been held in various situations not to confirm unqualified rights, beginning with the famous quotation from a Supreme Court Justice that freedom of speech does not give one the right to yell "fire" in a crowded theater, so there are various qualifications imposed.

Mr. Perlik. I also notice as well the Supreme Court has come further in the direction of more liberalized interpretations of the First Amendment.

Mr. EBNER. I guess that depends on which case you look at.

Mr. PERLIK. I suppose so.

If I may augment what I have said about our position on qualified privilege with just a brief addition to our prepared remarks: Our position obviously might appear to be massively self-serving, with a massive self-interest behind it. This is a conclusion, of course, that is hard to avoid but not to defend. For our view is that the constituency which is served by this self interest is the very largest constituency this nation is capable of producing; it is the Nation's entire population and the preservation of the broadest use and application of the first amendment is a self-interest stance we are proud to come down hard alongside of. If you will forgive that ungrammatical conclusion, that is our feeling.

Mr. EBNER. I appreciate that.

Just one last request for information, Mr. Perlik. You mention in your statement that like the Government, newspapers have their own systems of internal checks and balances that serve to restrain them from precipitate action. I think most members of the public are at least generally familiar with the constitutional system of checks and balances in the Government. I wonder if it would be possible for you to give some examples of this type of internal system that the newspapers use to prevent precipitate action?

Mr. PERLIK. One of them is the grievance machinery of the newspaper guild contract. We have approached the working newspaperman's rights in this area through the collective bargaining process, though not with all the success that we would like to claim, and it is an area in which we are only beginning to assemble experience and response. One of the most troubling and disappointing results has been the response of publishers in our efforts, especially in the subpena area, to protect the right of the newsman to protect his sources, to get guarantees that the publisher will pay for legal defenses, that the publisher will see to it that if he is thrown in jail because he refuses under a contempt citation, they will guarantee the maintenance of his salary. So there is that type of mechanism as a part of the check and balance system.

There is as well a growing tendency in the newsrooms around the country for the working newspaper writer himself to assert himself more effectively and more meaningfully in not allowing to the boss the sole judgment of what is going to be the content of the newspaper. Where this is going to take the newspaper of the future is certainly subject to wide speculation and deliberation, and indeed in the minds of many people, question. But it is that kind of thing I had in mind when I said that there are places and ways inside the newsroom itself for these very forces to undergo examination and determination.

Mr. EBNER. I take it you feel that this is vastly preferable to any attempt at outside imposition of checks and balances?

Mr. PERLIK. Indeed I do.

Mr. EBNER. Thank you.

Mr. PURSLEY. Mr. Perlik, has the newspaper guild noticed any change in the situation regarding the issuance of subpenas since the Attorney General's guidelines were issued a year ago?

Mr. PERLIK. Well, there has been a slackening off. I do not know whether I would attribute it to the Attorney General's guidelines, because his guidelines are not much different, really, than some of the legislation we have seen proposed. But I have not seen a recent case.

Jim, you can correct me if I am wrong. On issuance of news subpenas, I think the thing is standing in a sort of limbo now until we see what the Supreme Court says in the Caldwell case and companion cases.

Mr. CESNIK. I do not know if it is so much the Attorney General's guidelines as much as the fact that there was rather hefty hue and cry involved and public pressure, or at least the pressure of the press was brought to bear.

There was one thing that happened soon after the issuance of the guidelines. The subpenas did seem to flow, rather than into the establishment press, into the so-called underground press and the student press, the established student press. There was even a kind of new wrinkle applied out in California, where at Stanford, they used a search warrant rather than a subpena to tear apart the Stanford Daily offices and search, I guess for some kind of photograph.

I do not know that it was necessarily the guidelines as much as the general hue and cry and awareness of what was happening.

Mr. PURSLEY. Thank you.

Mr. BASKIR. Thank you very much, Mr. Perlik, for your testimony, and I would like to apologize again on behalf of the Senator for his having to leave.

Mr. PERLIK. I understand the the Senate must keep in business.

Mr. BASKIR. They all have about 84 things to do at the same time, and somehow they manage to get 83 of them done.

Mr. PERLIK. I would like to offer as part of our testimony, under the same guidelines you suggested with the exhibits there, an article entitled "A Deliberate Censorship" which I think appeared just in this last week's Sunday New York Times. It seems to me very relevant to the question of self-restraint by the press. I would be certainly happy to read it into the record, but I do not want to take any of the subcommittee's time any further.

Mr. BASKIR. We will put it into the record again according to those conditions.

Mr. PERLIK. I think it is quite pointed, especially to your question, Mr. Ebner, about self-restraint of newspapers and, indeed, whether they should engage in self-restraint, because that then makes them the judge and jury, too.

A DELIBERATE CENSORSHIP

NEWSMEN EXERCISE THEIR RIGHTS TO SPEAK NOT AS INDIVIDUAL CITIZENS, BUT AS TRUSTEES FOR THE REST OF US

By Ronald M. Dworkin

London—There is a dangerous kind of censorship, now growing in force in both America and England, that does not rely on legal restraints on what may be said. It appeals instead to the idea that the press, television and other media have a professional responsibility to exercise their legal freedom with self-restraint, because their power to inform and persuade sometimes includes the power to embarrass or even cripple national policy.

The American press has been widely criticized, for example, for publishing the Pentagon Papers and the records of the Nixon Administration's discussions of the Indo-Pakistan war, television has been criticized for giving publicity to demonstrators, and for subverting morale by reporting the most distasteful aspects of the Indochina wars.

In England, the Home Secretary criticized the B.B.C. for a television discussion that gave a voice to Republican critics of British policy in Ulster on the ground that the program would aggravate an already incendiary situation; and the Tory press said that the B.B.C. was trying to usurp the authority of Parliament.

This sort of criticism may be the edge of the wedge, because it may be backed by Agnew-like hints that if the media cannot govern themselves others may have to govern them. But the very fact that legal censorship is too foreign to our tradition makes the appeal to self-restraint attractive and therefore more dangerous.

The appeal is based on a fallacious analogy between the rights of ordinary citizens and the duty of the press. Newsmen exercise their rights to speak not as individual citizens, who may give up their rights in what they think is a good cause, but as trustees for the rest of us.

We are equally cheated when the man who decides what we shall not know is a newspaper editor or a television executive rather than a bureaucrat; perhaps more cheated, because the bureaucrat's decision can be exposd and challenged in court and the editor's cannot be. The cliche that the media have responsibility as well as power advances the argument hardly at all. Their underlying responsibility is to those who want to read or watch them, and the question is when this important responsibility may be set aside in favor of some other one.

It is often said that the media must not broadcast information that will harm the community, that they must not act like Holmes' man who cried "fire" in a crowded theater. But this is not helpful when, as is almost always the case, the community is not agreed about what is harmful and what is not.

We can distinguish easy cases: of course it would be wrong for a newspaper to publish information about troop movements in wartime, because that would cause harm that is not subject to political debate.

The success or failure of Government policy in Vietnam or Ulster is a very different case, however—just because the United States and Britain are in fact divided, as a matter of political debate, on whether that policy ought to succeed.

Perhaps the United States' interests are harmed if television coverage makes the war more difficult to pursue because it hardens the enemy or confuses our soldiers. Perhaps British interests are harmed if, as some commentators have warned, the opponents of union in Ulster will tolerate violence more readily if they see their extremist heroes on telvision. But in each case it is clear that a significant number of citizens believes that these costs are worth paying if they will help to force a change in policies that these citizens count as more harmful still. That proposition, for better or worse, now lies within the area of political controversy, and it cannot be the part of the media to take it out.

The newspapers and television must make every effort to report fairly, and to present a balance of opinion. It may be that genuine objectivity is an impossible ideal, especially on television, where the choice of one image as more accurate than another must reflect hidden attitudes as well as hard facts. But we are better off asking our newsmen to pursue the ideal, as far as they can, rather than to settle for a censorship that is deliberate and that is, in the nature of the case, always on the same side.

(Ronald M. Dworkin, formerly at Yale Law School, is professor of jurisprudence at Oxford.)

Mr. BASKIR. Thank you again.

Our final witness today was scheduled to be Mr. Robert M. Bartell, public relations consultant with the Liberty Lobby. However, Mr. Bartell was unable to appear. Mr. Warren S. Richardson, general counsel of the Liberty Lobby is here representing Mr. Bartell and the Liberty Lobby. You may proceed Mr. Richardson.

STATEMENT OF WARREN S. RICHARDSON, GENERAL COUNSEL, LIBERTY LOBBY, ON BEHALF OF ROBERT M. BARTELL

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am Warren Richardson, general counsel of the Liberty Lobby. Mr. Bartell was to fly up here from Florida for his presentation but was unable to make it. I will summarize it and take advantage of your kind offer not to have to read it all into the record. I will give you a shorter summary.

Mr. BASKIR. Thank you. You may wish to identify the gentleman sitting with you.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Excuse me, this is Mr. Lafe Hooser, legislative aide at Liberty Lobby.

Mr. BASKIR. Thank you.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am almost overwhelmed, Mr. Baskir, by realizing upon listening to the witnesses, both the other day and today, that apparently, there is a unanimity of opinion that the Government should stay out of the news business. We phrase it this way: "That freedom of the press does not exist in America as constitutionally defined and will never exist so long as the Government is responsible for our economy." We develop this theme in the presentation, and I would like to read the part from the testimony on page 2 dealing with 1962, when Mr. Arthur Sylvester, then Assistant Secretary of Defense for Public Affairs in the Kennedy administration, was giving the public false information about Cuba. Mr. Sylvester said:

> This practice is proper management and control of the news and that Government news reports are part of the weaponry that a President has in the application of military force and related forces to the solution of political problems.

We are opposed to the concept.

We develop the concept that along with freedom goes responsibility. We spend two or three pages trying to find, and I do not know that there is an answer, why, with their great power and great freedom, such as it exists today, they did not—the press, that is—do something about the so-called Bilderberger conference in Vermont a year ago. We leave that for you to peruse in the record.

The chairman addressed a letter to Mr. Bartell and specified four particular questions that he wanted comments on. As you know, Mr. Bartell is a former radio and television commentator and would have gotten to this with more flare and greater depth, but I can point out that on the Government subpena power over newsmen, we are absolutely opposed to it. If the Government is damaged, let the Government sue in the courts like anyone else. We feel the press should be free from trying to pick up the distinctions between qualified and unqualified freedom. I guess we would be classified, from your previous questions, as very, very close to supporting the unqualified type of freedom.

Now, as to the publication of secret papers or the Pentagon Papers, we do have a self-interest involved. But trying to put that aside, the classification of that information by the government in the first place was obviously wrong, and while there may be a technical violation of the security laws, we see nothing wrong in terms of the news media publishing it; we feel that it should have been published years ago.

On the issuance of press credentials, another question asked by the chairman, we feel that the Government should not, any governmental agency—police department or anyone else—should not issue press credentials. Our statement here is to the effect that the press itself should have its own organization, whether it be the guild or some other group, that would issue press credentials nationwide. In this respect, it could be similar to, but not exactly identical with the bar associations of various States. Self-policing by the fourth estate's own people would be far superior, in our opinion, to issuance of press credentials by the Government or any governmental agency, be it Federal, State, or local.

In the last category, the chairman opened it up to any other comment we wanted to make, and we chose to reemphasize what was brought out in the Bilderberger case, that the responsibility of the press is as large and as co-extensive with their freedom, and since we advocate a great amount of freedom, we wish to see that their responsibility, by their own efforts and policed by themselves, be as great.

That would be my summary of Mr. Bartell's rather long statement.

(The statement referred to follows:)

STATEMENT OF ROBERT M. BARTELL, PUBLIC RELATIONS CONSULTANT AND TAX PROGRAM COORDINATOR, LIBERTY LOBBY

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee: I am Robert M. Bartell, public relations consultant and tax program coordinator of LIBERTY LOBBY. I appreciate the opportunity to present the views of LIBERTY LOBBY's 20,000-member Board of Policy, and also to appear on behalf of the 135,000 subscribers to our monthly legislative report, Liberty Letter.

By its very nature, freedom of the press is like being a little bit dead, or a little bit pregnant; either it is or it isn't. Therefore, LIBERTY LOBBY advocates freedom of the press. It is axiomatic that control of communications means thought and speech are controlled. Insofar as government is concerned, these few words from Article I of the Bill of Rights illustrate government's limitations: "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press." It is painfully obvious steps must be taken to establish clearly a modus operandi for the working press and to protect the right of all the people to know what its government is doing in the interests of ALL the people.

LIBERTY LOBBY addresses itself to the premise that freedom of the press does not exist in America, as constitutionally defined, and will never exist so long as government is responsible for our economy.

Articulate spokesmen at these and other government hearings have taken both government and the media to task concerning alleged faults of the other, and in view of the mystifying attitude of the press upon occasion, and the "credibility" of government, it would appear there is validity to both arguments.

At LIBERTY LOBBY we feel an examination of the current status of the media vis-a-vis government proves they are wedded, if not in bliss, then in fact.

Increasingly, this government has taken upon itself the responsibility for the success of our economy. To be responsible means to have and exercise the power to give orders to all forms of free enterprise and to see that these orders are carried out. Without commenting on the success or failure of this task, it is obvious that government has this power, and of necessity is exercising it. Thus government is now in a position to coerce.

The press, being a form of enterprise, and therefore a contributor to our economy, cannot help being a victim of this power of government.

Aside from the obvious restraints placed upon any segment of our economy through the actions of government, there is the added factor of the First Amendment to our Constitution being abrogated in a fashion clearly anticipated by the framers of the Constitution.

Alexander Hamilton, in the Federalist Papers of 1788, attempted to illuminate the problem and succeeded in further obfuscating the answer. When asked, "What is the liberty of the press?" Hamilton answered, "Who can give it a definition which does not leave the utmost latitude for evasion? I hold it to be impracticable, and from this I infer that its security, whatever fine declarations may be inserted in any constitution respecting it, must altogether depend on public opinion, and on the general spirit of the people and of the government."

As untenable as the current position of the press appears to be, vis-a-vis government, I think we have to face the inescapable fact that the American media enjoys a freedom of action unknown elsewhere in the world. How has the press utilized this freedom? George Bernard Shaw is quoted as having once said, "Liberty means responsibility. That is why most men dread it."

In 1941, President Franklin D. Roosevelt said, "The American people are beginning to realize that the things they have read and heard, both from agitators of the legislative variety and the agitators of the newspaper owner variety, have been pure bunk and that these agitators are appealing to the ignorance, the prejudice, and the fears of the Americans and are acting in an un-American way."

GOVERNMENT'S ROLE IN MAINTAINING A FREE PRESS

Let's examine government's role and its responsibility toward maintaining a free press. Prior to columnist Jack Anderson's disclosure concerning Mr. Kissinger, the Indo-Pakistani war, and managed news, probably the most celebrated instance of managed news was the admission on Oct. 29, 1962, by Arthur Sylvester, then assistant secretary of Defense for Public Affairs, that the Kennedy Administration was giving the public false information about Cuba. Mr. Sylvester said this practice is proper "management" and "control" of the news and that government news reports are a "part of the weaponry that a President has in the application of military force and related forces to the solution of political problems. . . ."

No thinking person will deny that governmental control of information is the essential tool of dictatorship.

MEDIA'S ROLE IN MAINTAINING A FREE PRESS

The media has also produced some disturbing situations. In 1942 Adlai Stevenson said, "The failure of the commercial press, with few exceptions, to honestly report the news and be fair in their editorial columns, has served to retard the war effort. Generally, their campaigns for special interests have created confusion in the minds of the American people and in several instances have bordered on acts of treason."

"Communication," said Senator Fulbright, "is power." In a reference to television news, he added, "Great masses of Americans depend on television for their hard news, despite the fact that such news is both distorted and limited."

Dean Burch, chairman of the Federal Communications Commission, has declared, "The entire contents of a typical TV evening news show would take only three columns in a newspaper."

In 1968, Vice President Hubert Humphrey said, "I am convinced that just as the media can tell the facts to the people, they can also exaggerate and inflame the situation."

The Media Task Force of the National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence has discovered what many thoughtful observers of the press and television have known all along . . . that "a crisis of confidence exists today between the American people and the news media."

An example of why this mistrust exists is the incredible story of the "uncelebrated celebrities." An international organization euphemistically called the "Bilderbergers" conducted a conference in April, 1971, to which had been invited some of the leading international figures of our time, as well as a number of notable Americans. The conference was held at the Woodstock Inn, Woodstock, Vt., Apr. 23–25. Normally a meeting of this nature, attended by world-renowned figures, would be front page news. Yet, unless a diligent search failed, not one word of this conference was carried in this nation's media. It wasn't until November, 1971, more than six months later, that a story appeared in a newspaper, and this despite the fact that two leading American newspaper executives were among those present.

What was there about this mysterious gathering that attracted the attention of LIBERTY LOBBY? Initially, the arrival, without fanfare, of Prince Bernhard of the Netherlands, in his private jet, at the airport in Boston. A LIBERTY LOBBY supporter notified our Washington headquarters of the arrival, and of the increase in foreign travelers to the small community of Woodstock. LIBERTY LOBBY immediately dispatched a reporter to Woodstock but the veil of secrecy was so tightly drawn around the meeting it took almost a week to get the pertinent facts.

LIBERTY LOBBY then published the entire story in its June Liberty Lowdown, a copy of which is attached.

What was there about this story that the prestigious New York Times found "unfit" to print?

Why did the Washington Post, so eager to attack government for its managed news, ignore what was obviously one of the most important international gatherings of the decade?

Why did the Los Angeles Times, so quick to attack President Johnson's credibility while he was President, choose to overlook this conference?

All of these major metropolitan dailies report with great feeling on the activities of small constitutionalist groups in America, yet apparently felt there was no news value in the Woodstock meeting.

Who issued the orders to the nation's press to ignore the Bilderberger meeting? What kind of incredible conspiracy exists in this nation that could force an ostensibly free press to treat the meeting as if it didn't exist? If this committee, or any committee of the Senate, meets in executive session, it is the target of widespread conjecture and comment, in our newspapers, on radio and TV. Safeguarding the national interests of the U.S. is the responsibility of all those entrusted with its care. But, Mr. Chairman, what and whose interests were being safeguarded at a meeting attended by 12 foreign nations and without apparent government sanction or even knowledge?

I respectfully refer this committee's attention to a story carried in the Manchester, N.H. Union-Leader under the by-line of Arthur C. Egan, Jr., a copy of which is also attached.

Mr. Egan, following a six month investigation of this fantastic case, reported that a top secret conference was indeed held in Woodstock, despite the repeated statements of Herbert Klein, White House communications director, that he never found evidence such a meeting took place. Mr. Egan reported that the main topic of discussion was . . . "The radical change of the American role in world affairs and the subsequent consequences." I think this committee will admit that is a most intriguing discussion for a group of internationalists. One wonders what decisions were made in Woodstock.

Mr. Egan went on to report that the U.S. State Department confirmed that it has worked with Vermont State Police in making security arrangements for at least 90 foreign and domestic figures. It was also admitted by the State Department that 12 foreign countries and the U.S. had representatives at the top secret sessions and that all expenses, including air fares, were picked up by two tax-exempt organizations, which means that American taxpayers helped pay the bill. Two American newspaper executives, Osborn Elliott, editor-in-chief of Newsweek, and Bill Moyers, formerly of Newsday, and former press secretary to President Lyndon Johnson, attended, yet a month-long search of these publications revealed that not one word was ever printed concerning the conference.
